The history of Spain.

SECT. VII.

The history of the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, from the accession of St. Ferdinand, to the union of all the Christian monarchies in Spain (except Portugal) in the persons of their catholic majesties Ferdinand and Isabella.

^a THE conjunction of the kingdoms of Leon and Castile was an event not at all more agreeable or more glorious for the sovereign, than it was advantageous to the people, which the wiser and better part of the nobility very well knew; and therefore preferred the justice and the conveniency of the king of Castile's title to the will of their late prince, who, contrary to reasons of state, his own solemn act, and the oaths of his states, would have disinherited his son, merely because he was a king in his life-time*. But though Don Ferdinand very well knew his disposition, and that he might, without any danger, have trusted the tranquility of his kingdom of Leon to the affection of his subjects, yet he very punctually kept the appointment made by his mother queen Berengara, and repaired to Benevente with his family, at the time fixed.

^b Thither also came the queen dowager Theresa, and the two infantas; and the mutual sincerity of the whole royal family appeared not only in exterior marks of kindness and respect, and in the king's confirmation of large annual pensions, which had been promised, but from their maintaining a perfect and good correspondence while they were together, and from the resolutions taken when they came to part^b.

It was then agreed that the infanta Donna Sancho should be left behind with queen Berengara, and reside, for the future, in the court of Castile; and that the king should accompany queen Theresa and the other infanta, her daughter, into Portugal, which he accordingly did^c. The king, Don Sancho, quitted his dominions to go and meet them, and the two kings had a long interview at Sabugal; where Don Ferdinand took great pains to persuade Don Sancho, how much it was their common interest to live in the strictest terms of friendship and peace, that they might carry on the war with greater success against their common enemy, the Moors; and, to convince him that this was the language of his heart, he restored the important fortress of St. Stephen de Chaves, which his father had taken from him^d. At his return from this interview, Don Ferdinand marched with a good corps of troops into Galicia, where the lords, who pretended to espouse the cause of the infantas, were endeavouring to render themselves independent, despising the youth and want of experience in their new king. He reduced some, punished others, and obliged the rest to quit their country. Amongst these was Don Lorenzo Suarez, who retired into the territory of the Moors^e. Towards the close of the year arrived a bull from pope Gregory IX. ratifying the treaty between him and queen Donna Theresa, by which the settlement of the kingdom of Leon was rendered complete^f.

Many places taken from the Moors granted to the archbishop of Toledo. As the king's attention was, for the present, wholly employed about civil affairs, Don Roderic, archbishop of Toledo, was intrusted with the care of the frontiers; and his zeal induced him to carry on the war very briskly against the Moors, from whom he took several places, and some of the most considerable were, for this reason, granted by the crown to his diocese^g. In order to comprehend the reason of this more clearly, it will not be amiss to observe, that it very frequently happened, when the monarchs of Castile recovered places on the frontiers which they could not immediately either fortify or repopulate, the Moors, upon the retreat of the army, took advantage of this, and got them again into their power; to prevent which, no method could be found so effectual as granting them to a prelate, who, by his influence, filled them speedily with inhabitants, and, in consequence of annexing them to his see, preserved them to the kingdom.

The royal infant gains a glorious victory over Aben-Hut, king of Seville. THE next year, however, the Christian army on the frontiers was commanded by the infant Don Alonso, the king's brother, and Don Alvaro Perez. The young prince, being desirous of signaling his courage, marched into the territory of Cordova; and, having ravaged it without opposition, advanced into that of Seville, and passed the Guadiana at Xerez. The Moorish monarch, Aben-Hut, having certain intelligence of the small number of forces the Infant commanded, and having received a large reinforcement from Africa, under the command of a general who acted from no other motives than religious zeal, resolved to lay hold of so favourable an opportunity to give a check to the Christian power; and having accordingly taken his measures with as much secrecy as possible, he advanced, with a numerous army, in order to surprise the Christians: but, notwithstanding this, the Infant Alonso might have retired, if his piety and courage had not induced him to risque a battle, from a persuasion that, with the divine assistance, many may be vanquished by few. His little army was ranged in two lines, the first commanded by Don Alvaro Perez, the second by the Infant in person; they both observed a close order, and received the charge of the Moors with great firmness and intrepidity. The battle was obstinate and bloody, but, in the end, the Christians were victorious, and the Moorish general from Africa slain upon the spot, by a young gentleman of Toledo, who had received the honour of knighthood that morning in the field^h. A prodigious number of Moors were killed upon the spot and in their flight, Aben-Hut himself escaped with difficulty, and most of the Spanish historiansⁱ are themselves persuaded; and would persuade their readers, that St. James was visibly present in the battle, in which there fell but one man on the side of the Infant. The archbishop of Toledo is silent upon this head: and though the bishop of Tuy mentions the victory, and ascribes it to the wonderful power of God, yet he says nothing to the presence of St. James^k. The care of the finances being about this time in the hands of the Jews, the pope wrote to the archbishop of Compostella, to remonstrate to the king against a method that subjected his Christian subjects to great inconveniences, and put them too much under the power of their implacable enemies^l.

Death of Donna Beatrix, queen of Castile, and an account of her children. AT the very opening of the ensuing year, Don Ferdinand took the field in person, having several points of importance in view. In the first place he ordered the bishop of Placentia to make himself master of Truxillo, a place of great consequence, at the distance of ten leagues from Merida, which he performed. He next charged Don Pedro Gonzales, grand master of the order of St. James, to reduce Montial; with its district: this likewise being performed in time, the king appointed those detachments to join his army, at a certain place, and, when the Moors least expected it, invested Ubeda, a city which had been often attempted, but in vain, and which commanded a country as fertile in wine, corn, oil, and fruits, as any in Spain. The Moors made a long and gallant defence, in hopes the king of Seville would have relieved them; but he was so humbled and so disabled by his late defeat, that he could do nothing; so that, on Michaelmas day, that valuable city was surrendered^m. While the king lay before this place, he lost his dear consort Donna Beatrix, who died at Toro, and left

THIS loss seems to have affected the king so much, that he was not in the field all the next year, and there was but little done for that reason; but a great design was contrived, ^{The great scheme formed for reducing the city of Cordova, and its consequences.} which the next year was carried into execution. In the course of various expeditions, the Castilians had taken prisoners a considerable number of those soldiers, who, by their own countrymen, were stiled Almogaraves, i. e. Invalids, who were generally put into garrisons; and this might probably be one reason why their places were so well defended. But no care being taken to ransom them, these old men took it so ill, that they began to insinuate to some of the Christian officers, that the great city of Cordova had but a small garrison, the care of it being chiefly trusted to the inhabitants, who were very remiss, and that consequently it might be easily surprized. Measures for this purpose being concerted, a small body of horse and foot marched in a dark and rainy night, being that of the eighth of January, scaled the walls, and possessed themselves of one of the suburbs, in which they barricaded themselves, and kept it in spite of all that the Moors in the city could do, notwithstanding they were often attacked^o. Don Alvaro Perez no sooner received news of their success, than he marched to relieve them, with all the troops under his command, which prevented the Moors from driving them out of the posts they had taken, but was of no consequence towards reducing the city, which was both strong and populous^p. The king, Don Ferdinand, apprized of their situation, and of the great importance of this bold attempt, set out immediately from Benevente, with a few of the nobility that were about him, ordering troops to be sent after him as fast as they could be raised, and took post at the bridge of Alcala.

THE Moors in Cordova, having an exact account of these proceedings, sent deputies to Aben-Hut, requesting him to lose no time in marching to their relief, as the king's army was very inconsiderable, and that, upon his retreat, those in the suburbs must be obliged to surrender. This monarch, well knowing the value of Cordova, assembled the whole force of his dominions, and, if he had marched with them, must have done his business without striking a blow; but, by using too much caution, he lost his opportunity, and soon after his life^q (A). As soon as the season would permit, the troops of the prelates, nobles, and of the several military orders, gradually arrived in the camp of Don Ferdinand, by which he quickly found himself strong enough to quit the post he had taken, and to invest Cordova; the inhabitants of which city, finding themselves much straitened for provisions, intimidated by the death of king Aben-Hut, and having no succour to expect, at length desired a capitulation, and, upon being permitted to march out freely, and go where they pleased, surrendered on the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, on the twenty-ninth of June, in the year one thousand two hundred and thirty-six^r (B). The settling every thing that regarded

(A) This Moorish prince was an able statesman, and a good officer; but the situation of his affairs, at the time that the people of Cordova demanded his assistance, embarrassed him extremely. He could not conceive how so potent a monarch as the king of Castile could advance so far into an enemy's country, with so small a body of troops; and therefore he sent for Don Lorenzo Suarez, who had served him from the time that Don Ferdinand expelled him out of Galicia, and proposed to him that he should go and examine the Christian camp in the night, and bring him such an account as he could depend upon. Don Lorenzo accepted the proposal; went privately into the camp, and sent the king word that Don Lorenzo Suarez had somewhat of importance to communicate to him. He sent for him, and asked him sternly how he durst appear in his presence? Don Lorenzo answered him, that he hoped the service he was about to render him would cancel his former faults. He then informed him what force Aben-Hut had about him, and to how great danger himself was exposed; promised to report his army much more numerous than it was, and advised him to keep a very strict guard for the future. On his return, Aben-Hut received very pressing letters from Zaen, king of Valentia, whose capital was on the point of falling into the hands of the king of Arragon. Upon the report, therefore, of Don Lorenzo, he chose to march first to the relief of this prince, and, with the assistance of his forces, to attempt the relief of Cordova. In his march, he was invited by Aben-Ramin, his favourite, whom he had made governor of Almeria, to honour that place with his presence. There he was splendidly feasted, after which, retiring to the bath, he was there stifled by Aben-Ramin's order. As soon as his death was known, the army disbanded, which gave Don Lorenzo Suarez an opportunity of going away with his squadron of horse to the Christian army (1). The death of Aben-Hut at this juncture was attended with the most fatal consequences to the Moors, and seems to have been the principal cause of the heavy losses they sustained.

(B) Amongst other things found in Cordova, were the bells that had been carried away when Almanzor plun-garded this important conquest, cost the king so much time, that it was the month of September before he found himself at liberty to return to Toledo, where he found the good old archbishop Roderic just arrived from Rome, where he had been to solicit the rights of his church against that of St. James of Compostella, the popes having very wisely declined to determine the long depending suit between these sees for the primacy; which, as it served to flatter the power, so it turned likewise to the profit, of these ecclesiastical sovereigns; and therefore we need not wonder that they proceeded at leisure, and would precipitate nothing in a matter of such consequence.

Marries a second time the daughter of the Count de Ponthieu.

A. D. 1237.

THE queen mother, Donna Berengara, reflecting very prudently on the inconveniencies that might attend the king's remaining a widower in the prime of his age, by the advice of her sister the queen of France, negotiated a marriage for him with the lady Jane, daughter to Simon count de Pontbieu, merely on account of the great reputation she was in for the purity of her manners and the sweetness of her temper. This marriage, which was celebrated at Bourdeaux, and the renewing the league with the king of Navarre, took up the whole of this year, in which the forces of Castile remained in winter quarters and garrisons, without undertaking any thing of importance, and this without any prejudice to the affairs of the Christians, those of the Moors being fallen into such confusion, that they were in no condition of seizing even a greater advantage (C). The next year, in all probability, would have been remarkable for action, if a famine had not broke out at Cordova, which might have had fatal consequences, if the king, who kept his Easter at Valladolid, had not taken care to send a large supply of provisions, together with a considerable sum in ready money. In the autumn he made a tour himself to Toledo, and from thence to the frontiers, from whence he made some excursions into the territory of Jaen, to which city, if he had not found it so strong, he intended to have laid siege.

1238. AT the opening of the ensuing spring died Don Alvaro Perez de Castro, grandson of Don Don Diego de Haro revolts Pedro Fernandez, of the same family, who had been expelled Castile by Don Alonso; and dered Compostella, brought thither upon the shoulders of Christian captives, and which had been used as lamps in the Turkish mosque. These Don Ferdinand obliged his prisoners to carry back upon their shoulders, cleansed and purified that stately building, and caused divine service to be celebrated there, to the glory of God, and to the inexpressible joy, not only of his own subjects, but of all the Christians in Spain (2). The bishop of Tuy, who concludes his chronicle with this great event, assures us, that it was chiefly owing to the activity and spirit of Don Ferdinand, who came thither at first with no more than 100 men; and finding that the city received continual supplies over the bridge, passed the rapid river of Guadaluquivir with the utmost hazard of his person; and taking post on the other side, cut off those supplies. He likewise observes that unusual rains falling in that season, raised the rivers and brooks so high, that the troops marching to his assistance from different parts of his dominions were exceedingly delayed; so that, as he very prudently remarks, it ought to be ascribed to the special providence of God, that an enterprise, so well contrived and so vigorously executed, did not from these sinister accidents become abortive; which if it had, the consequences might have proved no less dangerous to the Christians, than, as they fell out, they proved destructive to the Moors (3). This prelate was a man of sincere piety, and of very extensive learning, for the times in which he lived; in his youth he had travelled through Italy and the Holy Land; and in the latter part of his life was highly esteemed by that pious and prudent princess queen Berengara, at whose instance he composed several large works, and amongst the rest his chronicle (4), to which we have been so much obliged.

(C) The respite which the king of Castile gave to the Moors, after the recovery of Cordova, turned almost as much to their disadvantage as the blow given to their power by depriving them of their place; but before we explain this, it may not be improper to mention the reason which induced Don Ferdinand to make a tour into the northern parts of his dominions at this time. The bishop of Palencia, it seems, had discovered certain hereticks in his diocese, proceeded against them with that violence which was just come into fashion, and condemned such as could not be frightened into dissimulation to the stake (5). This was thought a point of such importance, that the king was present; and, to shew his profound submission to the flaming zeal of the church, he condescended, as the Spanish historians say, to light the fire, by which they suffered, with his own hands; and for this, the only cruel action of his life, they pretend he was reputed a saint. But let us now return to the Moors. The death of king Aben-Hut, the loss of Cordova to the king of Castile, and Valencia to the king of Arragon, threw them into grievous confusions, as their being now detached from the Moors of Africa left them, in a manner, without resource. The inhabitants of Seville formed themselves into a republic, and appointed one Tasar for their chief magistrate; nor is there any thing improbable in supposing that other cities would have taken the same step, if Mohammed Al-hamar, by his superior abilities, had not prevented it (6). His history is inserted in its proper place; and therefore here we shall conclude with observing, that the Moors had still strength enough to have made a great stand, and to have preserved the most fruitful and pleasant part of Spain, if they could have united under this prince; and, on the other hand, if he had remained only master of the town of Aronja, which was the place of his birth, and the first that he seized, they could never have made any stand at all, but must have been presently over-run by the armies of Castile, Arragon, and Portugal. The true, though concealed, source of their ruin, was the universal corruption of their manners, that spirit of ambition and perfidy which reigned amongst the great, and that giddiness among the people, which was diffused by the pernicious practices and base examples of their chiefs, who made no scruple of sacrificing the public interest to their private advantage.

- a not long after him died Don Lopez de Haro, governor of Baeza, whose son, Don Diego, ^{from the king of Castile, and is quickly reduced.} because the king did not give him his father's government, took up arms, was reconciled to the king by the Infant Don Alonso his son, broke out into rebellion again, and, being beat in the field by that young prince, and reduced to great straits, fled privately to the king, and threw himself at his feet, with such visible marks of sincere repentance, that the king restored him to his favour, and to his former employments, to which he added the government of *Alcaraz. There happened this year, on Friday the third of June, as all the antient chronicles of Spain agree, a great eclipse of the sun[†]. The old archbishop of Toledo was in the field all the autumn, or at least the troops in his pay, who repelled the Moors that were attempting to creep into possession again of most of the places that prelate had taken. The next spring the king was early at Cordova, took the field with a numerous army, and made many conquests, but they were such as cost no blood; for the people, being afraid of his forces, and seeing none of the Moorish princes strong enough to defend them, submitted upon the promise of being well used, moderately taxed, and allowed the free exercise of their religion[‡].

- THE great extent of country which had been added to his dominions, in the space of a few years, obliged Don Ferdinand to act with much caution, and hindered him from being so alert in his expeditions as in times past. He saw that it was to no purpose to waste his troops in subduing places which he must be afterwards forced to abandon, and leave his successors subject to the trouble of taking them again; for which reason he laboured all that in him lay to preserve a line of regular fortifications, and, by the promise of lands, immunities, and other advantages, drew multitudes from all parts to settle in the towns and villages that were behind that line[§]. The Moors, during that space of time, in which he was thus employed, neglected nothing that might contribute to restore their affairs, except the only method that could have been effectual, which was a general confederacy. This was at length perceived by the king of Granada, who invited his neighbour the king of Murcia to enter into a league with him, offensive and defensive, which that king, however, declined; and gave this reason for it, that very probably this might incense the king of Castile, who was infinitely more able to conquer than the other was to protect his dominions; which answer, tho' well founded, gave such offence to the king of Granada, that he began to raise forces, and to think of making war upon the prince who had rejected his alliance; of which the sovereign of Murcia had no sooner intelligence, than he dispatched ambassadors to Don Ferdinand, and desired to be taken under his protection^{||}. The king of Castile doubted of the sincerity of this proposition, and therefore ordered the ambassadors to return to their master, and to bring his final resolution to the young prince Don Alonso, who, with a corps of troops, should advance to the frontiers, to support him if there should be occasion. Upon their return and repeating the same demand, Don Alonso prosecuted his march into the kingdom of Murcia, of which and of the capital he took possession, in the name and on the behalf of his father, who assembled a good army at Toledo, where his son joined him as soon as this service was performed[¶].

The king of Murcia submits and pays homage to Don Ferdinand of Castile.

- c THEY returned early the next year to the field, the king repairing to the frontiers of Andalusia, and the infant Alonso into Murcia. The king of Granada beat a corps of troops commanded by a Castilian officer, but was not able to prevent Don Ferdinand from ravaging all the country as far as his capital, to which he laid siege, but without effect; the Moors receiving a great supply from Africa[‡]. The old archbishop Roderic went this year again to Rome, to solicit his suit. The city of Jaen, once the seat of a Moorish monarchy, but now dependent upon that of Granada, had been long the object of the king Don Ferdinand's attention, which, tho' he laboured to disguise, could not, however, be hid from its present possessor, who always took care to keep it in a good state of defence, with a numerous garrison, and well supplied with provisons. The king of Castile ravaged all the country about it this spring, with a full resolution to besiege it before the close of the year. From this expedition he returned to Cordova, and from thence went to meet his mother queen Berengara, who came to confer with him on the affairs of Castile[¶]. Upon her return to Burgos, the king went back to the frontiers; and as soon as his forces were assembled, in the autumn invested Jaen, and, contrary to the opinion of most of his generals, continued the siege through the winter.

That monarch, after laying waste the country about it, besieges the city of Jaen. 1244.

The place made a vigorous and obstinate defence, and the king of Granada was often in the field with his forces, in order to relieve it; but Don Ferdinand was so much upon his

guard, and took care to have his army so well supplied, that the Moor, notwithstanding all his vigilance, met with repeated disappointments; which, though he was a wise and brave prince, humbled him so much, that he came at length to a sudden and strange resolution^f. He sent a person of distinction to the king, Don Ferdinand, and offered to become his vassal, in case they could agree upon the terms; upon which he proposed to confer with him in person, in case he would send him a safe-conduct. Don Ferdinand accepted the proposition; upon which the Moorish monarch, Aben-Albamar, came to his camp, kissed his hand, which, according to the ceremonial of those days, was a mark of vassalage, consented to deliver up Jaen, to pay him an annual tribute of fifty thousand pieces of gold, and to serve in his armies with a corps of auxiliaries, whenever it should be required. On the other hand, the king of Castile stipulated his protection in all cases, and against all persons, together with the guarantee of whatever he possessed. These articles settled, the city of Jaen was delivered into his hands: the king took possession of it about the middle of April, after a siege of eight months^g. This glorious success of his arms excited in the monarch of Castile a fervent desire, attended with a strong hope, of reducing Seville; an enterprize, however, of great difficulty, and which demanded therefore much circumspection (D). In order to facilitate this, the king took the field in the autumn, ravaged all the country adjacent to that city, and reduced several places, Albamar king of Granada serving in his army. At the close of the campaign he had the melancholy news of the death of his mother Donna Berengara, which happened at Burgos November the 8th, in the year 1246, which gave him very great and very just concern^h.

THE king being fully satisfied that treasure was as necessary as troops in the execution of great projects, demanded of the pope a bull for levying the third of the tenths of his clergy throughout his dominions, for the carrying on this war against the Infidels, which he obtainedⁱ. He passed the interval of time, between the putting his troops into winter-quarters and bringing them again into the field at Cordova, in seeing all the necessary preparations made under his eyes, and, amongst other precautions, he took that most necessary step of having a good fleet, at least for those times, without which he could have done nothing. This was built and equipped under the direction, and put to sea under the orders, of Raymond Boniface, an officer of note in those times, and whom, for this purpose, the king took into his pay^k.

Besieges the city of Seville by land, and at the same time blocks it up by sea.

THIS fleet of his, for so it might be well called in those days, consisted of thirteen large ships, and of several of a small size, with which he repaired to the mouth of the river Guadalquivir, and found in the port of St. Lucur a stout fleet from Barbary, with supplies of all kinds on board. The king, Don Ferdinand, having a numerous army, part of which was composed of Moorish troops under Albamar, was very active all this time by land, made himself master of several towns and fortresses, and had, by degrees, blocked up the place^l. As soon as he heard, therefore, that his fleet was at the mouth of the river, he sent a strong detachment to facilitate its coming up; but the Moors sallied with so superior a force, that the troops were obliged to return without attempting any thing. Raymond Boniface, trusting then entirely to his own strength, attacked the African fleet with great spirit and resolution, and having beat and destroyed them, entered the port, and passed up the river^m. The king, Don Ferdinand, then disposed every thing to attack the Moors encamped upon

(D) We propose in this note to say somewhat of that famous prelate, Don Roderic Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, to whom all Spain was so much obliged while living, and whose writings will be a lasting monument to the glory of his countrymen, as long as any regard for history shall remain (7). He was by birth of a very noble family in the kingdom of Navarre, received, in consequence of that, a liberal and learned education, which raised him to the archbishoprick of Toledo, A. D. 1208 (8). In his station he acted with great dignity, piety, and firmness. He was often in the field against the Moors, particularly in the great battle of Toloso. He was immoveably attached to the royal family, and exceedingly tenacious of the rights of his church, which disposition is thought to have hastened his death; for, in his contest with the archbishop of Tarragona, for the primacy of Spain, who went once so far as to excommunicate him, he found himself obliged to apply himself to pope Innocent IV. in the council of Lyons, whither, though bending under a load of years and infirmities, he actually went; but being seized with a grievous distemper in his return, he died on board a vessel that carried him down the Rhone, August 9, 1245 (9). His history of the Spanish affairs, in nine books, ends with the king's second marriage: he wrote, besides, the history of the Ostrogoths, of the Huns, Vandals, &c. the history of the Arabs, from A. D. 570 to 1150; as also the history of the Romans, from the reign of Janus to the year A. U. C. 708 (10). All of them in great esteem, but more especially his history of Spain and of the Arabs (11).

a the mole; but they abandoned their posts, and retired into the place, which was completely invested. The king began the siege in form, on the twentieth of August, and it lasted all the winter, which shews how much the manner of making war was altered from what it had been; for it is particularly recorded, that the army was so regularly disposed, so thoroughly secured from the injuries of weather, and so amply supplied with all sorts of provision, that it seemed rather the suburbs of a vast city, than the transitory station of troops in the fieldⁿ.

At the opening of the spring, the queen came to pay her husband a visit: in the month of March arrived the Infant Don Alonso, his son, Don Lopez de Haro, with the flower of the troops of Biscay, and, last of all, the archbishop of Compostella, with the forces of Galicia, in excellent order^o. On the first of May Don Raymond Boniface broke the bridge of boats between Triana and Alfarach, which cut off the communication they had with places on the other side of the river, as the king had before put an end to their communication through the mountains. On the twenty-third of November the place surrendered, upon condition that the people should retire out of it with all their effects; and the king made his public entry with the Infant Don Alonso, his brother, on one hand, and the Infant Don Alonso, his son, on the other^p. The remainder of that and part of the next year was spent in purifying the churches, repairing the city, and in all possible endeavours to repeople it. About this time also, it is probable, that the Infant Don Alonso espoused Donna Roland, daughter to the king of Arragon, and the progress of the war seemed to have been suspended^q.

c But in the succeeding year, the king, though his health began to be impaired through a long series of fatigues, caused his army to take the field early, and swept all the places that still remained to the Moors, between Seville and the fall of the Guadalquivir into the sea; which was not barely with a view to extend his territories, but to facilitate a glorious enterprise he meditated, and which, if it ever entered into the thoughts, was never in the power, of his predecessors. This was no less than a hostile descent upon the coast of Africk, for which Don Raymond Boniface had orders to augment the fleet, and was supplied with every thing necessary for that purpose^r. The Infant Don Alonso, the king's eldest son, about this time, took the cross, on the news of St. Lewis's misfortunes in the Holy Land, and this notwithstanding the king his father was about to attack the Infidels in their own dominions^s.

d He was so much in earnest in this design, that it appears from the testimony of an eminent English historian, who quotes his own letters, that he warmly solicited Henry the third to concur with him in that expedition, which, he believed, would be equally honourable for the Christian cause, and for the Spanish and English nations^t. His younger brother, the Infant Don Sancho, with the consent of the pope, was this year chosen archbishop of Toledo^u. The preparations for the designed invasion were vigorously carried on, though the increase of the king's infirmities delayed the execution; at length Don Raymond failed to reconnoitre the coast of Africk; and in his passage met the Moorish fleet that cruized upon the coast, in order to protect it, and, after a smart engagement, in which there was considerable loss on both sides, he sunk several of the enemy's ships, and obliged them to retire in disorder into their own ports, for which, at his return, he was highly carested by the king, to whom this success at sea was particularly pleasing^v.

e But though the satisfaction arising from this victory might, in some measure, calm the mind and raise the spirits of the king, yet it could not cure the dropfy, under which he laboured, and which gradually brought him so low, that he plainly perceived he was drawing towards his end; for which he made such preparations as equally became a great king and a good Christian. He settled all the affairs of state in the best manner he was able; recommended his queen, his brother, and his children, to the Infant Don Alonso his successor; exhorted him to govern with moderation, and not to load his subjects with taxes^w. When he had done this, he ordered all ensigns of royalty to be removed, and commanded that he should be no longer treated as a king, but as an humbled Christian, employed in the great and necessary work of making his peace with his Creator^x; and, in this excellent disposition of mind, breathed his last, on the 30th of May, in the year 1252. His body was soon after buried with great solemnity in the cathedral church of Seville^y. He was,

But a dropfy carries him to his grave, while he meditated this design.

Don Alonso the tenth, who, for his learning and love of learned men, was surnamed the wife, succeeded his father, with the general approbation of the people, who considered him as a prince of great qualities, and remarkable generosity ^b. Aben-Alhamar, king of Granada, and Aben-Afon, sovereign of Niebla, which lies at no great distance from Seville, and is at present a place of little or no consequence, became his vassals, and sent their ambassadors to do him homage ^c. He broke in the first year of his reign with Henry the third of England, upon pretence of his having a better right than that prince to Gascony, into which country he sent an army, under the command of Don Gascon, count of Berne, who was excommunicated by the pope for troubling a prince who had already taken the cross ^d. At the same time Don Alonso prosecuted, at a large expence, that expedition which his father had in view against the Moors in Barbary, and these expences exhausted his coffers to such a degree, that he was obliged to debase his coin; which, as it usually happens, raised the price of all things, to such a degree, as occasioned great murmuring amongst the people ^e. The next year king Henry of England sent the bishop of Bath and Dr. John Mansell, his chaplain, to negotiate a peace, which was soon after concluded, on condition that prince Edward, son and heir apparent of the king of England, should marry Donna Eleonora, the king of Castile's sister, in consideration of which the king would recede for the future from his claim to Gascony ^f. The preparations for the expedition to Barbary still went on, and the pope, in order to facilitate it, granted a crusade, and the same bull for levying an aid upon the clergy which had been granted to his father ^g (E). Don Alonso, king of Portugal, having committed some hostilities against Mohammed Aben-Afen, king of Niebla, the monarch of Castile interposed on his behalf, and, in a short time also, this quarrel was compromised.

HITHERTO Don Alonso had continued in Andalusia and on the frontiers, but he now thought proper to visit Toledo, where the king of Granada did him homage ^h; and, after conferring great privileges on the university of Salamanca, he proceeded to Burgos, where the marriage between prince Edward of England and the Infanta Donna Eleonora was celebrated with all imaginable solemnity, and at a vast expence; and, at the same time, he conferred on that young prince the order of knighthood ⁱ. The king likewise bestowed in marriage his natural daughter Donna Beatrice de Guzman on the king of Portugal, and with her, by way of dowry, he gave the country of Algarve ^k. The Moors upon the frontiers shewed a general inclination to revolt, but those who were intrusted with the care of that country quickly reduced them. It was the misfortune of this king, that he was equally ready in forming great enterprizes and slow in the execution of them. The preparations for his African expedition went on, and with it the diminishing of the coin, tho' it produced daily new confusions; and tho' this was sufficient to embarrass the monarch of Castile, yet he embarked soon after in schemes that brought him into farther difficulties ^l. He was desirous of availing himself of the claim derived from his mother of the duchy of Suabia; and having, on this account, some negotiation with the princes of Germany, he was induced to aim at the imperial dignity, in which he had for his competitor Richard earl of Cornwall, brother to king Henry the third of England; which vain pursuit of both princes cost

(E) The Spanish historians are ready enough to commend their princes; and it may be said of them in general, that they are at least content to do them justice: but, however, there are some few instances of the contrary; and we find the author of the chronicle of this prince's reign, one of the most remarkable in that respect. He charges this monarch with an inclination to repudiate his queen, under colour of sterility, and with contracting a marriage with a princess of Denmark, who actually came to Spain, but just as she came, the queen proved with child; upon which, the king, to make the princess some amends, married her to his brother the Infant Don Philip, who had been archbishop of Seville; all which we have good reason to believe were downright calumnies. For it is certain, that the queen Donna Toland had an Infanta before this time, which excludes all pretence of barrenness; that Christopher the first king of Denmark had no such daughter; and that the Infant Don Philip was archbishop, and unmarried

A. D. 1257: the same author says, that the king Don Alonso had had disputes with his father-in-law, the king of Navarre, of which no traces are to be found elsewhere, and is repugnant to the current of history. To all this he adds, that he had in view the conquest of the kingdom of Navarre. This notion certainly arose from his marching troops through that kingdom, which, for want of knowing the occasion, this writer concluded a mark of hostility, whereas, in fact, the king of Castile demanded a passage for these forces into Gascony, where they were to act against the king of England, in support of Don Alonso's claim to that country, which he afterwards relinquished, upon the marriage of prince Edward with the Infanta Donna Eleonora. These points, though important enough in themselves, would scarce have deserved notice here, if they had not, upon the credit of this author, and without due examination, found a place in the general histories of Spain, and imposed thereby upon posterity.

a them immense sums of money, and involved them in endless scenes of trouble, without any other advantage than that of bearing the lofty title of emperor amongst the princes of their own party^a.

It was in prosecution of this quarrel, that he postponed the expedition to Africa, and turned his views to Italy, where, by the help of that money for which he ransacked his subjects, he had gained several princes and states to approve his title; but, after all his trouble and expence, this new expedition was laid aside, on account of some domestic disturbances. These at last rose to such a height, that the Infant Don Henry took up arms against his brother, and drew in Mohammed Aben-Afen to join with him; but the Infant being defeated in a battle by count Nugnes de Lara, found himself under a necessity of seeking refuge in Africa, where, for some years, he remained at the court of Tunis.¹²⁵⁷ As for the little king of Niebla, Don Alonso besieged him in his capital; and, though the place was very strong, and he made a long and obstinate defence, yet he was forced at length to have recourse to a capitulation; and, to preserve his liberty, parted with almost all his dominions^o. ^{The Moorish prince of Niebla reduced by Don Alonso, and deprived.}

AMONGST other great and noble designs of the late Don Ferdinand, there was one which remained incomplete at his death; and this was making a general collection of the laws made by himself and his predecessors, and digesting them under proper titles, which was completed by his son, and is that celebrated code, intituled, Las Partidas^p. He also redressed that confusion in law proceedings, which was occasioned by the intermixing Latin with the vulgar tongue; which he corrected, by obliging his subjects to use their own language in pieces of that kind (F). His love for learning, and his desire of promoting the science of astronomy, of which he was passionately fond, engaged him in an intercourse with the Soltan of Egypt, to whom he sent, and from whom he received, an ambassador^q. But while his thoughts were wholly occupied by things of this nature, and the prosecution of his claim to the empire, he found himself on a sudden involved in a scene of troubles, A. D. 1260: so much the more perplexing, as they were wholly unexpected; this was occasioned by the intrigues of the Moors, who, finding themselves under far greater hardships, and, at the same time, observing that measures were not conducted with that steadiness as in the former reign, meditated a general revolt. Though this required much deliberation, and extensive communication of councils, yet it was managed with so great secrecy, that Don Alonso had scarce any intelligence of this contrivance till it broke out^r. ^{The king's care of justice and great affection for learning.}

THE chiefs were Mohammed Aben-Hut, king of Murcia, and Mohammed Alcadila Albamar, king of Granada: these had privately demanded the assistance of Aben-Joseph, king of Fez and Morocco, who willingly consented to their request, upon condition that some ports were put into his hands for the security of the auxiliaries that he undertook to send^s. The king of Murcia declared first, by making inroads into the Christian territories, and recovering most of his castles which were garrisoned on the behalf of the king of Castile; and soon after the monarch of Granada took his share in the war, which, though Don Alonso had great reason to resent, yet he laboured to reclaim him by negotiation, if it had been practicable; for he had still the German election at heart, which was the true source of all his misfortunes, and, for the sake of the empty title of king of the Romans, he would not take those vigorous measures that would have made him a great king in Spain. At length, however, having taken the necessary steps to engage his father-in-law, the king of Arragon, to concur in repressing the Moors; and having dispatched ambassadors to solicit pope Urban the fourth on his darling point of the election, he set out for the frontiers; and, having lawyers might be summoned by Don Ferdinand, and directed to frame a body of laws; and this being a work of time, might be likewise charged to hear and decide appeals from the superior courts. At this time, though they were completed and received by Don Alonso, yet they had not the royal sanction, but some space was allowed for reviewing and considering them, that, in a matter of such vast consequence, there might be nothing of hurry, or any speedy necessity of amendment, which the king very prudently foresaw would destroy their credit, and defeat the end of this learned and laborious collection.

(F) It is believed, that the original design of the king Don Ferdinand, in assembling so many persons learned in the laws in his court, was with a view to this great and important work; neither is it at all improbable, that the first notion of it might proceed from the excuses of inferior judges, when questioned for their decisions in superior courts, that they proceeded according to the customs established in their province. For the reader, to have a just idea of these regulations, must understand that, before the institution of the royal audience at Castile, the chief tribunals in every province received appeals from inferior jurisdictions. Upon the representation therefore of these superior courts, those able

THIS obliged the two Moorish princes to join their forces, which, when they had done, they marched towards Don Alonso, and gave him battle. But that prince, who wanted none of the qualities requisite to adorn a crown, except steadiness only, disposed his forces with so much judgment, gave his orders with such presence of mind, and distinguished himself with such acts of personal courage, that the Moors were totally defeated, obliged to abandon the field, and shut themselves up in their strong places^u. In the winter he appointed commissioners to settle with those of the king of Arragon the limits between the two kingdoms, that no future grounds of dispute might arise between themselves or successors^w. This year the pope, in the plenitude of his power, thought fit to impose a b heavy tax upon the clergy of Spain, for the support of the emperor of Constantinople; upon which they sent an agent to Rome to let this successor of St. Peter know, that, being engaged in a war with the Mohammedans at home, they desired to be excused from so heavy and so extraordinary a burthen, with which the pontif was not a little displeased^x. The next spring the king was early in the field, with an army superior to that which he commanded the year before; upon which the Moors sent to Aben-Joseph king of Morocco, to let him know, that if his succours did not speedily arrive, the Mohammedans in Spain were for ever undone; upon which he sent over immediately ten thousand horse; which considerable supply did not, however, enable these princes to take the field to cover their own dominions, much less to act offensively^y.

ON the contrary the king Don Alonso invested Xerez, and after a long siege, upon intelligence that Aben-Joseph meant to come in person into Spain, with a prodigious army, the king granted them a favourable capitulation, to retire where-ever they thought proper^z.
This capitulation being punctually performed, the inhabitants at Bejar, Sidonia, Rota, St.
Lucar, Lebrija, and Arcos, saved the king the trouble of coming before them, and left all those places empty, which in a manner swallowed up the king's army, as it scarce sufficed to settle all these places and Porte St. Mary's, which the king ordered to be repaired^a. The next year the limits between Castile and Portugal were adjusted, to which crown Don Alonso yielded Algarve intirely, except reserving a band of fifty lances to be sent to his army whenever it took the field^b.

Alonso.

As the German empire had suffered extremely (though perhaps particular princes might be gainers) by its having nominally two heads, though being in effect without any, great pains were taken to engage them both to resign, which Don Alonso would not endure, for the title of emperor had great charms for him, and notwithstanding all the money and trouble it had cost, he would not hear of quitting it^c. The two alcajds of Malaga and Guadix, taking offence at the great complaisance of the king of Granada to the officers who commanded the African troops, revolted, and put themselves under the protection of the crown of Castile, and in conjunction with Don Nugnez de Lara, distressed their old master to such a degree, that he caused it to be intimated to Don Alonso, that he was willing to return to his allegiance, if his submission might be received upon easy terms. The king e sent him word, that if he was in earnest he should meet him at Alcala Real; and, which shews how high the character of this prince stood, the Moor, upon his bare promise, notwithstanding all that had passed, went thither, and submitted to the terms he prescribed, and abandoned his confederate the king of Murcia^d. In the mean time, the king of Arragon made an absolute conquest of that kingdom, or at least of the greatest part of it, not for himself, but on the behalf of his son-in-law, to whom he immediately gave advice of his success, and desired him to send thither a corps of troops sufficient to secure it.
Don Alonso marched in person from Seville with his army, and on the frontiers met the king of Murcia, who threw himself upon his knees at his feet, and sued to him for his pardon^e. The king told him, that, for his life or liberty, he had nothing to fear, but that f he could not expect he should put into his hands a second time the power of hurting him.

THE king then left the Infant Don Manuel governor of Murcia, and obliging the Moors to quit all the strong places, repeopled them with subjects of his own, or with those of the king of Arragon; and thus, in a short time, and with as little effusion of blood as possible, he put an end, at least for the present, to a very formidable conspiracy, and might, if he would have declined all thoughts of Germany, have recovered his former reputation, restored

- a the grandeur of his crown, and peace to his subjects^f. The same year the Infant Don Ferdinand of Castile espoused, by proxy, the princess Blanche, daughter to St. Lewis, on the eighth of September, at St. Germain en Laye^g. The cause between the two kings of the Romans was still depending at Rome, where Don Alonso laboured by every method possible to support what he called his right, and this at a vast expence, notwithstanding that his ambassador, the bishop of Silves, had been murdered in his passage by some banditti, who took his papers from him^h; on the other hand, the princes of Germany, sick of their own schemes, and perceiving the real necessity of having a chief, had agreed with the king of Bohemia to proceed to a new election; but this the pope, who pretended a right to declare which of the two was the true king of the Romans, vehemently opposedⁱ. The next year
- b was signalized by the most pompous marriage that till then had been seen in Spain; prince Philip, heir apparent of the crown of France, conducted his sister the princess Blanche to Burgos, where she espoused the Infant Don Ferdinand, in the presence of all the royal family of Spain^k, the king of Arragon, and, as some say, prince Edward of England, and the empress of Constantinople; but those who are best acquainted with the history will be perhaps of opinion, that these great names are only brought to fill up the scene^l.

- THE Infant Don Sancho of Arragon, being consecrated archbishop of Toledo, soon after celebrated his first mass with great ceremony, in the presence of the two kings, his father, and his brother-in-law^m. After these fine shews, both monarchs, as if it had been by concert, entered upon schemes diametrically opposite to the prudence for which they were both famous. The king of Arragon, though much in years, would needs go to the Holy Land, though Don Alonso did all that was in his power to dissuade him. On the other hand, this monarch himself was as much bent on a voyage to Italy to as little purpose; but in the end both their schemes proved abortive. The king of Arragon met with a storm at sea, which drove him to France, from whence he returned into his own dominions, and was content to stay thereⁿ. As for Don Alonso, the states of Castile interposed, when he was ready to set out, and represented the inconveniences that would attend his leaving the kingdom at that juncture in so strong a light, that he wisely, though unwillingly, dropped his design^o. He persisted, however, against all advice, in remitting, as some Spanish historians say, the homage due from the crown of Portugal to that of Leon, out of affection for his grandson, the Infant Denis, which excited, or at least gave a plausible colour to, those discontents that produced so many and so great troubles, and even shook the throne upon which he sat^p (G).

- THE king Don Alonso had still his voyage to Italy in his head, with a view to which he laboured, by every method he could devise, to raise money; but when he imagined that he had at length brought all things to bear, he was informed that many persons of the first rank, amongst whom were the Infant Don Philip, Don Nugnez de Lara, Don Lopez de Haro, Don Ferdinand de Castro, Don Lopez de Mendoza, and several others, had met together at the castle of Lara, in order to consider of grievances arising from his administration; the king, still fond of his journey, from which one would have imagined these news would have diverted him, instead of taking measures to chastise the malecontents, sent to know their demands, and promised to comply with whatever should be reasonable^q. Their answer was very artificial, and perfectly calculated to serve their purpose; for though

(G) This is one of those dark points in history which can never be so thoroughly settled as to leave an inquisitive and critical reader entirely free from doubts. It is admitted on both sides, that homage was due from the crown of Portugal to that of Leon, for the country of Algarve, which kingdom Don Alonso of Castile bestowed upon the monarch of Portugal, at the request, or at least with the consent, of pope Innocent the fourth, without considering that the princess was but twelve, and the king her husband upwards of forty, years of age. There was besides another untoward accident; the king of Portugal had another wife, Matilda, countess of Bloigne, and children also by her, which, though overlooked by one pope, drew upon the king an excommunication from another. He would not, however, part with his young wife, by whom he had his successor the Infant Denis, who, at this time, repaired to his grandfather, and begged of him a boon which he received. Here it is the historians differ. The Portuguese assert, that Don Alonso remitted the band of lances which he had reserved as a kind of homage for Algarve. On the other hand, the Spaniards as positively affirm, that this had been released before; and from thence infer, that the favour now done was relinquishing the homage due from the crown of Portugal, or at least that part of the kingdom which had been given to count Henry, who was the first sovereign of it. Ferreras urges it as a strong argument, and, in truth, so it seems to be, that this concession was the principal grievance alleged by the malecontents, and therefore must have been a matter of great importance. To this the only answer that can be given is, that malecontents do not always speak the truth, and therefore might possibly exaggerate the king's concession, and charge him with giving, upon this occasion, what, perhaps, he had never claimed. This is all we can tell the reader; and, having briefly stated the merits on both sides, he must decide for himself.

they had laid the scheme of their operations, they were in great want of money to carry a them into execution; they therefore informed the king that they had no intention to disturb his government or depart from their duty, but that they met together to concert the means for obtaining their appointments; and, upon this, the king weakly imagining that this would make them quiet, paid each of them the sum he demanded, which money they no sooner received, than they employed it in levying troops¹.

THE next thing they did, was to endeavour to engage the king of Navarre to enter into their league, in which they failed; but Don Nugnez de Lara persuaded the king of Granada to dispose all things for a rupture, and to demand succours from the king of Morocco. Alonso being informed of this, sent to them Don Juan de Lara, and the bishop of Cuenca, to let them know that he meant to summon the states at Burgos, and that if they had any complaints to make they would do well to appear there. The confederate lords accordingly met the king at Lerma, each at the head of his troops; but behaved towards him with all the exterior marks of duty and respect, and accompanied him to Burgos, but would not enter the city. There Don Alonso held the assembly of the states, and made new propositions to them, which they rejected, and, as the custom was in those times, demanded leave to quit his dominions, which they accordingly received². They then began to defile with their troops towards the kingdom of Granada; and though the queen sent the Infants Don Ferdinand and Don Sancho her sons, and the Infant Don Sancho, archbishop of Toledo, her brother, to persuade them to desist from this strange enterprize, it was in vain, and they continued their route; the king of Granada attacked the two governors of Malaga and Guadix, and Don Alonso declined supporting them, being still in hopes of making peace³. His competitor, Richard, earl of Cornwall, was dead, and his mind ran as strongly as ever upon the empire, though there was never less probability of his attaining it⁴.

At the request of the queen, he sent the grand master of Calatrava once more to the malecontents, with an offer to forget what was past, and to restore them to their employments and his favour. To this they answered, that before they could treat, he must do justice to their friend and king of Granada against his rebel governors. The king made a short and cool reply, that subjects had no right to prescribe to their sovereign whom he should protect⁵. In the mean time, the king of Granada attacked and beat the two alcaides; upon which Don Alonso disposed all things for a war, and having assembled the states at Almagro, he remitted some and moderated other taxes, which disposed them to make such returns of submission and loyalty, as left him no room to doubt that he should be able to do himself justice⁶. But at this juncture, having intelligence that Rodolph of Hapsburgh was elected emperor of Germany, he suddenly changed his measures, and renewed the peace with the king of Granada, notwithstanding all that was passed⁷.

In the mean

THE king of Arragon behaved upon this occasion like a wise prince and a faithful ally. He ordered the prince, his son, to assemble an army on the frontiers of Murcia, sent the bishop of Segorba to advise the malecontents to return to their duty, and to embrace the kind offers that had been made them by their sovereign; and upon their rejecting this proposition, he acquainted Don Alonso, that he would punctually perform his treaties, and act against all his enemies⁸. In this critical situation of things died Mohammed Abcadilla-Alhamar, which had like to have produced disturbances in Granada; but the Christian malecontents, and particularly Don Lopez de Haro, advanced his son Mohammed Albadic to the throne, and supported him, notwithstanding there was a strong faction formed against him in favour of one of his brothers⁹. Don Alonso was no sooner informed of this, than he sent a person of quality to make fresh propositions to the new king and to the malecontents, who received them civilly, and seemed to be out of countenance at the consideration of their own behaviour. The queen and the Infant Ferdinand being informed of this, invited them to a conference at Alcala, where all things were compromised, upon an assurance that the king would receive them kindly; and that, in consideration of a considerable sum of money, he would accept the new king of Granada, upon the same terms that his father had held the crown¹⁰.

THIS agreement being signed on both sides, was transmitted to the king, who ratified it with difficulty; and the king of Granada going to pay his respects to him at Seville, he not only performed punctually all that had been stipulated, but likewise conferred on him the order of knighthood with his own hand, which was then esteemed the highest obligation¹¹. At Burgos a general assembly was held of the states, where the Infant Don Philip and the malecontents were restored to favour; and at this time it was that the king caused the body of his predecessor Wamba to be removed from the obscure place where it was

But he had still the empire at heart; and this induced him to send ambassadors to the pope and council at Lyons, to dissuade that assembly from confirming the election of the emperor Rodolph. This had no effect; on the contrary, the pope not only confirmed the election, but wrote to the king of Castile to desist from all farther disturbances about his title; and, by way of gilding this bitter pill, he sent the king at the same time a bull, by which he permitted him to take the third part of the tenths of his clergy for six years^e. All this did not hinder the king from desiring an interview, which the pope could not now civilly decline, though he had done it before; and upon this, the king left his son the Infant Don Ferdinand regent, set out as soon as the assembly of the states separated for France, by the way of A. D. 1274.

THE departure of Don Alonso was no sooner known, than Mohammed Alhamir-Alboadic Mohammed, sent to Aben-Joseph, king of Morocco, a representation of the state of things, to shew how favourable an opportunity they had of recovering, at least, all Andalusia out of the hands ^{king of Granada, invites the Moors over from Africa.} of the Christians, since the king, who was incontestably the best officer in Spain, had withdrawn himself, which none of his predecessors ever did, conferring the regency on a young prince of no experience, and trusting the best fortresses in his kingdom in the hands of those who had been lately in rebellion, and in confederacy with him^g. Aben-Joseph, who was zealous for his religion, willingly promised him all that he demanded, on condition

c that the ports of Tariffa and Algezira, in the bay of Gibraltar, were put into his hands, directing him to dispose every thing for opening the campaign early, which he did with such profound dissimulation, availing himself therein of his former acquaintance with the Castilian officers, that the Christians had little or no suspicion of his design^h.

- In the spring, Aben-Joseph entered the bay of Gibraltar with his fleet, and 17,000 fine ^{Aben-Joseph} troops on board; and the king of Granada's alcaides, according to the orders they had ^{lands in Spain, and seats Don} received, put the places that were promised him into his handsⁱ. The troops were no ^{Nugnez de} sooner debarked, than Joseph sent a detachment to join the king of Granada, who imme- ^{Lara, who is} diately began his march towards Jaen, at the same time that the emperor of Morocco ^{Spain.} advanced to Cordova. Don Nugnez de Lara commanded in the little city of Ecija, from

The king having caused the body of Don Nugnez to be carefully sought out, cut off his head, and sent it in triumph to the king of Granada, who remembering his former friendship with that nobleman, and that to his assistance he owed the crown he wore, returned it to the Christians, that it might be buried with his body at Cordova^k. But notwithstanding this victory, the king of Morocco found his troops so roughly handled, that he spent the rest of the campaign in
- e ravaging the country about Seville, without undertaking any siege.

- THE forces of the king of Granada were at this time employed in plundering ^{The troops of} the country about Jaen, and against these marched the Infant Don Sancho, arch- ^{the king of} bishop of Toledo, with the bands of Madrid, Talavera, Alcala, Guadalaxara, Hueta and Guenca. On his arrival at Martos, he had intelligence that the Moors were at no great ^{Granada, rout} distance; and that, tho' they were very numerous, they were excessively fatigued, and embar- ^{the Castilians} rassed with a great booty of cattle, which induced him to follow them with his cavalry, without ^{and kill the} waiting for Don Lopez de Haro, who would have joined him the next day. This rashness cost him dear, his forces being defeated and himself killed^l. Don Lopez, who followed him with all imaginable expedition, met and preserved the flying remains of his army, and with
- f them and his own forces attacked the Moors, and recovered the cross of the archbishop out of their hands, but with difficulty, and so great loss, that he was able to undertake nothing more^m. The Infant Don Ferdinand began his march from Burgos with a small body of troops, and proceeded slowly, that the nobility might have time to join him, till he received an account of what had befallen Don Nugnez de Lara and the Infant Don Sancho, upon which he marched so hastily to Ciudad Real, that he contracted a fever, of which he died in a few days, recommending to his favourite Don Juan de Lara, the princess Blanche, and his two sons Don Alonso and Don Ferdinand de la Cerda, both very young, with whom, and the body of their father, Don Juan returned to *Burgos*ⁿ.

A stop put to the success of these Infidels by
Sancho.

THE Infant Don Sancho, the king's second son, on the news of his brother's misfortune, repaired to Ciudad Real, did all that could be expected from him to encourage the forces, and was quickly joined by Don Lopez de Haro, to whom, in the midst even of that confusion, he communicated the designs he had already formed of seizing the throne. He proceeded from Ciudad Real to Cordova, from whence he dispatched Don Lopez de Haro to Ecija, and the grand masters of St. James and Calatrava to Jaen; then leaving a good garrison in Cordova, under Don Ferdinand de Castro, he marched in person with the rest of his forces to Seville, where he equipped a strong fleet, which cruizing in the streights of Gibraltar, so alarmed the king of Morocco, that he retired with his army to Algezira. While things were in this state in Spain, the king Don Alonso was treating with the pope at Baucaire, where he endeavoured to persuade him that the election of the emperor Rodolph was void; and that, as he was ready to resign the kingdom of Castile to his son the Infant Don Ferdinand, there was nothing to hinder his going directly to Germany, and taking upon him the government. The pope being of quite another opinion, the king fell next on his pretensions to the duchy of Suabia, in right of his mother, to which the pontif was equally deaf. While the negotiation was in this awkward condition, came the news of the death of the two Infants, which so far awakened the king from his dreams, that he resolved to return immediately into Spain. He at the same time remitted money into Italy, for the use of his partizans there, and wrote to the king of Bohemia, and to the princes of Germany, desiring them to remain firm to his interest, and to rest assured that he had no thoughts of dropping his claim; and that, as soon as the affairs of Castile were settled, they might depend upon his coming amongst them; in which letters, he continued to use the imperial stile. This done, he returned with as much haste as possible into his dominions, by the same road he came into France, having spent immense sums of money, and obtained nothing.

Don Sancho
crown against

THE king, Don Alonso, being arrived at Alcala de Henares, and hearing wherever he passed prodigious encomiums of the Infant Don Sancho, sent for him from Seville; but that prince excused himself, under pretence that the then state of affairs made it improper for him to quit the frontiers; whereas, in reality, he was negotiating, by the assistance of Don Alonso de Guzman, a peace with the Moors, which he conceived absolutely necessary to the conducting his designs. Accordingly a truce being concluded, he set out for Toledo, to which city his father was come to meet him, and there the first proposal was made, that he should be declared heir apparent to the crown. It does not appear that Don Alonso was at all averse to this; but foreseeing the miseries that must attend a divided title, he was unwilling to act precipitately, or without good advice; and therefore directed an assembly of the states to be held at Segovia, to determine the right of succession, according to the laws of Spain. This assembly was accordingly held, and upon mature deliberation, and with the advice of the best lawyers of those times, the Infant Don Emanuel, the king's brother, pronounced the judgment of that assembly to be, that the Infant Don Ferdinand, dying in the life time of his father, the right of succession was clearly in the Infant Don Sancho.

poses in support

THE king, Don Alonso, seems to have been passive in this matter, or at most did no more than acquiesce in the judgment of the states. When that assembly broke up, he proceeded to Burgos, where he met with an ambassador from Philip the hardy, king of France, who demanded the restitution of the portion given with the princess Blanche, and that the right of her sons to the crown should be well secured. To this Don Alonso made a short answer, that the princess should enjoy her portion and dowry in Castile; that the states had adjudged the right of succession to the Infant Don Sancho; and that he did not conceive it by any means expedient, that the princess and her children should leave his dominions; on which the ambassador departed in great discontent. At his return to France, king Philip was so much offended at the report he made of his negotiation, that he began to dispose every thing for obtaining by the sword what had been refused to his intercession. It happened very fortunately, that at this time cardinal Julian, a native of Lisbon, being elected pope, and assuming the name of John the twenty-first, interfered warmly between the two kings, and even threatened with excommunication and interdict the king and kingdom of France, in case that monarch committed hostilities on the king of Castile. He also interposed with Edward the first, king of England, to whom Philip had sent an ambassador to represent the injustice done to the Infants Alonso and Ferdinand de la Cerda; and it is agreed, that, by his means, the war was hindered from breaking out. The king of

- a Castile flattered himself with the hopes of great things in other respects, from this pontif, who had a great affection for Spain; but he was unfortunately killed by the fall of a new apartment, built by his own direction, in the spring of the ensuing year, and so the king's hopes of favour at Rome vanished^u.

THE monarch of France, if we may credit the best of the historians of that country, Donna Yoland, resented so highly the ill usage and injustice done to the princess his daughter, and her children, or Violante, that, without respecting any interpositions, he was for attacking the dominions of the king, queen of Castile, without delay; but it seems his nobility and general officers were not so much inclined to a war, which, at its very entrance, would put them to greater labour in passing the Pyrenees, than any in which they had been engaged; and therefore, under colour of making the necessary preparations, they delayed things for many months^w. In the mean time, Donna Yoland, or Donna Violante^x, queen of Castile, being very much offended with the setting aside of the children of Don Ferdinand, her eldest son, made an overture to the king of Arragon, her father, to receive her, together with her daughter-in-law and her grand-children, into his protection; which he had no sooner promised, than, by the care and assistance of Don Juan de Lara, who remained unalterably fixed in his fidelity to his master's family, the queen of Castile, the princess Blanche her daughter-in-law, and the two young Infants, retired into the dominions of Arragon^y, which gave great displeasure to Don Alonso, and much more to the Infant Don Sancho, who finding that the Infant Don Frederick, and Don Simon Ruez de los Cameros, were not intirely ignorant of the queen's retreat, he caused the former, though his uncle, to be either strangled or beheaded, and the house of the latter being set on fire, he perished in the flames^z. Before the close of the year war was declared between France and Castile in form^a. A.D. 1277.

- POPE Nicholas the third was to the full as earnest as his predecessor, in his endeavours to compromise the difference between the crowns; in order to which he employed two cardinals, with the titles of legates; but finding a backwardness in the king of Castile, he proceeded with him in that round manner, which the notions of those times put in his power. He sent him word, that, for the support of his wars against the Infidels, his predecessor had permitted him to levy a tax upon the clergy, for which reason he expected that he should immediately renew the war against the Infidels, or discontinue the tax^b. Upon this, he was constrained to break the truce he had made, and to send an army, commanded by his sons Don Pedro and Don Alonso, to besiege Algezira, and he likewise fitted out a fleet with instructions to block up that place by sea^c. The quarrel in the royal family was by this time composed, the queen consented to return to her husband, the princess Blanche was allowed to go into France, and the two Infants were kept by the king of Arragon^d. This, one would have imagined, must have been attended with favourable circumstances, but it happened otherwise. The queen thought it beneath her to return into Castile, without discharging the debts she owed in Arragon; the king's finances were so low, and the demands of the public upon him so pressing, that he could not spare her that sum; but the Infant Don Sancho went to Seville, seized upon a Jew who was treasurer at war to the army commanded by his brethren, and taking the sum requisite from him sent it to his mother^e. This proved the ruin both of the army and the fleet. The former was exceedingly weakened by famine, the latter beat by the Moors, being but very indifferently supplied; so that Aben-Joseph, king of Morocco, coming over, forced the two young princes to raise the siege with great loss; and observing afterwards that their camp was in a much better situation than that of the town, he caused the place, which now bears the name of Algezira, to be erected there, and directed the old one to be demolished^f. Towards the close of the year, the king, who had rejected Thoulouse, when proposed by the pope, for the place of a congress, in which the differences subsisting with the crown of France might be determined, because it was in that prince's dominions, yet readily approved of Bordeaux, which was in the hands of the king of England; and where, under the mediation of the pope, a negotiation was begun^g. The French, notwithstanding this, began their march towards Navarre, upon notice of which, Don Alonso sent an army into that country likewise, which advanced within three leagues of Pampeluna, but could not prevent the French from becoming masters of that city, where, under various pretensions, which will be metioned in another place, they committed great excesses.

THE conferences held at Bordeaux, at the request and under the mediation of the pope, were opened on the first of May, but without producing what was expected from them; for the French plenipotentiaries, insisting that the Infant Don Alonso de la Cerda should be declared heir apparent of the crown of Castile, the commissioners on the part of Don Alonso ^a alleged they had no powers to treat upon that point; and this stopped all proceedings for the present^h. In the mean time Don Alonso prepared for chastising the king of Granada; antecedent to which, he found it necessary to settle all disputes between him and the king of Morocco, which he at last brought to bear, and a truce was actually concludedⁱ. It grew from hence into a received opinion amongst his subjects, that he meant to leave the Moors in quiet; and therefore the clergy complained loudly of his applying the revenues of vacant sees, and of part of the tythes due to the clergy, to the uses of the state; upon which they applied themselves to the pope, who wrote in very strong terms to the king, and to the Infant Don Sancho, to forbear such practices, and not to violate the immunities of the church. However, the king and his son, knowing their own intentions best, proceeded notwithstanding; ^b and having engaged the king of Arragon to remain strictly neutral, in respect to their differences with the crown of France, caused a very numerous army to assemble in that part of Andalusia, which was already subject to the crown of Castile^k.

The king, Don Alonso, early in the spring, repaired to Seville, and being afflicted with a distemper in his eyes, the Infant Don Sancho commanded the army this campaign against the Moors, but without any considerable success^l. On the other hand, a proposition being made for a personal conference between the kings of France and Castile, at Auch in Gascony, Don Alonso began his journey through the kingdom of Arragon, where he had a long interview with the king; and, as some say, very important resolutions were formed, in consequence of what passed at these conferences^m (H). But however that may be, it is certain that the other interview did not take effect, for reasons that are no where clearly explained; but the negotiation between France and Castile went on; and, as some say, an agreement was at length concluded, by which the Infant Don Alonso de la Cerda was to have the kingdom of Murcia for himself and his heirs, for which, however, he was to do homage to the Infant Don Sancho, when he should become king of *Castile*ⁿ. About this time began those heart-burnings between the king and the Infant who was to succeed him, by which afterwards both the court and the kingdom suffered severely. ^c

THE war against Granada was prosecuted with much bloodshed, but little success. Don Sancho, who piqued himself upon an unreasonable and extravagant bravery, exposed himself during the campaign in such a manner, that if the king had not sent him a timely reinforcement of cavalry, he and those who were about him must have been either made prisoners or cut to pieces; which rash and indiscreet conduct, instead of lessening, raised his credit with the army^o. A negotiation followed the campaign, but to no effect; for Don Sancho insisted upon such terms without a victory, as would have been thought hard, if the king of Granada had been at his mercy. Before the troops quitted the field, there happened a very remarkable event. A considerable body of banditti, who had enriched themselves by their booty, ^d

(H) In respect to the secret history of this court and these times, it falls very little within our province; and yet without some little attention to it, what is delivered in the text will hardly be understood. Donna Yoland, or Violente, by which last name she is commonly mentioned in all but the Spanish historians, was a princess of none of the clearest characters (1). She had retired to the court of her brother the king of Arragon, out of affection, as she pretended, to her daughter-in-law and her grand-children, which provoked the king, who was passionately fond of her, to the last degree; and it was from their having a share in her secrets, that the Infant Don Frederick and Don Simon de los Cameros were put to death, some say by the king's order, others by the Infant Don Sancho's (2): certain it is, that the latter charged the former with it, to make him odious to his subjects, as Don Alonso himself affirms, in the instrument by which he disinherited his son (3). Yet, after all this, there appears to have been very close connections between the Infant Don Sancho and his mother, and, through her intrigues, between the same Infant and her brother, Don Pedro of Arragon (4). It was in consequence of these, that, under pretence of doing honour to his uncle, Don Sancho accompanied him back to Terrafona from this interview, in which, as the two kings had stipulated to act in concert for the recovery of Navarre out of the hands of the French, upon condition that it should be equally divided between them, the Infant went farther, and undertook, that when, by the death of his father, he should be in possession of the throne, he would relinquish the whole of Navarre to that monarch, and give him likewise the town of Requena and its dependencies, which extended on one side to the frontiers of Murcia, and on the other to the kingdom of Valencia; in consideration of which the king of Arragon was to keep the Infants de la Cerda closely confined in the castle of Xativa, so that they might not be able to give Don Sancho any trouble (5); which contrivances, as will be seen hereafter, proved altogether ineffectual, and therefore Ferreras, for the honour of his country, passed them over in silence.

a intreated the king to pardon them a little before the campaign, with which the king complied, upon condition that they should serve all that year at their own expence; but after doing this, and behaving gallantly, they demanded a compensation, and threatened, if they had it not, they would return to their old trade. Don Alonso temporized with them a little, till a body of horse fell into their rear, and then caused them to be surrounded and cut to pieces ^p.

In order to reduce the distracted state of his affairs into some order, the king appointed an assembly of the states at Seville, which was accordingly held, and was more numerous than usual. The king told them that he was sensible of the heavy load of taxes under which they laboured; that, notwithstanding, money must be raised for reducing the king of Granada; and instead of an additional tax, he advised the giving a currency to copper money, not as an eligible measure, but as an expedient dictated by necessity. The states, though very unwilling, yielded their assent ^q. The king then opened to them the agreement which he had concluded in respect to the kingdom of Murcia, in order to put an end to the disputes with France. Upon this, the Infant Don Sancho withdrew with his dependents and the rest of the members, repenting what they had done; and being cajoled by that ambitious prince, who told them that age and infirmities had rendered his father incapable of government, and that for the future he would take the administration upon himself, withdrew likewise ^r. In the next place, as if he had been already king, he made a treaty with the monarch of Granada, and accepted a sum of money instead of those hard terms which he had before prescribed. His brethren, the Infants Juan and Pedro, concurred with him in these measures, and abandoned their father in his old age ^s.

Don Sancho spent the winter in labouring by himself, his brothers, and his adherents, to engage the people every where in his party; and in this he succeeded so well, that in the month of April, when the states assembled at Valladolid, they were inclined, upon the motion of Don Emanuel his uncle, in the presence of his mother, to give him the title of king; but that, with great appearance of modesty, he refused: however, he made no difficulty of accepting the regal power with the title of regent ^t. His brothers, either repenting what they had done, or being disappointed in their expectations, left him; and though he could not but foresee that troubles must ensue, he engaged in a marriage that seemed calculated to excite them; for he espoused Donna Maria, the daughter of Don Alonso de Molina his great uncle, and then went in great state to Cordova ^u. The king Don Alonso was no sooner acquainted with what had passed at Valladolid, than he wrote to most of the nobility, and to the magistrates of all the great cities, to espouse his cause, and relinquish all connection with the Infant Don Sancho. The town of Badajos, singly, paid that obedience which was due to the orders of their sovereign; who finding himself abandoned by the kings of France, Aragon, and Portugal, and not knowing which way to turn, demanded assistance of the king of Morocco, who in a short time came over with an army into Spain, and joined Don Alonso with the handful of troops he had about him ^v. In the mean time the Infant Don Sancho advanced with his forces towards Badajos, which he summoned, but the inhabitants remained firm, and prepared for a siege: this, however, was prevented, by the appearance of Don Alonso at the head of a numerous body of Moors. The two kings besieged Cordova without effect, after which they returned to Seville, where Aben-Joseph took his leave of the Christian monarch, who in a transport of rage, by a solemn act dated November the 12th, disinherited his son, and bequeathed his curse to him and all his adherents ^w.

The pope exerted all his influence in favour of the king, and obliged the grand masters of the military orders to declare for him, and to secure all the places in their power; at the same time he threatened the Infant Don Sancho on account of his marriage, which he declared null ^x. The Infant Don Sancho brought back his brother Don Pedro, partly by force, partly by rewards. But he found all methods vain with respect to Don Alvaro de Lara, who seized the city of Palencia; and when the Infant demanded for whom he held it, answered plainly, "for Don Alonso, my master and yours." However, finding himself pushed by a superior force, he offered to leave the kingdom; which being accepted, he retired into Portugal with his followers; and, having increased their number considerably, he repaired to Don Alonso at Badajos ^y. The Infant, Don James, who had been always dutiful, seized some places on the frontiers of Navarre; in which, however, he had been forced, if Don Juan de Lara, who had followed the fortunes of the Infants de la Cerda, and who was then in the French service, had not marched to his relief ^z. The king of Morocco returned about this time with great forces; and having conferred with Don Alonso, resolved to open the war by a reducing the king of Granada. Upon this occasion the king of Castile sent him a corps of about a thousand men, under the command of Don Ferdinand Perez, who, because he would not incorporate them with the Moors, was so much suspected by Aben-Joseph, that he found it requisite to quit the camp, and retire towards Seville. The people of Cordova, having intelligence of this, attempted to surprize and surround him; but Don Ferdinand and his forces behaved so gallantly, that they were totally routed, with very considerable loss, and amongst them many persons of distinction were slain or taken. This troubled Don Sancho very much, and, which is singular, he thought fit to declare, that they had met with no more than they deserved, for being wantonly the aggressors against their king and his father; as if his own want of duty had not excited theirs^b.

The king by his last will disinherits the Infant Don Sancho, and calls to the succession the Infants de la Cerda.

THE whole Christian power in Spain was now involved in discord and confusion; in Portugal, the king was excommunicated, and the kingdom threatened with an interdict; Don Pedro, king of Arragon, was engaged in a war with France, about Navarre, in which the French had the assistance of the partisans of Don Alonso of Castile, while the Arragonese were supported by the royal Infant Don Sancho. This afforded the Moors an opportunity of raising their heads, which, however, they overlooked; for Aben-Joseph having formed a scheme of conquering Granada, and finding little assistance therein from Don Alonso, returned in displeasure to Africa^c. The old king of Castile, finding himself indisposed, confirmed on the eighth of November his last will and testament, by which he solemnly disinherited the Infant Don Sancho for his ingratitude, and which was afterwards urged as the strongest proof of his title, and called to the succession, in his stead, the Infants de la Cerda, and, failing their heirs, the kings of France^d. In the mean time, the Infant Don Sancho acted quite another part; he assembled the nobility at Palencia; and having represented to them, that what he had done he did by their advice; that he meant to preserve, and not to destroy the kingdom; that he now expected they would name a person to go to his father and let him know that rebellion was far from their hearts; that therefore they desired he would preserve the kingdom entire, and suspend his applications at Rome, where the pope was on the very point of launching against them the thunders of the church. Accordingly Don Gomez Fernandes, a nobleman of great probity, and who had meddled very little in these affairs, was sent to Seville, with instructions to say and do every thing that could pacify the king, and engage him to forget, or at least to forgive, every thing that had passed^e.

Is prevailed on to pardon the royal Infant, and finishes his days at Seville.

ABOUT the same time that Don Gomez Fernandes arrived at Seville, Donna Beatrix, queen of Portugal, came thither, to comfort her father under his misfortunes, and Donna Maria, consort to the Infant Don Sancho, who had always preserved her interest with the king, had her agents there likewise. While these negotiations were going on, for both the princesses concurred with Don Gomez, the king added a codicil to his will on the 22d of January, by which he gave to the Infant Don Juan the kingdoms of Seville and Badajos^f. Yet by degrees he began to be softened; and upon the arrival of news from Salamanca, that the Infant Don Sancho was fallen dangerously ill there, and professed the most sincere grief for his conduct towards his father, it affected the old king so much, that it brought him to his grave on Tuesday the 4th of April, in the year 1284, after he had pardoned his son, and revoked all his curses^g. He had by his queen Donna Yoland, or Violente, five sons; Don Ferdinand who died in his life-time, Don Sancho his successor, Don Juan, Don Pedro who likewise died in his life-time, and Don Jaques or James. By his mistress Donna Maria he had Donna Beatrix, at the time of his demise queen dowager of Portugal; by another mistress, Don Alonso and some other children, of whom, however, we have no distinct accounts. He was buried in the cathedral of Seville, near St. Ferdinand and Donna Beatrix, and left behind him the character of being a learned man and a weak king^h (I).

(I) The character of this great monarch is very differently represented, according to the various tempers of those who have undertaken to transmit his memoirs to posterity, and the several lights in which it might be considered. He is represented by those who lived in his own time as of a grave and serene aspect, majestic air, and very well made in his person. Affable and polite in his conversation, and naturally of a cheerful, open, and generous disposition. His faults were only virtues in excess. He was much too learned for a prince; his magnificence bordered upon profusion; his own candour misled him into credulity. His subjects, however, reaped some great and lasting advantages, even from those qualities in him which were most censured; he augmented the privileges, and corrected many errors in the statutes made at the foundation of the university of Salamanca; he polished the Castilian tongue, caused a general history of Spain to be composed in that language; directed

- a As soon as the Infant Don Sancho was recovered from his indisposition, which had brought him to the very brink of the grave, and had an account of his father's death, he went to Toledo, where he was crowned by the archbishop Don Gonfales¹. He proceeded from thence to Andalusia, after having had a conference with his uncle Don Pedro, king of Arragon, at Ucles, where he renounced all claim to the town and fortrefs of Albarracin, of which Don Juan de Lara was then in possession, and made frequent excursions from thence, sometimes into the dominions of Arragon, and sometimes into those of Castile². On the arrival of the king at Seville, he found that his brother, the Infant Don Juan, had been labouring to engage the people to support his father's will, by which he was to hold that kingdom; but the nobility interposing, he had been constrained to desist; and perceiving that he could not take a wiser measure, came and did homage to the king Don Sancho, who received him very kindly, and who shewed a disposition to gratify him in every thing, except that of making him a king³. While he was there, Aben-Joseph sent an ambassador to him, whose name was Abdalac, who told him that his commission was to ask a plain question, whether his master was to consider him as a friend or enemy? To this Don Sancho made none of the plainest answers, he bid him tell the king of Morocco, that he held his bread in one hand and a good staff in the other. Aben-Joseph looking upon this as an affront, began soon after to ravage the Christian frontiers. Don Sancho marched immediately to cover them, and, with the assistance of the Genoese, sent a very formidable fleet to sea, by which the whole naval power of the Moors was thoroughly beaten, which induced Aben-Joseph to return into Africa, with a resolution, however, of being revenged, as soon as it should be in his power⁴. In the winter the king held an assembly of the states at Seville, where he told them he was resolved to preserve the kingdom entire, to curtail as few of his father's concessions and other acts of generosity as was possible, and to endeavour, by the frugality of his administration, to remove the inconveniencies introduced by the dissipation of his father's reign, of whose memory, however, he spoke very respectfully, intimating, that though his dominions were extensive, and his revenues large, yet they bore no proportion to the greatness of his mind⁵.
- b The beginning of the new reign did not pass without some disturbances; but they were very soon suppressed, or rather torn up by the roots; for Don Sancho, who had acquired the surname of el Bravo, or the Fierce, punished with extraordinary severity, and rewarded with great generosity⁶. King Philip of France sent ambassadors to desire that he would not assist the king of Arragon in the war between the two crowns. Don Sancho thereupon dispatched two prelates to the court of France, to let the king know, that, being engaged in a war with the Moors, it was not in his power to assist his uncle; but at the same time he directed those prelates to gain the clearest notions they could of the maxims and forces of that court, that he might be the better able to act when he should find it convenient⁷. In the mean time Aben-Joseph returned from Africa with a great fleet and a numerous army; and as soon as he had landed his forces, besieged the town of Xerez de la Fronteira. Don Sancho marched immediately with his forces from Toledo to Seville; and, when the Moor little expected it, the Christian fleet appeared in the streights of Gibraltar, consisting of a hundred sail: at the same time Don Sancho, with his army, advanced to the relief of Xerez, upon which Aben-Joseph raised the siege and retired in haste. The monarch of Castile would have pursued and forced him to a battle, but his brother the Infant Don Juan and Don Lopez de Haro opposed and directed that body of laws to be compiled therein which we have mentioned in the text, that all ranks of people might be in a condition to understand the terms upon which their obedience was expected. Under his auspices also, and at an immense expence, those astronomical tables were drawn up which bear his name. He wrote a book entitled, The Treasure, comprehending treatises of rational philosophy, physics, and ethics. He is also said to have been deep read in astrology and chemistry, in which last science, we are told, there are two volumes of his yet remaining in his catholic majesty's library in cypher. He is, however, charged with prophaneness, and particularly with saying, that he could have contrived the universe in a better method than that in which we find it. A certain historian has given us a long account of the judgments brought upon him by this notorious act of impiety; but it does not appear that this account of his has met with much credit; and, if we may have leave to speak plainly, perhaps the fact on which it is founded deserves as little; for as there are pieces enough of this prince come down to posterity, to prove incontestably that he was a man of great parts, uncommon peneetration, and very extensive knowlege, we may reasonably doubt of his impiety, more especially when we consider the occasion of this expression; from whence indeed it is pretty evident, that it regarded the Ptolemaic, and not the Divine, system; and was so far from being an insult upon, that it was really a vindication of, the divine wisdom; which, for all that, might be very shocking to pious ears in those ignorant times, but which ought not to leave a stain upon his memory in ours. As to his political administration, the reader will judge of it from the facts that are recorded; and we have not either room or inclination to enter into a discussion of those censures that have been passed upon this monarch by many great writers of different nations, more especially as we cannot affirm them to be without ground, since he was very unfortunate.

hindered it¹. The king then returned to Seville, to which city repaired ambassadors from Morocco and Granada. Don Juan and Don Lopez were for concluding a peace with the former, and continuing the war against the latter; the rest of the council were for a general peace. Don Sancho proposed a conference with Aben-Joseph, where, for two millions of marvadies in ready money, the king consented to withdraw his fleet and return to *Africa*².

A. D. 1285. The queen was delivered on the 6th of December at Seville, of her son the Infant Don Ferdinand, to the great joy of the king, who received this news in his journey to the kingdom of Leon, where, if he did not meet with the most joyful reception, he found at least perfect obedience, which, to a monarch of his disposition, was almost as acceptable³.

King Edward the first, of England, offers his mediation between France and Castile.

In the spring of the next year he sent for his young son from Seville to Burgos, and obliged the states of Castile to own him for heir apparent, though in his cradle⁴. He next sent the archbishop of Toledo and other ambassadors to Bayonne, in hopes of concluding a solid peace with France; but the plenipotentiaries of that power insinuated that the king's marriage was void for want of the pope's approbation, and that the first step to a peace must be his resolving to marry the sister of their king: Sancho, who was himself at St. Sebastian, was no sooner acquainted therewith, than he ordered his ambassadors to quit Bayonne, and to return into his own dominions⁵. He then went in pilgrimage to St. James at Compostella, and, under colour of devotion, regulated all the affairs of Galicia; then passing to the city of Palencia, he there held an assembly of the states of Castile and Leon, in which many excellent laws were made for the benefit of his subjects. About this time it was, that king Edward the first, of England, offered his mediation to facilitate the conclusion of a peace between the crowns of France and Castile, to which likewise the pope contributed as far as lay in his power, and actually named two cardinals, as his legates, to assist at the conferences⁶. The king, Don Sancho, endeavoured to prevail upon the king, Don Alonso, who had succeeded his father Don Pedro, in the kingdom of Arragon, to deliver up to him the Infants de la Cerda, which that king very wisely, though very civilly, declined.

Don Lopez de Haro becomes so great, that the king is jealous of him.

As the kingdom of Castile had been hitherto distracted by factions, so the intrigues that now broke out amongst the courtiers were attended with consequences no less fatal; Don Gonsales Garcia, bishop of Sigüenza, was the first who had the king's confidence, and was entrusted with the direction of the finances, and had been employed in a negotiation with the crown of France; but upon a discovery that it was he who suggested that the queen's marriage was illegal, the great employment he held was taken from him, and bestowed upon Don Lopez de Haro, who was now in as great credit with the queen as with the king; and being a man of boundless ambition, accumulated titles, posts, and revenues, which rendered him first envied by many, and then, through his own haughty behaviour, odious to all. He had the title of count, which had been for some time refused, was high treasurer and prime minister, while his brother Don Diego de Haro had the command of the forces in Andalusia, and his daughter Donna Maria, married, by the king's consent, his brother the Infant Don *Juan*⁷. The haughtiness of Don Lopez, to those who had been before his friends and equals, the loose he gave to his resentment in respect to such as he accounted his enemies, and that spirit of rapine which tempted him to oppress without distinction, brought numberless complaints to the king's ear. As for Don Alvaro de Lara, his patience being wore out, he retired with some of his friends into the dominions of Portugal, where he associated with the Infant Don Alonso, and other malecontents in that kingdom, and made some inroads into *Castile*⁸. This brought both monarchs into the field, who united their forces against these malecontents; but in the course of the campaign, Don Sancho of Castile, who piqued himself much upon his justice, received such certain information of the ill usage Don Alvaro had received, that, instead of pursuing him to destruction, as he might have done, he received him into his favour, which, however, he did not enjoy long, being carried off by a distemper soon after this reconciliation; upon which Don Sancho privately intimated to Don Juan de Lara, who had been so long an exile for acting against him, that, if he would return home, he should not only enjoy his brother's estates, but also his posts and appointments; which he accepted⁹. The king having now a minister he could trust, called an assembly of the states at Toro, where the Infant Don Juan and Don Lopez opposed the king's measures, and at last retired from that assembly without concealing their discontent, or the resolution they had taken of raising disturbances, if it was in their power.

The Infant Don Juan

THE king at first endeavoured to secure their persons, upon which the Infant Don Juan retired towards Portugal with his forces, as Don Lopez de Haro did into *Castile*¹⁰. The king

- ^a did not think proper to march with an army against either, but sent for them both to come to him, promising them any satisfaction that was reasonable. The royal Infant rejected the proposition as unsafe, but Don Lopez came to the place appointed, with his friends in arms: upon his asking him what it was he aimed at, and by what authority he raised troops to disturb the public peace; he answered, by his own, to redress the injuries which the Infant Don Juan and himself had received. After many attempts towards a reconciliation, which ended in nothing, it was agreed, that the royal Infant and Don Lopez should meet the king at Alfaro, where all things were to be compromised. At this conference, when the king proposed that Don Lopez should evacuate all the fortresses which he had committed to his charge, that nobleman laid his hand upon his sword, as the Infant Don Juan likewise did. The nobility who were about the person of the king seeing this, killed the one and arrested the other. This threw the whole kingdom into a flame; and Don Diego de Haro the brother, and Don Diego the son; of the late Don Lopez, retiring into Arragon, persuaded that monarch to set the Infant Don Alonzo de la Cerda at liberty, whom they immediately proclaimed king of Castile: their adherents in several places engaged the people to acknowledge and arm in defence of his title; so that a second civil war was begun, with more alarming circumstances than the first^b (K).

Don Sancho, king of Castile, in the midst of these difficulties, supported himself with great firmness: he had a conference with the king of Portugal, from whom he demanded and received succours; but when he was about to have taken the field, he found himself pressed by Philip le Bel, king of France, to meet and confer with him; and as it was a point of great consequence to prevent a breach with that monarch at this juncture, he advanced with a strong corps of troops as far as St. Sebastians, leaving the command of his army to Don Alonso de Molina, the queen's brother^c. The king of Arragon, taking the advantage of Don Sancho's absence, entered the dominions of Castile with the Infant Don Alonso de la Cerda, who now used the regal title, at the head of an army, which some say fell little short of 100,000 men^d. Don Alonso de Molina advanced towards him, encamped advantageously, but declined fighting till the king should return. This he did sooner than was expected, for the king of France failed at the interview, and then proposed another, which the situation of Don Sancho's affairs would not permit him to expect. Upon his return, therefore, and joining his own army with a numerous corps of troops, the king of Arragon retired into his own country, to quell some disturbances that broke out in his absence; and the king Don Sancho following him, wasted all the country as far as the Ebro^e. For this fruitless attempt, Don Alonso de la Cerda made a cession to the king of Arragon of all Murcia; and, by a treaty of the like nature, gained the king of Granada to acknowledge his title^f. Don Diego de Haro, the elder, was more fortunate, for he beat a body of the king of Castile's troops, and ravaged the country about Cuenca and Alarcon^g. About this time the inhabitants of Badajos had a quarrel with the Portuguese, and Don Sancho, upon hearing the merits, decided in their favour.

(K) We have a very large and circumstantial account of this affair in the Spanish histories, out of which it will be proper to give the reader a few particulars, that are absolutely necessary to set it in a proper light. When the Infant Don Juan first departed so far from his duty as to ravage the country about Salamanca, Don Lopez de Haro was at court, to whom the king complained of it with astonishment; upon which Don Lopez told him that he was in the right; that what the Infant did was by his advice; and that, if the king would go to Valladolid, he would undertake Don Juan should come to Sigales with his troops, in order to let him know his grievances. The king, Don Sancho, accepted this proposition; he went to Valladolid, and Don Juan, upon notice from his friend, came to him, as he had promised. At this interview the king behaved so mildly, and gratified the Infant in so many respects, that things seemed to be pacified. But afterwards, when they both attended the king, who went to confer with the monarch of Arragon, they disappointed his views, by the intelligence they gave to, and the influence they had over, that prince. When Don Sancho came to Alfaro in his own dominions, and saw both the Infant Don Juan and Don Lopez there without their usual attendants, he caused a great council to be held of the prelates and nobility; in which he told them; that, since he found they were persons whom good usage could not move, or the greatest favours inspire, with any gratitude, he was resolved to dismiss them from his service, and expected they should render the places, that he had committed to their care, to such noblemen as he then named. While the king was speaking, Don Lopez laid his right hand upon his sword, wrapped his cloak round his left arm, and having called him a cruel, perfidious, and ungrateful tyrant, suddenly drew, and advanced towards him; upon which one of the nobles cut off his right arm at a blow, and the rest who were present pierced his body with a multitude of wounds. The Infant Don Juan, who had wounded several in defence of his father-in law, when he saw him extended upon the floor, fled to the queen's chamber, to which the king followed him with his sword drawn, and with an intention to have dispatched him; but the queen, putting herself between them, throwing herself upon her knees, by her tears and prayers so wrought upon the king, that he ordered him to be conducted to prison, with a design to prosecute him for this and other acts of treason, which did not hinder his living, as the reader will see, to owe his preservation a second time to the kind interposition of the same good princess.

But when the king's edict came to be put in execution; a new quarrel arose, in which the Portuguese, being unarmed, were cut to pieces. The people at Badajos, dreading the justice of their sovereign, seized upon the citadel, and declared for Don Alonso de la Cerda. The city, however, was quickly invested by the king's troops, and tho' the inhabitants defended themselves obstinately, they were at last constrained to surrender at discretion; but the troops, without any respect to the capitulation, put all they found in the place to the sword, without mercy ^h.

The king receives great disturbance from the jealousy of Don Juan de Lara. THE beginning of the next year, the kings of France and Castile had an interview at Bayonne, when it was agreed, that the infants de la Cerda should have the kingdom of Murcia, doing homage for it to the crown of Castile; that king Philip should use his interest at Rome, to engage the pope to confirm the king's marriage; and that both princes should continue the war against the king of *Arragon*¹. In the mean time Don Juan de Lara, being deceived by an anonymous letter, retired from the king's service, and went over to the king of Arragon, to whom he did great service. At length, however, the queen Donna Maria proposed to him the marriage of her niece, the heiress of Molina, for his son, and hostages for the security of his person; and upon receiving these he was content to return to his duty^k. Such at that time was the power of the nobility in Spain, and so feeble the authority of kings. In the space of a few months, notwithstanding all these assurances, and the marriage concluded with his son, Don Juan de Lara was again seized with new apprehensions. A nobleman of great rank came to him in the dead of the night in the royal palace at Toledo, and told him that a body of armed men had been secretly let in, and that he suspected there was some design against his liberty or life. Don Juan, upon this, attempted with a few of his friends to make his escape; but finding that impracticable, and having told them the source of his uneasiness, they advised him to apply to the queen; and she disclosing it to the king, he sent for him, and upon a solemn promise that he would do him no hurt, drew from him the name of the nobleman who had told him this story. The king did not indeed punish him, but he reproached him in the face of the whole court, told him he was a faithless knight and a lying traitor; which drew upon him such universal contempt, that he could never afterwards appear in public^l. Don Juan relapsed soon after into fresh inquietudes; and to draw him out of these, the king promised him, that his own son, the Infant Don Alonso, should marry his daughter, which made him quiet for a little time, and but for a little time; so that the king was forced to release his brother the Infant Don Juan, that he might oppose one faction to another^m. Affairs however went better abroad, for he not only concluded a new treaty with the king of Granada, but, Don Alonso being dead, James the new king of Arragon renewed the ancient treaty between the two crowns; upon which Don Juan de Lara, seeing he had no resource left in Spain, retired into France, though the king omitted nothing to have delivered him from his jealousies, and the queen still continued her kindness and protection to his familyⁿ.

Don Alonso victorious over the Moors by sea and land. ABEN-JOSEPH, king of Morocco, either considering the treaty which the king of Castile had made with the monarch of Granada as a breach of the peace made with him, or as preparatory to a war, began to assemble troops and shipping, of which the king of Castile had very early intelligence. Upon this, he immediately took into his pay the famous Benedict Zachary, a Genoese admiral, who had commanded his fleet in the former war; and being supplied with a large sum of money by the states of his several kingdoms, and auxiliary squadrons from the kings of Arragon and Portugal, he attacked the Moors by sea and land. His admiral had the good fortune to dissipate the enemy's fleet, and to destroy a great part of it; and the king, after a long siege, reduced Tarifa, and put a strong garrison into it; he likewise concluded a peace in quality of mediator between the crowns of Arragon and Naples, to their reciprocal satisfaction, and received the strongest assurances from the crown of France, that the late treaty should be punctually complied with, and no encouragement whatever given to any of his malecontents^o. Donna Elizabeth, the wife of Don Juan de Lara the younger, dying without issue, her husband became, from that circumstance only, one of the number.

The Infant Don Juan falls first into discontent, and at length into rebellion. THE Infant Don Juan, forgetting the clemency with which the king had treated him, entered into fresh cabals; and having drawn Don Juan de la Lara the younger into his party, they quickly assembled a great number of seditious and licentious persons, and with them broke out into open rebellion. The king marched against them with an army, and pressed them so hard, that the Infant was forced to take shelter in his town of Valentia, which from him is still called Valentia; Don Juan and his associate threw himself, with some troops, into Castro-Torafa, at no great distance^p. The king was no sooner informed of it, than he came

- a and encamped between those two places, without besieging either ; but published an edict, forbidding any to supply them with provisions on pain of death. This quickly reduced Don Juan de Lara, and his people, to such distress, that he went to the king, and in the most humble manner desired his pardon ; Don Sancho received him kindly, bid him remember his distress, how he came into it, and by whom he was delivered ^a. The news of this brought his father back, whom the king entrusted with the command of his army against the Infant Don Juan, who had made his escape into Portugal ^b. The Infant invited Don Juan de Lara to a conference, under pretence that he had a mind to submit to the king, and then, in breach of his faith, made him prisoner ; but the king of Portugal set him immediately at liberty ; upon which he returned into Castile, adhered steadily to the king, and died the next year in his service ^c.

THE Infant Don Henry, son to St. Ferdinand, and uncle to Don Sancho, returned this year from Italy, to revisit his native country, after having run through a long series of strange adventures. The king received him very kindly at Burgos, and granted him such a settlement as was suitable to his high rank, and near relation to him ^d (L). Upon his application to the king of Portugal not to protect his brother, the Infant Don Juan transported himself to Morocco, and finding Jacob Aben-Joseph meditating a war, he offered, if he would give him 5000 horse, and some foot, to recover Tarafa, which his brother had taken the year before. His proposal was accepted ; and having embarked his forces in Andalusia, he invested Tarafa with a numerous army. The place was defended by Don Alonso Perez de Guzman, with such spirit, that the Moors began to be discouraged. The Infant Don Juan being informed that the governor had a little son at nurse in an adjacent village, he caused the child to be brought to him, and then bid the Castilian advanced guard tell the governor, that, if he did not immediately surrender the place, he would cut the child's throat before his eyes. This occasioning some commotion in the garrison, Don Alonso rose from dinner to know what was the matter, and coming upon the walls, saw Don Juan with his son in his hand, and heard him repeat his threats. Don Alonso immediately drew out his sword, and throwing it to the Infant, said, " If you, who were born a prince, and educated a Christian, dare to commit so execrable a villainy, know, that I dare both keep the place and furnish you with a weapon." This, though it struck both the Moors and the garrison with admiration, had no effect upon the monster to whom it was addressed, since, in the sight of both, he took up the sword and butchered the poor infant. The length of the siege gave Don Sancho time to come to its relief, with a numerous army, upon which the Moors raised the siege, and Don Juan, being afraid to go back to Morocco, deserted them, and retired to the king of Granada, to whom Aben-Joseph yielded Algezira, the only place he had left in Spain, that he might be rid of any connections with that country ^e (M). A resolution, however, to which himself and his successors did not always adhere.

(L) It is requisite to say something here concerning the Infant Don Henry, because the course of the history will oblige us to say a great deal of him hereafter ; he was the son of St. Ferdinand by Donna Beatrix, who, as some writers say, was addicted to judicial astrology ; and infected her children with a propensity to that superstition (1). It is uncertain whether this was the cause or not ; for it is pretended that there was a prediction that Don Alonso would be deposed by a near relation, that prompted him to take up arms against his brother, in hopes, perhaps, of fulfilling it when he was defeated, as we have shewn in the history ; and, being refused shelter by the king of Arragon (2), fled to Tunis, and lived for some years under the protection of the Moorish prince who then governed there ; though Mariana says that he was but in a mean condition, and that his misfortunes did not contribute at all to his amendment, since he still maintained a correspondence with the malecontents in Castile. At length, growing weary of Barbary, he went into Italy, where he embraced the part of prince Conradin, grandson of the emperor Frederick, had a share in his fortunes and misfortunes, and made himself first considerable, and then odious there, for reasons that will appear in another place, and which brought upon him excommunication and imprisonment ; he was absolved from the former, and released from the latter, upon a most humble submission to pope Honorius (3) ; and this afforded him an opportunity of returning to Spain, after an absence of twenty-seven years. The king Don Sancho had no personal knowledge of him ; for his rebellion against Don Alonso happened the very year after Don Sancho was born ; but he knew and pitied his misfortunes, and thought it his duty to relieve him as his uncle (4). As to his character, he was of a haughty, mutable, and turbulent disposition, cruel, avaricious, and perfidious to the last degree ; mean in adversity, insolent in prosperity ; and, with a multitude of vices, had as few good qualities as any man of those times : but he had a suppleness, and a kind of specious address, that rendered him capable of doing much mischief ; and he would have done still more if he had been endowed with better talents (5). The reader may possibly blame us for giving him so bad a character, but the sequel of the history will acquaint him with facts that must convince him that the Infant Don Henry has been here very gently dealt with :

(M) We have in some circumstances a different account of this matter in Mariana. He tells us, that this son of Don Alonso Perez de Guzman, was a youth grown

The death of Don Sancho
the Fierce, and the condition of the
decease.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the king, whose health had been long declining, found himself so much worse, that he resolved to take the speediest and the properest method for settling his temporal and his spiritual concerns. In order to this he made his will, in the presence of the archbishop of Toledo, and of such other prelates and great lords as were near his person, by which he appointed the queen tutorefs and regent of the Infant Don Ferdinand, his successor, to whom the Infant Don Henry, and all who were present, took the oath of fidelity^w. He removed afterwards to Toledo, in hopes the change of air might have been serviceable to him; but in this he was deceived, for, soon after his arrival, he departed this life, on the 25th of April, in the year 1295. He left by his queen, the Infants Don Ferdinand (Don Alonso died before him), Don Pedro, and Don Philip; and two Infantas, Donna Elizabeth and Donna Beatrix^x.

Don Ferdinand IV. proclaimed king of Castile, and

Don Ferdinand the fourth succeeded his father in the tenth year of his age; and, as soon as Don Sancho's funeral was over, received the homage of the nobility, and was inaugurated in the cathedral church of Toledo, with the greatest solemnity, and with the most universal applause^y; and yet, in the compass of this year, there arose as great troubles as ever perplexed a court, the beginning, progress, and issue of which, within this period, we will state as briefly as possible. The Infant Don Juan claimed the whole succession, under pretence that the king's marriage was illegal, and he was the only right heir of Don Alonso the wise, according to the system maintained by his deceased brother, and in virtue of which he had enjoyed the kingdom. As strange a title as this was, it found some abettors; the Moors promised him their assistance, for their own interest, and upon the same motive the king of Portugal became his ally^z. However, upon the queen's offering him the restitution of his honours and revenues, Don Juan came to court, and did homage to his nephew: Don Denis, king of Portugal, took up arms, to recover three towns which Don Alonso gave his mother; Donna Beatrix, the queen dowager, gave him those towns, and so there was an end of that quarrel^a. Don Diego Lopez de Haro assembled forces, in order to recover the country of Biscay; the queen sent for Don Juan and Don Gonsales de Lara, to whom the king in his last moments had particularly recommended her and his son, and having furnished them with a large sum of money, upon the strongest assurances of duty and fidelity, dispatched them to their own estates, in order to raise forces against Don Diego. They did accordingly raise the troops; but as soon as they were raised, they joined the rebels, against whom they were to have acted, and then sent a long list of demands for themselves and for him to the court; and these being granted, they came to Valladolid, and did homage in the assembly of the states^b. The Infant Don Henry, more modest than the rest, formed no pretensions against the king, but insisted upon having the government of the kingdom, with the title of regent, saving to the queen dowager the care of his person, and of his education, to which she was constrained to assent^c; lastly, the king of Granada entered the frontiers of Andalusia, with a very numerous army, and wasted the country with fire and sword; Don Rodrigo Ponce, grand master of Calatrava, with the forces of the military orders, gave him battle, and, not without great loss, compelled him to retire. A few days after, Don Rodrigo himself died of his wounds, and was succeeded in his command on the frontier by Don Alonso Perez de Guzman, who so gallantly defended Tarifa^d.

up, and taken prisoner in a sally; that the governor was at dinner when the Infant brought him before the fortrefs, and threatened to put him to death. Don Alonso being informed of it, threw the sword, and told him, he had rather lose a hundred sons, than forfeit his fidelity to his sovereign; and having said this, went back to his house, and sat down to dinner, but was quickly roused by the cry of the soldiers, on the sight of the young gentleman's head being struck off by order of the Infant Don Philip. Being told what it was that occasioned this emotion, he said, coldly, I thought the enemy had entered the town; went back to his house, and seated himself again at table. A most wonderful instance of heroic courage, says our author, worthy the heroes of old; and than which antiquity proposes nothing greater to our imagination (6). As soon as the king Don Sancho received the news of it, he wrote a letter with his own hand to the governor, in which, having highly commended his behaviour, he bestowed on him the surname of Bueno, or the good, desired him to come to him at Alcala, and assured him, if his health would permit, that he would come out to meet him; which letter is said to be preserved in the archives of the dukes of Medina Sidonia (7); who had more reason to be proud of their being descended from this man, than of being, as they are, the first dukes in Castile (8).

- ^a THE prospect which seemed to be grown in some measure serene, grew on a sudden as gloomy as before, and clouds began to gather on every side. James, king of Arragon, sent to the queen dowager, and desired she would take back the Infanta Donna Elizabeth, his mind being altered with respect to the marriage; upon which, anxious for the safety of that princess, she prevailed upon the regent to go and receive her on the frontiers. It was not long after this, that the whole scene of foreign and domestic treachery disclosed itself. Don Alonso de la Cerda returned out of France into Arragon, where, having confirmed the cession he made of the kingdom of Murcia to that monarch, he furnished him with an army to march into Castile^c. The probability of his recovering that kingdom was indeed very great; the king of Arragon embarked the whole forces of his realm in his quarrel, the kings of France, Portugal, and Granada, were his allies; and, besides these foreign confederates, he had very good friends in the country to which he laid claim, such as the first queen dowager Donna Yoland, his grandmother, the Infant Don Juan, whom he had purchased with the promise of the kingdoms of Leon and Galicia, and Don Juan de Lara, who had formerly betrayed, and was now just reconciled to the queen and the regent^f. As soon as they were ready to act, the Infant Don Juan, with the lords of his party, sent to give the king and his mother notice, that they renounced their fidelity, and so went to join his competitor.

- THE first step was to put the Infant Don Juan in possession of the dominions promised him, which was performed without difficulty, and he proclaimed king at Leon^e. The army of the allies, as it was called, then marched to Sabagun, where Don Alonso was proclaimed king of Castile^h; the queen Donna Maria, in the absence of the regent, commanded Don Diego Ramirez, and Don Garcia Fernandez de Soto Major, to throw themselves with a body of good troops into the town of Majorga, which lies at the distance of five leagues from Leon. Don Alonso de la Cerda was for marching directly to Burgos, but the Infant Don Juan advised him not to leave Majorga behind him, upon which they laid siege to it. This advice was prudent, but it had a bad effect. The town was not well fortified, and therefore they attempted it by assault; failing in that, they were obliged to attack it in formⁱ. In the mean time the regent Don Henry went to put himself at the head of the troops in Andalusia, in order to cover that country from the king of Granada, who entered it with a powerful army, beat, and would have taken him prisoner, if he had not been relieved by Don Alonso Perez. Upon this, the regent made a peace with the Moors, but on terms so bad, that the queen refused to ratify them^k. Donna Yoland made an attempt upon Valladolid, which served only to shew her inclinations and her weakness; for the inhabitants shut their gates against her, and she was constrained to withdraw^l.

- AT length an epidemic disease, produced by the great heats, broke out in the army of the allies, and forced them to raise the siege of Majorga; the Arragoneje retired into their own country, with the dead body of the Infant Don Pedro, who had commanded them, and Don Alonso de la Cerda went with them^m. As for the Infant Don Juan and Don Juan de Lara, they retired to Simancas, where they joined the king of Portugal, who had taken some places in that neighbourhood. There a proposition was made to cut matters short, by besieging the king and his mother in Valladolid. The project was plausible and practicable; but Don Juan de Lara suddenly declared, that neither he nor any that belonged to him should act immediately against the persons of the king and queen, which put an end to the schemeⁿ. On the side of Murcia, the king of Arragon acted in person, and on his own behalf, which might perhaps be the reason that things took a different turn there; so that he reduced Allicant, and several of the most considerable places in that kingdom^o. The king of Granada, extremely irritated at the queen's rejecting the peace he had concluded with the Infant Don Henry, came with a numerous army in the autumn before Tarefa, which, however, he was not able to reduce, neither could his good friend the Infant Don Henry prevail upon the states, tho' he laboured it with great industry, to send their orders to Don Alonso Perez to deliver it. The very proposal hurt him with the Castilians, tho' he pretended to qualify the demand, by his desire to abate their heavy taxes; and his desiring the queen to give him the revenues of two considerable towns soon after entirely destroyed his credit, and put it out of his power to do the mischief that he intended^p.

Don Ferdinand, king of Castile, makes a treaty with Don Denis, king of Portugal. ALL the true patriots who had the interest of their country, and that only at heart, studied how to restore the public tranquillity, and to deliver the state and themselves out of this distress. Don Juan Fernandez de Limia commanded on the frontier towards Portugal; and having framed in his mind a project which he thought might prove beneficial to both kingdoms, he desired an interview with Don Juan d'Albuquerque, who was the king of Portugal's favourite, to whom, when he had communicated his scheme, he promised to give it all the countenance that was in his power, which he executed with all the punctuality worthy of a man of his rank. The issue of this business was, that in an interview between the royal families at Alcanizas, a peace was concluded between the two crowns, upon condition that Don Ferdinand of Castile should marry the Infanta Donna Constantia of Portugal, as soon as a dispensation could be obtained from Rome; that the prince of Portugal, Don Alonso, should espouse the Infanta Donna Beatrix of Castile; and that, for certain reasons expressed in the treaty, and which would have been better expressed by the single word, necessity, several good towns, and a considerable district of country, should be yielded to the king of Portugal, who promised to assist Don Ferdinand with all his forces. On the conclusion of the treaty the two

A. D. 1297. Infantas were exchanged, and the queen dowager, Donna Maria, was in hopes, that, by the assistance of the Portuguese, the war might have been carried on with greater vigour: but in this she promised herself too much, for those succours amounted to no more than 300 horse, under Don Juan d'Albuquerque, and they could not do much; indeed history does not inform us that they did any thing⁹. The king of Granada was in the field some months, but we hear of no place that he took, except Alcaudeta, in the mountains, which was of no great consequence.

This measure fails of producing those great advantages expected from it. THE queen dowager, Donna Maria, found means in the spring to obtain a considerable supply from the states at Burgos; and having a pretty good army in the field, directed them to lay siege to Ampudia, in which Don Juan de Lara was with a small garrison; the queen heard with surprize, that though the place had been invested some days, the siege was not far advanced; upon which she went thither in person, suspecting, as the case really proved, that the fault was not in her forces, but in their generals. Upon her arrival in the camp, Don Juan quitted the place in the night, which surrendered the next day¹. Don Denis of Portugal, in pursuance of the late treaty, and at the request of the states, came with a considerable army to her assistance; yet he refused to act against the Infant Don Juan; and entering into the intrigues of the Infant Don Henry, proposed to the states, that the kingdom of Galicia should be left to the Infant Don Juan; but the states, apprized of the true ground of this proposal, viz. that the Infant Don Henry might be always necessary, and Castile a less formidable neighbour to Portugal, they rejected it; upon which the king sent assistance to Don Juan². The king of Granada had a superior army in the field, with which he was very near taking Jaen, the suburbs of which he burnt; and having amassed a large booty, and reduced the town of Quesada, he retired³.

Admirable conduct of the queen Donna Maria, by which the kingdom is preserved. THE prudence of the queen had removed many difficulties, and had hitherto kept the crown on the head of Don Ferdinand, her son; but so many new enemies arose, and the old ones continued so implacable, that it seemed scarce possible for her to proceed in the way she had hitherto done. She was, however, indefatigable; and, with the greatest probity of mind, was so affable in her behaviour, and had such a dexterity in framing and in executing expedients, as rendered her superior to all the trials she met with. Some of her enemies insinuated, that, her marriage being invalid, her children by the king were illegitimate. She took no notice of this at home, but directed the archbishop of Toledo, who was at Rome, to represent the matter to the pope in a proper light; and he did this so effectually, that he procured a bull to confirm her marriage, and a cardinal's hat for himself. She found a very mercenary spirit amongst many of the nobility who had hitherto adhered to her, but were continually wanting rewards for their loyalty; these she gratified as well as she was able, and returned them abundance of good words for their bad behaviour. But the Infant Don Henry exceeded them all in quality of regent; he was covetous and corrupt; he was, besides, very perfidious, and very susceptible of offence. The queen behaved to him with great respect herself, and engaged her son to do the like; but she took care that the people should know his true character; and this made him less dangerous, though not less deceitful. She found money difficult to be got, and yet, by managing it frugally, and laying the accounts punctually before the states, she obtained whatever she thought proper to ask. But what gave her more trouble than any other, indeed than all the rest, was, the intelligence that the malecontents had in almost all the great towns in the king's dominions. To balance this, she visited many of a them with him in person, and to those she suspected most she sent her children, which fully answered her intention; for the people, charmed with the confidence that the queen reposed in them, did, out of pride, what they ought to have done out of duty.

A GENERAL assembly of the states being held at Valladolid, the accounts given by the queen were so clear, and her necessities so pressing and so apparent, that they granted her thrice the usual sum at once, a great part of which the Infant Don Henry laid his hands upon, under pretence of going to take the command of the army against the Moors. The scheme of his campaign was to purchase a peace, by giving up Tarifa, that he might put most of this money in his pocket; but the queen took care to apprize the officers of the army he was to command of his sinister designs, which they took care to defeat^u. Don Juan de Lara, after making a journey to very little purpose into France, returned into Navarre, and from thence made an expedition into Castile, in which his troops were routed by Don Juan Alonso de Haro, and himself taken prisoner, which happened well for the queen, and better for him^w. Her army was then before Palencuela, into which he had thrown a garrison; but those who commanded the queen's army were so much his friends, that in all probability it had not been taken, if the queen had not sent for her prisoner into the camp, and prevailed upon him to give his orders for opening the gates. The Infant Don Henry, having thrust himself into this negotiation, was so taken with the beauty of Don Juan's daughter, whose grandfather he might have been, that he would needs marry her; which ceremony the queen graced with her presence, Don Juan being first set at liberty, who became once more the king's good subject, and rendered all his places into the queen's hands. Towards the close of this year, the old queen dowager, Donna Yoland, died, in her return from Rome, in the kingdom of Navarre^x (N).

THE king of Portugal, being very desirous to have the double marriage actually accomplished, desired an interview with the queen Donna Maria, to which she readily consented, and there all the measures necessary were concerted. Upon this, she summoned an assembly of the states at Valladolid, where every thing passed with such regularity, and such immense sums were granted for the support of the young king, that the Infant Don Juan, who hitherto had stiled himself king of Leon and Galicia, and was actually in possession of some part of both countries, thought it most for his interest to renounce those titles, to which indeed he had no just pretensions, and to make the best terms for himself he could; which, having done, he came to the assembly of the states, did homage to the king, and swore to the established succession^y. After all this, in conjunction with the Infant Don Henry, instead of obeying the queen's orders, he went to confer with the king of Arragon, with whom the two Infants made a secret and scandalous agreement, that, in consideration of his supporting them in their respective schemes, they would procure him the cession of the kingdom of

(N) We have a very strong contrast in the characters of these two queen dowagers of Spain, than whom there could scarce be any two women more unlike; for Donna Violente had a great hand in exciting all the troubles that disturbed her husband's, her son's, and her grandson's reigns. A very judicious and well esteemed historian has branded her for her gallantries, which, without doubt, he would not have done, if they had not been very notorious (9). She had a particular kindness for the Infant Don Juan; though, of all her children, he was undoubtedly the most unworthy; and there is great probability, that it was for his sake, rather than for that of her grandchildren, that she attempted to increase the disturbances in Castile, by soliciting the people to revolt from the service of the king and his mother (10). It appears, however, that she had very little interest, and rather discovered an inclination to do mischief, than a capacity of doing it; though it is not impossible that she might put her son in possession of those places that were left her for her dowry. Whether she resided afterwards in that part of the kingdom of Leon that acknowledged the Infant Don Juan, or whether, notwithstanding what she had done, she returned again to the court of Castile, is not very clear; but we have good reason to believe that there was, at least, as much of discontent as of devotion in her journey to Rome, where, however, she was well received by pope

Boniface the eighth, who established the jubilee, and countenanced, at least, an opinion, which nothing but the superstition of those times could have rendered credible, that whoever visited the tombs of the apostles Peter and Paul, might obtain full and free pardon for all their sins (11). In this respect it may be the queen dowager Donna Violente might have her reasons, as well as other great personages who went thither the same year: but in all probability, the fatigue of such a journey was too great for a person so far advanced in years, and might occasion her falling sick as she passed the Pyrennees in her return, and after a short illness died at Roncevaux, where she was likewise interred, which is the reason that her death is not mentioned by several of the Spanish historians. The celebrated Bayle (12), following Mariana, who was misled by another historian, upon whom the greatest blame ought to lie, has made some severe reflections on the king Don Alonso's character, as to the usage of this princess, which are not at all founded in truth, as we have shewn in the text; and this is the more extraordinary, since he might easily have perceived the contradiction, even in his own account; for how is it possible for a prince to use his wife unkindly, and desire to be rid of her, and be at the same time uxorious to a ridiculous degree?

Castile; and though the people and the army were perfectly disposed to do what was fit for them to have done for the service of the king and kingdom, yet the private views of the nobility spoiled all. While the army of Arragon besieged Lorca, that of Castile remained altogether inactive, and this notwithstanding all the pains the queen took to prevent it^b.

Finds himself AFTER a siege of many months, the governor of Lorca entered into an agreement, that, obliged to make in case the place was not relieved in fifty days, he would deliver it to the king of Arragon.
 proposals of The queen pressed the Infants to march with the army to its relief, which they at first declined, peace, which and at last refused; upon this, she put herself at the head of the army, and the Infants were are rejected by obliged to follow her, though very unwillingly. They had, however, scarce taken the field, the queen. before they had intelligence that Lorca, tho' the time was not expired, was through treachery surrendered^c. This, tho' a very bad action, was much exceeded by the Infants Don Juan and Don Henry, who suffered the king of Arragon to retire when they had him much in their power. The queen knew, but could not prevent this act of infidelity. Providence soon after enabled her to return the injury in the same way; for, by countenancing the malecontents in Arragon, she brought that monarch, of his own accord, to offer to evacuate Murcia, if she would grant him the single town and fortress of Alicant, which she refused, from a firm persuasion that it would be very soon in her power to recover, for her son, all that had been lost during a minority full of confusion^d. Don Alonso de la Cerda, perceiving how desperate his affairs were grown, left Arragon, in order to solicit assistance in France, where he found it utterly out of the king's power, how much soever it might be his intention. The affairs of the church being in great disorder, Don Gonsales Diaz Palomec, archbishop of Toledo, held a council of his suffragans at Penafiel, in which many regulations were made, and, amongst the rest, it was intimated to the Infant Don Henry, that if he did not restore the places he had taken from the church, they would proceed to excommunicate him, and that they would do the same to any who should commit the like outrages for the future^e.

The Infant As the Infant Don Juan loved to fish in troubled waters, as he found a very ready associate Don Juan and his associates in Don Juan de Lara, and found no great difficulty in drawing the Infant Don Henry into ther. a king, he ought to leave his mother, and live as he liked. The young king, like most other young kings, listened to these plausible offers, eloped, while the queen was gone to Victoria, to prevent, by a conference with the French viceroy of Navarre, a war on that side, and went to the lords^f. It was not long before the Infant Don Henry found that he had mistaken his man; and that he had lost more by this revolution than the queen, to whom he returned, and exclaimed bitterly against those who had seduced their sovereign, and offered to have recourse to arms, on his own and her majesty's behalf. The queen, on the other hand, behaved herself, and, at last, taught him to behave, with moderation. The favourites engaged the king to celebrate his marriage with Donna Constantia, which the queen would not permit, till the king of Portugal restored those places he had taken from the kingdom of Leon, when the solemnity was performed with great magnificence^g. Thus far wore another aspect. The people of the town were for shutting their gates, if the queen had not prevented it; and the deputies refused to assist without her consent.

 the like means, the like grants were obtained, the king went to Palencia, where Don Alonso, the son of the Infant Don Juan, married Donna Teresa, the sister of Don *Juan de Lara*ⁱ.
 After this he entered into a kind of league or confederacy with these great lords, which so

- a exasperated Don Henry, that he insisted upon the queen's entering into a like confederacy with him and Don Lopez de Haro, with which measure, for her own sake, she was obliged to comply; upon which the most considerable of the nobility resorted to her at Valladolid, from all quarters, to offer her their services^k. This alarmed the favourites to such a degree, that they prevailed upon the king to go thither to try to pacify his mother. The queen received him with great kindness, but spoke to him with the utmost freedom; shewed him how much she had done for him, and how much he had done against himself; and concluded with telling him, that he would do well to guard against the result of his own confederacy; but that he had nothing to fear, with respect to his person or authority, from that of which his follies had compelled her to become the head^l.
- b His favourites, being still in fear, pressed Don Ferdinand to confer with his father-in-law the king of Portugal, at Badajoz, under a pretence that he would give him a sum of money, by way of portion with the queen, which, at the conference, appeared to have no foundation; but however, the king, being acquainted with his son-in-law's expectation, gave him a million of marvadies, to prevent any coldness arising between him and his queen^m. This interview so alarmed the Infant Don Henry and Don Diego de Haro, that they made a treaty with the king of Arragon, into which they would have drawn the queen-mother; but she not only refused, but gave notice of it to her sonⁿ. Immediately after the Infant Don Henry died without heirs, and the king instantly seized on all his estates; and so little care was taken of his body, that it had scarce been decently interred, had it not been for the queen, who directed a funeral suitable to his rank as regent of the kingdom, at which she assisted in person, saying, upon this occasion, we ought to remember his birth, and forget his faults^o. By her endeavours Don Diego de Haro was detached from that league into which he had entered; and, if the king would have followed her advice in all things, his affairs might have been restored; but he resembled his grandfather in the unsteadiness of his temper, and, by the advice of his favourites, concluded an alliance with the new king of Granada, who took the advantage of these troubles, and, like a wise prince, neglected nothing that might contribute to the prosperity of his subjects, and the establishment of his own affairs^p. A. D. 1304.
- d THE king of Arragon, perceiving how prejudicial this scene of disturbance and confusion was to the interest of the Christians in Spain, proposed to the king of Castile concluding all differences between them by a solid and equitable peace, to which Don Ferdinand shewed himself very inclinable. Before any effectual measures could be taken on this head, Don Diego de Haro, after a very free expostulation with the king, by which, notwithstanding the interposition of the queen his mother, he could obtain nothing, broke out into an open insurrection, in conjunction with Don Roderic de Castro, a nobleman of great power in Galicia; but the latter being killed in one of his first exploits, the peace of the kingdom was, for the present, restored^q. The king then sent the Infant Don John to regulate matters with the king of Arragon, and by them it was agreed, that all differences should be referred to an arbitrator on behalf of each of the kings, and an umpire, who was to moderate things between the arbitrators. Upon this plan the Infant Don John was to act for the king of Castile, the bishop of Saragossa for the king of Arragon, and the king of Portugal was to be the umpire; of all which Don Ferdinand gave notice to the queen his mother, desiring her consent, which she declined, but promised him not to oppose it. In consequence of this agreement, the king of Portugal came into Castile, and was received every-where with all possible magnificence: he then repaired to the place of conference, which was Campillo, where things were quickly settled, at the expence, as the queen dowager foresaw, of the king her son; for it was agreed, that the river Segura should be the common boundary between the dominions of the two monarchs in the kingdom of Murcia; so that not only the town and fortress of Alicant, but also several other places, and all the country on the north of that river, was yielded to the crown of Arragon^r. This great affair decided, they proceeded to another, which was still of higher importance; for Don Ferdinand consented to refer the pretensions of the Infants de la Cerda to the kings of Arragon and Portugal, who determined that Don Alonso de la Cerda should have Alba de Tormes, Bejar, Valdecarneja, Mançanares, Monçon, Gaton, Gibraelon, Aljaba, and other places, the revenue of which altogether was esteemed at four hundred thousand marvadies; that Don Ferdinand de la Cerda, his younger brother, should have the revenue of an Infant of Spain; and, on the other hand, the few places that Don Alonso still held were to be evacuated, and both brothers were to render homage to the king, previous to their reaping any benefit by this decision^s. These great points over, all the three royal A. D. 1305.

THE king, Don Ferdinand, began now to have a clearer notion of things, and to be able to form a better judgment of men; but he still had his favourites, though the Infant Don John and Don Juan de Lara were no longer such: he was also very desirous of power, though hitherto he had enjoyed but a very limited authority. In order to compass these points, he found it absolutely necessary to bring back Don Diego de Haro to his duty, for he began to perceive the truth of what his mother had often told him, that he was a person of greater honour, and more to be depended upon, than any of the rest. The point in difference was between him and Don Juan, who claimed to be the heir of Biscay in right of his wife, the daughter of Don Lopez de Haro, Don Diego's elder brother. On the other side, b Don Diego insisted upon his right as the heir male, and also in virtue of an agreement made with the Infant Don Juan and his wife, by which an equivalent was stipulated, and to the strict performance of which they had sworn. For the decision of this dispute, an assembly of the states was called, but they rose without determining any thing, Don Diego being in possession of Biscay, and fully determined to keep it. Don Juan de Lara also, being offended with the Infant Don Juan, for not taking care of his interests in the treaty with the king of Arragon, entered into a close alliance with Don Diego de Haro, which offended the king extremely, as, through certain stories that had been told him, which, however, were false, he had conceived an extreme dislike to Don Juan, whom he seems to have fixed upon already for an example to the rest of the nobility, that, by his punishment, they might be taught c obedience.

THE king, Don Ferdinand, laboured first to detach Don Diego de Haro from that close alliance he had contracted with Don Juan de Lara; in order to which, he proposed making his son, Don Lopez de Haro, master of his household; which post his father did not hinder him from accepting, but refused entering into any engagements either to procure or preserve it. On the contrary, he brought Don Jura de Lara, after this, to court, and laboured all in his power to reconcile him to his master, which was also done in appearance. But, notwithstanding this agreement, the king, who could no longer bridle his temper, marched with a body of his own troops, and with another, commanded by the Infant Don Juan, though his mother laboured all she could to prevent it, against Don Juan de Lara, at Aranda. He d was very hard pressed, but found means to escape; and, which must have astonished the monarch of Castile, passed through the midst of his camp with an escort of horse, in order to join Don Diego and Don Lopez de Haro, who were come, with a great body of forces, to his assistance. The king marched against them with his army, being extremely provoked at a message from the two lords, importing, that, as he made war upon them, he ought to release their allegiance. The king's army beginning to crumble away, and those that remained acting rather according to their own notions than in obedience to orders, the Infant Don Juan, by the king's command, began to reprove some of the gentlemen who served therein; upon which they told him, that it was not the king's quarrel but his; and that, since he was become weary of their company, they were very willing to leave him. As soon as the king e observed this, he had recourse again to negotiation, and, by the interposition of the queen his mother, all things were at last adjusted upon these terms, that Don Diego de Haro should hold Biscay during his life, and that, upon his demise, that country, a very few places excepted, should belong to the Infant Don Juan and his wife, or to their heirs.

THIS treaty, which had been made with a great deal of secrecy, did not become public till the assembly of the states, held in the month of April at Valladolid, was called upon to ratify and confirm it. This had such an effect on the temper of Don Juan de Lara, who considered it as a scheme laid for his destruction, that he quitted the place abruptly, after giving some public testimonies of discontent. The queen-mother was, for the first time, misled, and gave her son advice which he and she both had reason to repent; and this was, to carry things f to extremity against Don Juan, as the most effectual means to restore some lustre to the royal authority. Don Juan, having early intelligence of this, threw himself into the fortress of Torde hueros, with a small body of good troops: the king quickly invested him, and, though he made a very stout defence, brought him so low, that he was obliged to demand a conference with the Infant Don Juan. At this meeting he put the Infant in mind of their former friendship; observed, that though himself might be the first, it was not probable he should be the last victim; and that it was very unnatural for wise men to be the authors of their own destruction. This had its effect; the Infant Don Juan proposed very high terms to the king, in the name of Don Juan de Lara, and, upon his rejecting them, as he expected, insinuated to all the nobility, that the king was bent upon taking Don Juan's life, who, tho'

a a victim to justice in his eyes, ought to appear a martyr in theirs; upon which they unanimously shewed an inclination to change sides, Don Diego de Haro only excepted. The king, seeing things in this situation, desired him to interpose with Don Juan, and to advise him to come and ask his pardon, which he very readily did; and the king, having received him into favour, bent all his thoughts to the humbling the Infant Don Juan, who had been the principal author of all the disturbances during his reign². About this time the knights Templars, who were prosecuted throughout all Europe, surrendered all their possessions in Spain to the Infant Don Philip, till the suit against them should be determined; and this involved him in a quarrel with the Infant Don Juan, who pretended that some of his vassals had been oppressed and injured by the Infant Don Philip, for the redress of which he had recourse to arms.

b THE king, by the advice of his mother, neglected nothing that might engage that prince to return to his duty, which, however, was no very easy task; and, after a long negotiation, Don Juan prevailed, or, to speak with propriety, forced upon the king a change of measures and of ministers, whom he removed and replaced at his pleasure³. This done, the kings of Castile and Aragon had an interview at the monastery of Huerta, where it was agreed, that prince James of Aragon should marry the Infanta Leonora of Castile; that both monarchs should make war on the Moors; and that they should send ambassadors to Rome, to procure such bulls from the pope as might, in some measure, supply the necessary expence⁴. In pursuance of these resolutions, the king of Castile took the field with a very numerous army, after c he had dispatched Don Juan de Lara to Rome as his ambassador. He had also a good fleet at sea, which induced him to change the first plan of operation, and to besiege Algezira, which was become exceeding strong, and was considered as one of the most important places that belonged to the king of Granada. While this siege was carried on, the king's army made various expeditions by detachments from before the place; in one of which they became masters of Gibraltar, then of no great consequence, and in another they lost Don Alonso Perez de Guzman, who had done so many and so great services to the crown of *Spain*⁵. They might also have taken Algezira, if the Infant Don Juan had not abruptly quitted the siege, which induced many of the nobility to follow his example. Upon this the king of Granada offered Don Ferdinand a sum of money, together with Quesada and Bedmar, which had been d recovered by the Moors, if he would conclude a separate peace, with which, finding himself unable to carry on the war, he complied⁶.

THE king, in his return from this campaign, meditated a strange design, which he thought requisite to his own safety, and this was removing out of the world the Infant Don Juan, from whom he had received so much vexation. He began with attaching Don Juan de Lara, who was returned from his embassy, to his service, by bestowing upon him the important post of master of his household; though, in order to do this, he was obliged to remove the Infant Don Pedro his brother⁷. The marriage of his sister the Infanta Donna Elizabeth with John duke of Bretagne, which was to be celebrated at Burgos, seemed to offer the king a fair opportunity of executing a design that nothing could justify. The queen-mother invited the e Infant Don Juan to that solemnity, who was so cautious as to demand a safe-conduct, which the queen readily granted: the king, notwithstanding this, directed those, who had his orders to kill the Infant, to post themselves in such a manner, as to surprize him in his return from visiting the queen-mother. The preparations for this black affair could not be so secretly managed, but that they came to the ear of this princess, who thought herself bound in honour to give notice of his danger to the Infant Don Juan, who fled privately out of the city, and was followed by many of the nobility, who did not know what designs might be formed against them⁸. This attempt upon the Infant Don Juan rendered him more powerful, and not at all less troublesome, than before; so that the king was obliged to have recourse to the pope, to whom he insinuated, that some of his seditious subjects hindered him from making f war upon the Infidels, and therefore desired, that authority might be given to some ecclesiastics to restrain them from troubling his government, by threatening them with the censures of the church; which favour he obtained⁹. On the third of August, the queen, Donna Constance, was delivered of her son the Infant Don Alonso; but the joy occasioned thereby was quickly clouded by the king's falling dangerously sick at Palencia, from which, however, he recovered, contrary to the opinion of his physicians¹⁰. The heavy accusations brought against the knights Templars being thoroughly examined, in a council held at Salamanca for that purpose, the order was acquitted, to the great honour of that assembly, which equally disregarded private views and popular clamour¹¹. A revolution also happened in Granada, where

Fresh disturbances break out, to the great detriment of the king and kingdom.

THE kings of Castile and Arragon, having an interview at Calatayud, agreed upon another marriage between the Infant Don Pedro, the king's brother, and Donna Maria, the daughter of the king of Arragon^l. The queen-mother, Donna Maria, with the assistance of several prelates, brought about a reconciliation between the king and the Infant Don Juan and his party, which had like to have proved fatal to this monarch; for having invited them to a supper, and exceeding a little in his usual course of diet, he was seized with a distemper which, not without imminent danger, he escaped^m. But, notwithstanding this agreement, new disputes quickly arose, and Don Juan de Lara, doubting of his safety, retired into

Portugal. The prudence of the queen-mother prevented this flame from breaking out; but, however, the measures concerted with the king of Arragon for renewing the war against the Moors, were, for the present, hindered by these jealousies from being put in executionⁿ. The king of Castile reclaimed from the king of Portugal the places given up in his minority, by the Infant Don Henry; and the king his father-in-law, to prevent disputes, offered to leave all the matters in difference to the king of Arragon, which was accepted; but it seems the great point of Don Ferdinand was to get a little money, to procure which he mortgaged to the crown of Portugal Badajos and some other places, as the Portuguese historians inform us^o. b

THE factions and disturbances which had hitherto limited the king's power and inclinations, being in some measure appeased, the king laid before the states at Valladolid the expediency of renewing the war with the Moors, and proposed to them a plan for that purpose; with which they were so well pleased, as to take upon themselves the whole expence of the campaign^p. The Infant Don Pedro was declared general and commander in chief, and, in that quality, assembled the forces on the frontiers of Andalusia, and in the beginning of the month of June laid siege to Alcaudeta in the mountains. The king, Don Ferdinand, when the siege was pretty far advanced, set out for the army, and fixed his quarters at Martos, a place at a small distance from the camp: here he found Don Pedro and Don Juan de Carvajal prisoners, who were charged with killing Don Juan Alonso de Benavides, as he came out of the royal apartments, one evening, at Palencia^q. The king was no sooner informed of this, than he ordered them to be thrown over the rock, without any form of trial. The two brothers protested their innocence, of which they affirmed they could give the clearest proofs, but to no purpose. When they came to die, they summoned the king to answer for this act of injustice, at the tribunal of Almighty God, in thirty days^r. The king went to the camp, where he found the siege so far advanced, that there could be no doubt of his becoming master of it very soon; however finding himself indisposed, he thought proper to retire to Jaen, where he signed the capitulation on the fifth of September, and also a peace with the king of Granada, on certain conditions, with which he seemed very much pleased, and he was thought to be out of danger^s. But having taken some refreshment on the seventeenth, and falling afterwards asleep, his domestics, when they came wake him, perceived that he was dead; and what, Ferreras observes, was thought very remarkable by the old historians, this was the thirtieth day from the death of the two brothers. He farther observes, that we ought not from hence to pronounce rashly concerning either his guilt or theirs (O) As his whole c

(O) We find this matter of Don Ferdinand's death very cautiously treated by Mariana (1), who, on the one hand, informs us, that the king was infirm; that he was too much addicted to the pleasures of the table; that he had, more than once, ran the hazard of dying suddenly before of such excesses; and that many think that he died of such an excess now (2). These facts are fairly collected from antient histories. On the other side it appears, that, in the first transports of his passion, the king was exceedingly violent; and that some of his courtiers knew well enough how to excite these transports, and were wicked enough to avail themselves of them against such as they were willing to remove (3). There prevailed at that time a very strong opinion, arising very probably from executions apparently unjust, that such adjudications to the tribunal of God were answered by a particular interposition of Providence; and this, Mariana says, was the common notion with respect to pope Clement the fifth and Philip the Fair of France, whom the knights Templars summoned to appear and answer before God for the crying acts of injustice done to them in this world (4). But he ob-

a whole reign had been a series of confusions, so his death proved the cause of still greater mischiefs, as it made way for another minority, before those evils were in any degree removed that had been introduced during the last; and when there were many of those living, who, from motives of ambition and private interest, had been the principal actors in the disorders of the two last reigns, and who, though farther advanced in years, were not at all better disposed towards each other, or towards the public, which gave those who had its safety and prosperity really at heart a most melancholy prospect.

THE young king, Don Alonso, was scarce entered into the third year of his age, when the death of his father placed him upon the throne; and the prudence of his grandmother recommended him to the care of the bishop of Avila, and the inhabitants of that town, who were distinguished even in Spain for their unalterable affection to their sovereigns¹. That princess having declined the regency, the two principal pretenders to that high office were the Infant Don Pedro and the Infant Don Juan, each of whom came with an army into the neighbourhood of Palencia, where the states were assembled, in order to fix their choice, which, notwithstanding the utmost pains taken by some true patriots, was found impracticable; so that one party retiring to the convent of St. Francis, voted the tutelage and regency to the queen-dowager Donna Maria, and her son the Infant Don Peáro; while those who met at the convent of St. Paul, bestowed their suffrages on the queen-dowager Donna Constantia, and the Infant Don *Juan*². Both parties had recourse to arms; and both endeavoured to get the person of the young king into their hands, in which, however, neither prevailed; but, towards the end of the year, the queen-dowager, Donna Constantia, dying suddenly, opened a prospect of accommodation; and the troubles that broke out amongst the Moors hindered them from reaping any advantage from those which at present distracted the Christians³.

A schism in the assembly of the states and two regents thereupon chosen.

THE queen, having nothing at heart but the public tranquility, earnestly solicited the two Infants to consent to some agreement for that purpose, which she at last brought to bear by her influence over Don Juan; and it was stipulated between them, that the custody of the king's person, and the care of his education, should be left entirely to the queen, and that the regents should exercise that authority respectively in the places by the votes of which they were chosen⁴. In the spring of the succeeding year, this agreement was solemnly confirmed by an assembly of the states at Valladolid; the people of Avila resigned the king's person to the care of the queen his grandmother, who carried him to *Toro*⁵. The Infant Don Pedro embarked in the civil war of Granada, and behaved himself with great reputation⁶. In the month of September there was another assembly of the states at Carrion, where they obliged both the regents to give security for so much of the public money as should come to their hands, and for exhibiting, as often as required, a distinct and just account⁷. The Infant Don Juan saw, with envy and chagrin, the high reputation the Infant Don Pedro had obtained, and therefore hindered his drawing any troops out of the kingdom of Leon, and the rest of the provinces under his jurisdiction; which, however, did not prevent his making a campaign with as much, or rather more, honour than he had acquired by the last⁸. These successes were far from lessening the envy of the Infant Don Juan, who began to take umbrage at the expence. Don Pedro thereupon applied himself to pope John the twenty-second, who directed the archbishop of Toledo, and two other prelates, to publish the croisade, and to raise a large sum of money upon the clergy, for the support of the war; by which Ishmael king of Granada found himself so much pressed, that he demanded succours of the king of Fez, and, to facilitate the receiving them, put Algezira and several other places into his hands, which gave the Christians much concern, and, it is probable, the Infant Don Juan some pleasure⁹.

serves, with regard to the fact before us, it admits of no doubt at all, that is to say, that two brothers certainly summoned the king, fixed the period of thirty days, on the last of which the king died (5); and from hence, in the old Spanish chronicles, he is called Don Fernando el Emplazado (6), that is Don Ferdinand who was impleaded, or called to answer. In cases of this nature historians cannot be too precise, though at the same time this precision does not at all clear the doubt, whether the king died in an ordinary or extraordinary manner, but ascertains the fact only that he was summoned and did die on the thirtieth day (7).

THE Infant Don Juan, who had hitherto troubled himself no farther about the war than to impede it, no sooner perceived that, in virtue of the pope's bull, it produced money, than he demanded a share of it; and this naturally excited fresh disputes. The queen-regent, however, and the pope's nuncio, interposed with some effect. An assembly of the states being held at Valladolid, the two Infants assisted therein; and, to the surprize of most of the nobility, gave unquestionable tokens of their being thoroughly reconciled: upon which it was determined, that the pope's bull's being general, the tax upon the clergy should be levied throughout the whole kingdom, and received by both regents, who, for the future, should equally concur in the military service, as well as in the direction of the civil government; which proposition being cheerfully accepted by the Infant Don Juan, he began to raise forces throughout the whole extent of his government, which, on the other hand, was highly agreeable to the Infant Don Pedro, who found the Moors, in consequence of the supplies they had received from Barbary, much superior to any troops that it was in his power to bring into the field^a. A circumstance that might have had very dangerous consequences to the common cause of the Christians.

In the spring of the succeeding year, the Infant Don Pedro assembled his troops in the kingdom of Jaen, and made himself master of Piscar, in which, through some degree of negligence, the Moors had but a very small garrison; and as soon as he was informed that Don Juan, with the forces under his command, was arrived in Andalusia, he marched without delay to join them at Baena^c. They proceeded from thence into the kingdom of Granada; and, having taken Mora, plundered all the country in the neighbourhood of the capital, till the Moorish army, being completely assembled under the command of Ozmin, a very brave and experienced general, advanced towards them in order of battle, which the Infants did not decline^f. The two armies appeared in sight of each other on the twenty-seventh of June. The Infant Don Juan was on the right, with the forces of Leon and Galicia, the military orders, and the troops of the archbishops of Toledo and Seville; the Infant Don Pedro on the left, with the veteran forces that had been accustomed for so many years to fight and conquer in these wars. The Moors, it is said, made their principal effort against Don Juan, upon a supposition that his troops were fresh raised. But we can scarce depend on what the Spanish authors say of this battle, which they acknowledge to have lost, but are unwilling to own that they were beat. They also admit that both the Infants died upon the spot, but assert that neither of them were killed. Don Juan, say they, finding his troops ready to give ground, sent to his colleague for a reinforcement, which the Infant Don Pedro immediately ordered; but the troops refusing to obey, he rode from one corps to another, exhorted, menaced, beseeched, till, through passion and fatigue, he fell dead from his horse; the news of which being carried to Don Juan, produced the like effect on him; and upon this the army retired in the best order they could, leaving, however, the body of Don Juan upon the field, which the Moors, on their request, permitted them to search out the next day, in order to its being interred^g (P).

(P) The true circumstances of this battle, and of the manner in which the two infants lost their lives, are not easy to be collected, more especially from the ancient historians (1). The most probable relation, however, is that of Marianna's (2), which the reader may compare with what is said in the text, and which, therefore, we should have placed there, if that author had cited his authorities. He tells us, that when the Infant Don Juan joined the army, which was very numerous, since there were no fewer than nine thousand horse in the field, he was resolved to advance into the neighbourhood of Granada, in order to attack the whole force of the Moors, who, as he assures us, kept close within the place, and could not be provoked to fight on any terms. When the army had continued there all Saturday and Sunday, without performing any thing of consequence, and without being able to invest the place, it was found requisite, or rather necessary, on the Monday, to retire; the Infant Don Pedro, who had hitherto commanded the rear, being now in the van, and Don John, who had been all along in the front, having the command of the rear. It was then that Ozmin marched out of Granada, with five thousand horse, and a proportionable body of infantry, not with any thoughts of fighting, or at least of coming to a general engagement, but with a view to harrafs the Christians in their retreat. In order to do this the more effectually, Ozmin directed his march so, that the army of the Infants was obliged to move all day long without being able to come at any water, and this, as the weather was excessively hot, distressed them to the last degree; which, when Ozmin perceived, and that the two Infants persisted in this precipitate retreat, he caused several small bodies of horse to approach very near, and even to attack them, but with express orders to retire as soon as the Christians put themselves in a posture of defence, by which method having tired them gradually, till they were scarce able to move; at length, when it was evening, he attacked the rear-guard and threw them speedily into confusion. It was then that the Infant Don Pedro faced about, and a THIS disaster, for such it certainly was, and the victory plainly on the side of the Moors, had most terrible consequences; for the enemy made themselves masters of Huesca and several other places, ravaged the country about Jaen, and took the town but not the citadel of Martos, while those who ought to have been employed in the defence of their country were contending about the regency^h. The number of these pretenders was greater than at the death of Don Ferdinand: of these the chief were the Infant Don Philip, uncle to the king; Don Juan Emanuel, who had the command of the frontier of Murcia, son to the Infant Don Emanuel and the Infanta Donna Constantia of Arragon, Don Juan, son to the Infant Don Juan, and Don Ferdinand de la Cerda, who was just reconciled to the court; and each of these endeavoured to raise forces, in order to support his claim by dint of armsⁱ. Another

b singular event happened soon after, which was the marriage and divorce, on the same day, of the prince of Arragon and the Infanta Leonora; for as soon as the ceremony was over, the prince declared that what he had done was to oblige his father, and to comply with the terms of the treaty between the two crowns: that he took no exception whatever to the princess; but that, nevertheless, he was determined not to live with her; and soon after this abrupt parting with his wife, he publicly relinquished all right to the crown, which the states of the kingdom secured to his younger brother^k.

c THE disturbances in Castile increased daily, and the calmness, moderation, and prudence of the queen, which had formerly done so much, was now less effectual; but however, what little was done could be attributed to nothing else. She granted many favours to Donna Maria Diaz, the widow of the Infant Don Juan, and to his son, who was surnamed the deformed, which induced them to ask more; so that the queen was at length forced to refuse, and afford them that pretence which they wanted for being ingrateful. She raised Don Ferdinand de la Cerda to the post of master of the king's household; for which, at the time, he was exceedingly thankful, but deserted her soon after, though he still kept his employment^l. Don Juan Emanuel was so desirous of being regent, that he took the title before it could be given him; and his assuming it induced the Infant Don Philip to do the like; which divided the best part of the kingdom, even to the frontiers, where Cordova declared for Don Juan, and the city of Seville for the Infant^m. Don Juan the deformed had a great party in the states of Castile, assembled at Burgos, and was for obliging both parties to lay aside the title before a legal regent was elected, having great hopes that this would make way for himself; but the queen, Donna Maria, acquainted this assembly, that it would be by far more safe to confirm those who had taken the title of regents, than to augment the confusion by declaring a third, to which they acquiescedⁿ.

d BUT Don Juan the deformed, in conjunction with Don Ferdinand de la Cerda and others, entered into a solemn confederacy, and then sent the queen word, that, if she would not unite with them against her son the Infant Don Philip they would join unanimously with Don Juan Emanuel against her and the Infant both. The queen was so embarrassed, that she knew not which way to move; she had no great reliance upon Don Juan Emanuel, tho' he had treated her from the beginning with great civility and respect; and tho' the party of the Infant Don Philip was strong, yet by no means strong enough to act against all the rest. At length, to gain time and better advice, she sent the confederates word, that they should have her final answer by the mouth of the cardinal legate, whom the pope had sent on purpose to assist her in quieting these disorders; with which they were little satisfied^o. In the mean time the Infant Don Philip concluded a truce with the king of Granada, for that part of Andalusia which acknowledged his authority, which left that monarch at liberty to besiege Lorca. The inhabitants having no reason to hope for succours, defended themselves with that obstinacy, which despair only would have engaged the troops he commanded to march to their relief; but they were so excessively fatigued, and withal so extremely provoked against the Infant Don Juan, whom they looked upon as the sole author of all their misfortunes, that they did not move; which threw Don Pedro into such a passion as quite overcame his spirits, weakened by long travel, extreme heat, and great thirst, so that he fell from his horse, being either struck with death, or killed by the fall; which fatal accident was the principal cause of that total route which followed, and that must naturally have been attended with a prodigious loss, and made way for the Moors recovering abundance of places that had been taken from them by the Christians but a little before, and which either were not fortified, or, upon the first news of this defeat, were abandoned, as was common enough on all sides in these wars (3).

can inspire, and ruined the army of the Moors to such a degree, that the king was at length ^a obliged to raise the siege, and retire into his own territories^p.

The queen Donna Maria dies, which greatly augments the disturbances in Castile.

THE cardinal legate assured the confederates, on the part of the queen, that, since it was absolutely necessary to the peace of the kingdom, she would prevail upon the Infant Don Philip to desist from his pretensions of the regency, and, at the same time, the cardinal offered to use his utmost endeavours with Don Juan Emanuel to do the same. But when he entered upon this negotiation, he found little probability of success: at length, however, he prevailed, that nobleman being rather wearied than persuaded into a compliance^q. This point gained, the cardinal called a council at Valladolid, to regulate the discipline of the church, which, as we may easily imagine, had suffered exceedingly in those times of confusion; and the cardinal was of opinion, that the clergy could have no weight, while their lives did no credit to their doctrine^r. This council hindered the assembly of the states from being opened at Palencia so early as otherwise it might have been, and it was hardly opened, before the queen, Donna Maria, was seized by that distemper which carried her to her grave. She died, as she had lived, with firmness and tranquility of mind; pious without affectation, and supported her dignity by the lustre of her virtues. In her last moments she exhorted the nobility to be careful of the person, and attentive to the education, of their young monarch, and to have a just respect for his sister the Infanta Donna Leonora. She breathed her last on the first of June, when the affairs of the kingdom were in the utmost confusion; and in this respect her demise was a favourable event; for it affected all parties to such a degree, that the cardinal legate prevailed upon them to consent to a cessation of hostilities for the remainder of the year^s.

A. D. 1322.

Infant Don Philip and Don Juan Emanuel act as regents, and against each other.

As soon as that term was expired, a civil war broke out in all quarters, with so much the more fury, as it had been checked by this short restraint: Don Juan Emanuel shewed that his cruelty was equal to his ambition, by the murder of some persons of distinction in Castile, which rendered him universally hated, and gave great advantages to the Infant Don Philip. To sustain himself after so flagrant an error, he was constrained to join with Don Juan the deformed and Don Ferdinand de la Cerda; and this confederacy enabled him to bring an army into the field, sufficient to look the Infant in the face, but they did not judge it proper to fight^t. The young king, Don Alonso, seeing nothing but discord, confusion, and bloodshed, amongst his subjects, and his own influence scarce extending farther than his court, wrote to the principal magistrates in all the great cities, to put them in mind that he should very soon be of age, and that they ought to reflect that they could then have no other master^u.

Don Alonso begins to take upon himself the government, as soon as turned of fourteen.

THESE letters had some little effect, and but a little: however, he no sooner entered his fifteenth year, than he made choice of a person of integrity and probity to go to the city of Seville, in order to feel the pulse of the inhabitants. He executed his commission so discreetly, that the citizens declared for the king, who lost no time in going thither. Upon his arrival, he issued his letters for convoking a general assembly of the states at Valladolid; to which both the regents resorted, and laid down their authority^v. This pacific disposition did not last long: Don Juan Emanuel quitted the court in discontent, and projected a marriage between his daughter and Don Juan the deformed, that he might attach him effectually to his interests. Those who were about the young king's person, saw plainly the consequences that would attend such an alliance, and insinuated unto him, that the only way to prevent it was to espouse Donna Constantia himself; and, upon the first whisper of this, Don Juan Emanuel returned to Valladolid, in the highest transport of loyalty and affection for the king's service^x.

Alonso with much severity, in order to recover some appearance of justice.

THE king, Don Alonso, when he had once taken possession, was resolved not to pass his days as his father had done, with the title of sovereign, and in a state of subjection. We may be thought to assume this hastily, considering his tender age, and that we ought rather to ascribe it to such as were about his person and in his favour. However, as the king was the chief actor in all that was done, and as things of that kind could not have been done, but by a person capable of contriving them, we take this for a convincing argument, that, young as he was, Don Alonso might listen to the advice, but not to the dictates, of his ministers. He formed a small corps of troops, which were constantly about his person, picked men, and thoroughly devoted to his service. With these he pursued a crew of banditti to the castle of Valdenebra, strong by situation, though but indifferently fortified. The king summoned the place in form; but these desperate wretches refused to submit; upon which he caused it to be attacked, and, being carried by storm, put every

a one of the malefactors to that kind of death he deserved^y (Q). He pursued the same conduct to the same sort of people, where-ever they could be found, and this, in a few months, cleared all the great roads in Spain, that had been, for many years, infested by these banditti, who retired to Don Juan the deformed for protection^z.

At Burgos the king chastised severely such as had been guilty of cruelty and oppression during his minority, but at the same time took a resolution of gaining Don Juan the deformed, if it was practicable, by fair means, though he knew that he had been practising with the courts of Arragon and Portugal to raise fresh disturbances, and had laboured to engage Don Alonso de la Cerda to revive his claim to the crown. He came, at the king's command, to Burgos, attended by a strong corps of troops, and by a stronger of banditti

b and murderers, and, in complaisance to him, the king forbid his subjects to molest them. He then tried every method, and made all the offers possible, to engage Don Juan to return to his duty, and to give him proper assurances of it; but he refused, to which he was principally moved by an advertisement from Don Juan Emanuel, that, in becoming the king's father-in-law, he did not cease to be his friend^a. After parting in this manner, he visited the rest of Castile, punishing malefactors wherever he came with unrelenting severity. On his arrival at Toro, and receiving advice of new intrigues between the two Don Juans, he ordered his favourite Don Alvaro Nugnez Osorio to engage Don Juan the deformed to come to him, under pretence that the king was inclined to give him the Infanta Donna Leonora. With some difficulty he was drawn thither, and received by the king, on the last day of October, with

c all imaginable marks of kindness and favour^b. The next day he was invited to a feast, but as he entered the hall he was stabbed, and two gentlemen with him, who, upon the first appearance of violence, had drawn in his defence^c. The very next day the king appeared in public, and being seated on a throne of state, and having admitted persons of all ranks into his presence, he stood up, and told them that Don Juan was a traitor, whom the misfortunes of the times had rendered too big for the laws; that his crimes, which he enumerated, together with the proofs, made it necessary to remove him, which had been done by his orders, to prevent a new civil war; that notwithstanding this, he meant to make the laws the measure of his authority; and that none of his subjects had reason to fear, from what had happened to Don Juan, except those who meant to imitate his conduct. He proceeded next to seize d all his estates; and having given an equivalent in money to Donna Maria Diaz, the mother of the late Don Juan, he annexed the lordship of Biscay to the crown^d. Don Juan Emanuel, though he had just gained a considerable victory over the Moors, made a truce with the king of Granada, and retired to the castle of Chinchilla, resolved not to trust his person in the hands of a prince capable of such sentiments and such actions^e.

(Q) The chief persons about the young king were Don Garcilasso de la Vega, who had been lord lieutenant of Castile, strongly attached to the Infant Don Pedro, and, for that reason, extremely hated by the Infant Don Juan, and his son Don Alvaro Nunez Osorio, a young cavalier of a good family, much of the king's disposition, the companion of his diversions, and rather his favourite than his minister. We must add to these one Joseph a Jew, upon whom he chiefly relied in affairs relating to money, as had been long the custom in Spain, notwithstanding the clamour of the people, the complaints of the clergy, and the remonstrances of the pope (4). The first of these might possibly give the young king some useful information as to the state of his affairs; but it is more likely that his grandmother instructed him in the capital maxims of government, and pointed out to him particularly the mischiefs arising from faction, and how much it was in his interest to reduce the exorbitant power of those great lords who made no difficulty of opposing the royal authority, and who thought they had a right to oppress the people, while they were so lucky as to have vassals ready to fight in defence of this extravagant power in their lords, and, which is still more extraordinary, inclined to mistake this power for liberty. But it is not at all probable that either the queen or his ministers put any of the great things which he afterwards performed into this young prince's head; because, in fact they wear the appearance of originals, and flow intirely from the same spirit which the king Don Alonso exerted when he was certainly at liberty to follow the bent of his own disposition (6). This attack of the castle of Valdenebra, the first of his exploits, affords a sufficient proof of the truth of what we advanced; he was desirous to establish a reputation of justice, and to make the first instances of that severity which he saw would be requisite to restore the royal dignity and public peace altogether unexceptionable even to the wisest, universally agreeable to the nation in general; and having by this step formed the character, and made an impression, we shall see him, through his whole reign, pursuing his first point; and laying the foundation of his own greatness, in the ruin of faction (7).

Archbishop of Toledo, brother to Don Juan Emanuel, removed from the chancellor. THE next year the king went to Segovia, and enquired into a seditious tumult that had happened there two years before, in which some blood had been shed, and for which those who had been most culpable were now severely punished. Thence he proceeded to Toledo, hearing the complaints of the people wherever he came, enquiring diligently into the truth of the facts, and punishing, with equal severity, such as had been guilty of bad actions, and such as were either weak or wicked enough to bring false accusations^f. While he resided there, the Infant Don Philip died on the fifth of June, much regretted by his nephew^g. Upon certain intelligence that Don Juan Emanuel was endeavouring to raise fresh troubles, the king removed his brother-in-law, the archbishop of Toledo, from the post of chancellor, with which that prelate was so offended, that he exchanged his see for that of Tarragona^h. As for Don Juan Emanuel, no invitations or promises could induce him to quit his retreat, where he studied how to revive those troubles to which he owed his greatness, and issued his orders on all sides to his dependents, agreeable to these resolutions; of which the king being informed, he gave the government of the marches of the kingdom of Murcia, which Don Juan inherited from his father, to a nobleman upon whom he could more safely relyⁱ.

In consequence of which the disorders become much greater than ever.

THE next year the king took the field against the Moors, with whom Don Juan Emanuel had entered into an alliance. The king ordered the admiral of Castile to clear the seas, who defeated a strong squadron from Barbary, with troops on board; and coming to pay his duty to the king of Seville, presented him with 300 slaves. The king laid siege to Olvera, and from thence made some expeditions, in which he was not very successful; however, he persisted in his design, and at length reduced that and several other places^k. On the frontiers of Murcia there was an insurrection, excited by Don Juan, which had no great effect; however, the king, who would not be insulted without shewing his resentment, immediately gave away all his employments; and, which perhaps was not altogether so justifiable, put his daughter, Donna Constantia, who had born the title of queen, under a guard. Don Juan, upon this, sent him word that he renounced his allegiance, and that he looked upon himself as at liberty to take what measures he pleased^l. He then addressed himself to the king of Arragon, representing how nearly his daughter was allied in blood to that crown, and how injurious the usage was that she had met with from the king of Castile. His complaints were held reasonable, and that monarch promised him all the assistance in his power, in hopes of which Don Juan, with what forces he could collect, began to make inroads into Castile, which he wasted with fire and sword^m.

WE have already seen the great troubles and disturbances arising from ambition, resentment, and private interest; but nothing hitherto related comes near to those troubles that were excited by Don Juan Emanuel, whose turbulent spirit was supported by abilities, that Providence, in compassion to human society, very rarely bestows upon such men. A body of troops from Arragon traversed the dominions of Castile, in order to join him, and marked their route with fire and sword, wherever they passed. The prior of St. John, who was very closely connected with Don Juan, prevailed upon Toro, Zamora, and some other places, to declare against the king, under pretence that he was wholly governed by Don Alvaro Nunez Osorio, whom the king had lately created count of *Traстамара*ⁿ. The king, who had assembled a considerable army near Seville, passed from thence to Cordova, where he caused Don Juan Ponce de Cabrera to be beheaded for the share he had in the sedition raised there, and put some other persons to death on the same account; and having found means to engage the court of Arragon, where Don Alonso had lately mounted the throne, to withdraw his countenance from Don Juan, he caused Escalona to be invested, which was one of the strongest places in Don Juan's possession^o. In the mean time, Garcilasso de la Vega, whom he had promoted to the dignity of chancellor, being at Soria in Castile, and having declared that he had the king's orders to provide, in the most effectual manner, for the security of that kingdom, some secret friends of Don Juan whispered it about, that he had private orders to put some persons of distinction to death. This gave rise to a conspiracy, in consequence of which, the chancellor was stabbed on his knees at church, with twenty-four persons more, amongst whom were his son, and several of high rank^p. The king, having concluded a marriage with Donna Maria, Infanta of Portugal, which he intended to celebrate as soon as the campaign was over, sent for Donna Leonora his sister from Valladolid, when, through the arts of Don Juan, a rumour being spread that the king intended to marry her to his favourite the count of Traстамара, the people revolted, upon which the king was obliged to raise the siege of Escalona, to march thither. The count thereupon retired to his castle of Belbar, where he commenced rebel in his turn; but Don Juan Ramirez, with the king's consent, pretended to desert him, and being kindly received by the count, took an opportunity to stab him; this put an end to all the insurrections in Castile: the king, towards the close of the year, celebrated his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, and gave his sister, Donna Eleonora, in marriage to Don Alonso, king of Arragon; and thus an end

A. D. 1328.

- In the beginning of the next year, the king having held an assembly of the states of Burgos, and conducted his sister, Donna Leonora, to the frontiers of Arragon, he concluded an alliance, offensive and defensive, with the monarch of that country, and with the king of Portugal, in order to prosecute the war against the Moors with effect^c. The conferences for this purpose being over, the king went to Soria, where he made a strict inquisition into the murder of Garcilasso de la Vega, punished such of the principal persons with death as could be found, and seized the estates and effects of such as had concerted their security by a quick retreat^d. Don Juan Emanuel in the mean time had projected several marriages, by the means of which he proposed to aggrandize Don Ferdinand de la Cerda, Don Juan de Lara, and to bind them to his party, of which, though the king had timely information, yet he made fresh offers to that potent lord, to engage him to return to his duty, and even went so far as to offer to set his daughter at liberty, and to pay him a considerable sum of money, if, instead of disturbing the peace of his country, he would concur in making war against the Moors^e.
- c 1329.

- Don Alonso*, after conferring once more with the king of Portugal, proceeded to the frontiers, and finding his forces in excellent order, began the operations of the campaign with the siege of Tebe. Ozmin, who commanded the Moorish army, practised various stratagems in order to divide the Christian troops, but to no purpose: however, he encouraged the besieged to make a gallant defence, afforded them frequent succours, and spun out the campaign to the first of August, when the place surrendered, and the Moors abandoned several little towns and castles in the neighbourhood^f. Upon the king's return to Seville, he entered into an amour with Donna Leonora de Guzman, a lady of high quality, and great endowments, by whom he had several children (R). There he received ambassadors from the king of Granada, who

(R) We are constrained, in order to render the current of our relation more intelligible, to enter a little into the secret history of this reign, which, though we are always unwilling to do, yet is sometimes requisite to be done. By comparing the Spanish and Portuguese historians one might be tempted to affirm that Don Alonso of Castile had at this time no less than three wives, or, to speak with propriety, who were, or whom he persuaded to think themselves such. The first was Donna Maria of Portugal, whom he married rather from a principle of policy than affection, and with whom he lived but indifferently, reproaching her with the want of issue, though they had not been long married, and which, some writers tell us, she took pains to wipe away (5). She was a prudent woman; and knew how to dissemble more passions than one. The second was Donna Leonora de Guzman, the daughter of Don Pedro Nunez de Guzman, and the widow of Don Juan de Velasco, lately deceased: her riches and her wit set off to great advantage a person so fine, that she was esteemed the greatest beauty in Spain. The king, from the time he became enamoured of her, preserved no decency in his family or with the world, but behaved towards her in public as if she had been his queen, while Donna Maria had as little state about her as if she had been his mistress (6). The third was Donna Constantia, the daughter of Don Juan Emanuel, to whom the king had been contracted, and with whom he continued to hold a private correspondence by letters, in which he told her that she was the first mistress of his affections, and gave her hopes that, by the help of a divorce, she might one day become the partner of his bed and throne (7). Each had their political intrigues. The prior of St. John, who had excited the great revolt in Castile, was the queen's chancellor; and through him she corresponded with Don Juan Emanuel and Don Juan de Lara, in favour of whom she brought the king her father into a war with the king her husband (8). Donna Leonora had also a correspondence with Don Juan Emanuel, and with other great persons about the court, who knew that to gain her was the only way to gain the king's favour. Donna Constantia, by her father's direction, managed a correspondence with the king with great dignity and decency; acknowledged that her hopes were once fixed upon him; reproached him with the ill usage of his queen; and intimated that his mistress had other gallants (9). In a word, Donna Leonora knew how to govern the king, and was proud of it. The queen was able to govern herself, and, by doing so, triumphed in the end. Donna Constantia, by her address, maintained an interest in the king, till, by his consent, she espoused the prince of Portugal, of which country she became afterwards queen.

Alonso de la Cerde into favour, and grants him an

THE king returning from Seville into Castile, was met in his passage, very unexpectedly, by Don Alonso de la Cerda, who told him, that being heartily weary of the life he had hitherto led, he was very desirous of passing the remainder of his life in peace; and that, forgetting past disputes, he hoped the monarch of Castile would consider him as a prince of his blood, and as his faithful subject. The king received him with the utmost affection, gave him an ample establishment, and assured him he might depend upon his favour and protection^y. At his coronation the same year, at Burgos, Don Alonso de la Cerda assisted, and did him homage; and the feasts which attended this ceremony, were the most magnificent that ever b had been seen in Castile^z. Don Juan Emanuel, who for two years past had affected to live in such a manner as to give the king no umbrage, entered now into a treaty with Donna Leonora de Guzman, and offered, if she could prevail upon the king to repudiate the Infanta of Portugal, and to marry her, he would return to court, and depend upon her protection; but that lady generously answered, that if he would return to his duty, he might depend upon her favour; but that she did not either hope or desire to espouse the king^a. About the same time, by a stroke of that policy which was natural to him, he caused it to be insinuated to the king of Portugal, that the queen, his daughter, was very miserable; that Donna Leonora de Guzman was in possession of the king's affections, and that his own daughter, Donna Constantia, was a better match for the prince of Portugal, than the king's c niece Donna Blanca, daughter to the Infant Pedro, who had many infirmities^b.

Band, which is since grown into disuse.

THE king, who had intelligence of these proceedings, instituted a new order of knight-hood, with a political view of attaching those, upon whom it was conferred, in a more particular manner to his person, which, from the knights wearing a ribbon over their right shoulder, was stiled the order of the band. At first it was in very high esteem, but by degrees grew into disuse^c. The king of Granada made this year a voyage to Africa, in order to demand assistance from Abul-Affan, king of Morocco, under pretence that Don Alonso of Castile had nothing so much at heart as the utter extirpation of the Mohammedans in Spain, and having obtained from him the promise of powerful succours, and a present supply of 7000 horse, he returned very well satisfied into his own dominions, where he no sooner arrived, than he re- d renewed his intrigues with Don Juan Emanuel; who was employed in raising a new citadel at Uclès. He had engaged Don Juan Nugnez de Lara, and several other persons of great distinction, in a confederacy; and it was agreed that they should be all ready to act at a convenient time^d. The queen, Donna Maria, was brought to-bed of the Infant Don Ferdinand, and soon after Donna Leonora Guzman was delivered of Don Sancho, to whom the king gave the lordship of Le Desma^e.

forms the siege.

THE reinforcement from Africa arrived on board a fleet of transports from Morocco at Algezira, under the command of Abul Malic, the son of Abul Affan; the Christian fleet, under the command of Don Alonso Tenorio, having put to sea with an intention to hinder them from debarking, but came too late^f. The first service the African troops performed, e was besieging Gibraltar, in which commanded Don Vasco Perez de Meyra. Don Alonso of Castile, upon advice of this siege, assembled a powerful army in order to relieve it, and in his march had a conference with Don Juan Emanuel and Don Juan de Lara, who pretended an inclination to submit themselves, and invited the king to dine with them in their castle of Becerril, which he accepted, and they promised to dine with him the next day; but, either through fear or falsehood, they broke their words, and the treaty came to nothing^g. Not long after this, Don Juan Emanuel sent the king word, that if he would order his arrears to be paid, he would make a powerful diversion through the kingdom of Jaen, and prevent the kingdom of Granada from joining Abul-Malic. Don Alonso, like a great prince, complied with his demand; Don Juan Emanuel behaved also like himself, that is, he took the money, f and broke his word^h. The king, however, marched to the relief of Gibraltar, but when he was within sight of the place, he was informed that the governor had betrayed it.

DON Alonso continued to advance, invested that place, and besieged it, but for want of provisions was forced to raise the siege; however, a supply arriving just as the army broke up, the king returned thither againⁱ. - a within his entrenchments, and could not be drawn out to fight. All his caution, however, proved ineffectual; for Don Juan Emanuel, Don Juan de Lara, and Don Juan Alonso de Haro, with the very money that the king had given them, had raised forces, and ravaged Castile in such a manner, that the king was obliged to conclude a truce with the Moors, and to march to the relief of his subjects; another motive which determined him to this measure, was the intelligence he had received, that several lords in the kingdom of Jaen were on the point of joining the Moors, for which he caused one of their heads to be struck off, when he arrived in those parts; but the rest executed their purpose, and fled to Granada^k. The king's affairs, however, were in so perplexed a situation, that the king of Morocco, refusing to ratify the truce, unless the tribute of the king of Granada was remitted, he was obliged to comply, his subjects in Castile being so much distressed by the rebels, that they dispatched express upon express to hasten the king's march to their assistance, which, without doubt, afflicted him extremely, after all the pains he had taken to recover these noblemen to his service^l.

But though the king was very impatient, and did all that was in his power to comply with the requests of his subjects, yet it was Lent before he was able to leave Seville. When he came to Ciudad Real, a gentleman brought him a letter from Don Juan de Lara, in which he told him that he quitted his service for ever, and renounced his allegiance: the king having read this epistle, said it came a little too late, that he wasted his territories, and oppressed his people while he was yet in his service, and his subject; and therefore, said he, take this honest gentleman, who has been in all his secrets, and made no scruple of sharing in his rebellion, and strike off his hands and feet, and then his head^m. This struck a great terror, and made people less inclined to have any correspondence with malecontents. The king prosecuted the war against Don Juan de Lara with incredible diligence, and hunted him very closely; but not being able to take him, he went into Biscay, which country he entirely reducedⁿ. Upon his return to Burgos, a man was seized with letters from Don Juan Alonso de Haro, to Don Juan Emanuel, and Don Juan de Lara, in which he pressed them not to submit to the king, but to do him all the mischief they could, assuring them of succours from the viceroy of Navarre. The king marched immediately, and surprised Don Juan de Haro in his castle, whom, after he had reproached with his perfidious behaviour, he ordered to be put to death; but he gave his lands to his two brothers^o.

- d AFTER all this, Don Juan de Lara wrote to some persons near the king, that, perceiving he was marked for destruction, he was desirous of knowing whether the king was inexorable or not; and, if not, he was now ready to submit to such terms as he should prescribe. The king sent him word to render the two castles he then besieged, to renounce all title to Biscay, and to put some of his best places into his hands as pledges for his fidelity, with all which he immediately complied; notwithstanding which, the king refused to see him^p. The king having summoned the castle of Rojas, in which Diego Gilles commanded for Lopez Diaz, he returned no other answer than a shower of arrows and stones, though the persons were the king's immediate servants. After a short siege, he desired leave to march out, which was given him; but as soon as he and his garrison were in the field, the king caused him to be arrested, brought them to a court-martial, by which the governor and officers were condemned to death. This severity had one good effect, for no gentleman would afterwards charge himself with the custody of a castle, without inserting, in the oath of fidelity to his lord, that he would defend it against all persons whatever, the king only excepted^q.

- At the opening of the ensuing year, Don Juan Emanuel addressed himself to the king, with an offer of entire submission, and informed him that Don Pedro, prince of Portugal, finding it impossible to marry his niece Donna Blanca, who was paralytic, was inclined to espouse his daughter Donna Constantia, if the king would be pleased to give his consent. Don Alonso answered, that, as to the first point, he was content to pardon all that was passed, if Don Juan would behave as a good subject for the time to come; and that, as to the latter, he would consider of it, and give him an answer^r. Soon after came ambassadors from the crown of Portugal upon the same subject; and the king, Don Alonso, having sent persons into that kingdom to examine into the matter of fact, upon their report that Donna Blanca was really afflicted with the palsy, he declared that he would not oppose the marriage of the prince Don Pedro with Donna Constantia, in hopes that this condescension would entirely restore the tranquility of his dominions; and, to demonstrate how welcome this would be to him, he celebrated Whitsuntide at Valladolid, with public feasts and a carousal, to which all the nobility were invited, and in which himself and his knights of the band opposed all comers.

Viceroy of Na-

war on Castile,
or caution.

BUT he had scarce begun to please himself with these hopes, than they were dissipated by an accident he could not foresee; for Henry de Solis, viceroy of Navarre, published a manifesto, in which he charged the Castilians with having injured the subjects of Navarre on the frontiers, and that he meant to do himself justice by arms. Don Alonso was so desirous of quiet, that he offered any satisfaction, but the viceroy would accept of none; and having a very powerful army, made an irruption into Castile, on the side of Tudela, wasting every thing before him with fire and sword^a. Don Alonso assembled a body of troops for the defence of his dominions, and appointed Don Juan de Lara commander in chief, which he refused, and the king thereupon declared Martin Fernandez Portocarrero, master of his household, general^b. Some of the principal nobility represented to the king, that he was by no means of a rank fit to command them; but that, to shew how sensible they were of the folly of private disputes, in a time of public danger, they thanked him for giving this opportunity of shewing their obedience, as he had done his sagacity in appointing one of the best officers in Castile to his command.

MARTIN FERNANDEZ marched with his forces, and the viceroy of Navarre sent him a haughty message, that he intended the next day to reduce Alfaro, and plunder the country in the neighbourhood. Martin Fernandez marched towards the abbey of Futero, which they had already taken, and the viceroy thereupon dispatched his cavalry, to cover his new conquest. The viceroy seeming to persist in his first design, drew out his whole army to support his horse, of which Martin Fernandez having received intelligence, prosecuted his march with great vigour, in order to give them battle. The dispute was sharp, but short, the army of Navarre being routed with great slaughter. He afterwards intercepted their cavalry, in their retreat towards Tudela, and cut them off entirely, which put an end to the operations of the war, which was terminated afterwards by a peace, under the mediation of the crown of France^c. At this time the court of Castile appeared with unusual splendour from the arrival of two great embassies, one from the emperor of Morocco, and the other from Edward the third, king of England, whom Don Alonso treated with great dignity and respect^d. At the close of the year a council was held at Salamanca, in which sixteen canons were made, the great point in view being to extinguish the custom which still prevailed amongst the Spanish clergy of marrying, which, to render it odious, the court of Rome confounded with keeping concubines^e.

WHEN the king Don Alonso had made such dispositions for war against the Moors, who he had certain intelligence was meditating a general confederacy against him, he discovered a new contrivance for disturbing the peace of his people amongst his own nobility. Don Juan Emanuel and Don Juan de Lara were at the head of this; and what equally amazed and chagrined him, Don Pedro Fernandez de Castro, and Don Juan Alonso de Albuquerque, for whom he had always testified the highest esteem, were engaged with them, the whole confederacy being formed under the protection of the king of Portugal^f. Upon this discovery, he sent for Don Pedro de Castro, who, though he was in one of his own castles, made no scruple of obeying his order. He expostulated the matter with him freely; assured him that he was so sensible of his past services, that having no other way to reward him, he had determined to marry his son the Infant Don Henry, to his daughter; and that, if he had at any time given him offence, he was willing to give him what satisfaction he pleased. Don Pedro, afflicted and ashamed, freely confessed his fault, and promised to reclaim Don Juan de Albuquerque, which, when he had performed, the king called together an assembly of the states, in which he fairly laid before them his condition and their own, with the several overtures he had made to Don Juan Emanuel, and Don Juan de Lara. The states immediately voted them both traitors, gave him five subsidies, and desired him to prosecute the war against them both, to their utter destruction^g.

Don Juan Nunez de Lara made several propositions, very plausible in their nature, to prevent the storm which he saw ready to fall upon him, but the king rejected them all. In the month of June, the king took the field and invested Lerma, in which Don Juan de Lara was with a numerous garrison, excellently well provided, and fortifications for those times in very good condition. Don Juan Emanuel made various attempts to succour and relieve him, but was so closely pursued by the king, whenever he was in the field, that he was at length forced to consult his own safety, and retire into Aragon, having more than once very narrowly escaped falling into the king's hands^h. When the siege had continued for several months, and the place was in apparrent danger, the secret friends of Don Juan de Lara practised every art to

- a extricate him from his difficulties. The king of Portugal claimed him as his subject and vassal. Don Alonso answered he might be so; but he was also his rebel, and as such he would punish him. This produced a war between the two crowns, which, however, could not oblige the king to raise the siege ^b. The queen Donna Maria was then prevailed on to go to the camp, and to interpose in his favour, but that also was without effect. At length, when it was towards Christmas, his escape was contrived through a common sewer, of which the king having intelligence, surprised his friends at the mouth of it, and it was with some difficulty that he got back. This humbled him to such a degree, that he sent to the king to know what terms he would be pleased to prescribe. Don Alonso answered, that he would grant him and his people their lives, except three persons who had deserted from his camp ^c. Don Juan, b having first provided for the escape of these three men, named a day for delivering the place, and though the king sent him a horse, yet he chose to meet him on foot, kissed his hand with great respect, and assured him that he would be from that moment his most faithful servant. The king ordered the fortification of Lerma to be demolished, carried Don Juan with him to Valladolid, restored him to his post of standard bearer of Castile, and made him several considerable presents; which had such an effect, that, during the remainder of his life, he was the most steady and the most affectionate servant the king had ^d.

- THE new year brought with it new disturbances. Don Pedro, who had succeeded his father Don Alonso, as king of Arragon, was upon extreme bad terms with his mother-in-law Donna Leonora, sister to the king of Castile, which induced him to favour Don Juan Emanuel, c and, on the other hand, produced a civil war in his own dominions, several great lords declaring on the side of the queen Dowager; but at length, through the interposition of Don Juan de Lara, these disputes were compromised ^e. The mother of that lord, who had a very great interest with the king, presumed upon it so far, as to deliver him a letter from Don Juan Emanuel, in which he made great professions of penitence, and of inclinations to return to the king's service: to which Don Alonso answered, it was entirely in his own power, and that, whenever he was disposed to give him proofs of his obedience, he might depend upon his favour. Upon which Don Juan Emanuel submitted ^f. In regard to Portugal, the war went on; the fleet of Castile was victorious by sea, and the king rejected all terms of accommodation, notwithstanding the pope interposed; at length, however, the legate putting the d king in mind that every step he took to gratify his resentment was destructive of his interest, since it was very well known that the Moors intended to attack them both, he was at length prevailed on to listen to some accommodation with his father-in-law; but, however, the negotiation was not perfected till the beginning of the year following ^g.

Portugal.

- THE repeated advices he received from Barbary, left him no room to doubt that he should quickly find himself exposed to as great danger from the Infidels, as any that his ancestors had overcome. For the king of Morocco, Jacob Abul-Affan, was providing a prodigious force by land and sea; and having reduced the little kingdoms of Tunis and Tremecen, was to the full as formidable as any of his predecessors. The king Don Alonso ratified the truce with Portugal, and perhaps had done it more readily, but that he was willing to make e that monarch believe that he did not readily forgive any assistance given to his malecontents ^h.
 He afterwards held an assembly of the states of Castile, in which some excellent laws were made. Amongst the rest it was provided, that all fortresses should be considered as belonging of right to the king; and that none should presume to hold them against him; that no rank whatever should exempt men from the laws, or give them a title to do themselves justice; and that all persons should conform themselves in their garb and way of living to the condition of life they were in, so that none might be made poor by affecting a false shew of riches. These were published in the cathedral church of Burgos; for, in those rude days, they never expected that men should obey laws unless they knew them ⁱ.

 over, Don Juan proposed to the king going to the castle of Garcia-Munoz, where he assured him that Don Juan Emanuel had given orders that he should be received with the utmost respect, and the place put into his hands. The king went and took possession of it, and, upon his arrival at Cuenca, Don Juan himself came to pay his duty, and was so kindly and frankly them. The king took this so well, that he confided to him the care of his interests in Arragon, and sent him thither to manage them, which he did with great ability and equal integrity ^k. Pope Benedict the twelfth wrote about this time to the king, to thank him for the respect paid to his interposition in the affair of Portugal, and to exhort him to part with Donna Leonora de Guzman, and to lead a life worthy of a Christian prince ^l.

ful and Abul-

THE insinuations of Don Juan Emanuel had such an influence over the king of Arragon, that, not content with accommodating every thing to the satisfaction of his mother-in-law, he resolved to enter into a close alliance with the king of Castile, as the only means for securing both kingdoms against the invasion of the Moors, which appeared every day more formidable; and having sent an ambassador for that purpose, a treaty offensive and defensive was concluded, from which both princes promised not to depart, or to make any truce with the Infidels, but in conjunction ^m. Don Alonso proceeded then to the frontiers, and at Seville conferred the honour of knighthood on Don Juan de Lara, with his own hands ⁿ. He entered the enemy's territories with a numerous and complete army, and ravaged the country about Ronda, till, through want of provisions, they found themselves obliged to retire, which the Moors observing, thought it a very favourable opportunity to strike one of their great blows. Accordingly they issued out of the place, and fell upon the rear of the Christian army. Don Juan Emanuel, Don Juan de Lara, and the grand master of the order of St. James, who commanded there, repressed them but faintly, and restrained the ardour of the soldiers for some time; till at length, being at a great distance from the place, those three officers having conferred together, faced about at once, and charged the Moors so vigorously, that they fled to an adjacent mountain, which was of very difficult ascent. The Castilian cavalry, however, dismounted, and forced their passage up, though with difficulty and loss; but of this numerous detachment of the Moors there did not escape a single man ^o. In the autumn, Don Alonso de Guzman, grand master of the order of St. James, beat the king of Granada before Silos. Abul-Malic, with the army of Morocco, was still more unfortunate, for he was defeated by Don Alonso's generals, and killed in his retreat ^p. This year would have ended happily, if the grand master of the order of St. James, resenting too hastily some ill usage from Donna Leonora de Guzman, had not revolted against the king, notwithstanding that he used all possible means to bring him back to his duty, which he renounced so entirely, as, when the king approached the walls of the fortrefs where he was, in order to expostulate with him, he caused him to be repulsed with arrows and stones, some of which fell on his shield, and others wounded his horse, for which, when it was reduced, the king caused him to be put to death ^q.

ABUL-ASSAN, king of Morocco, not at all discouraged by the defeats of the preceding year, or the loss of his son, prosecuted the war with a degree of fury, that sufficiently spoke his resentment. He assembled a great army, a vast quantity of military stores and provisions, and a fleet of 200 sail, exclusive of thirty gallies. Don Alonso did all that was possible to provide against the effects of this invasion, and, if possible, to prevent it; for, by the rudeness of the winter, he lost several of his ships, and by the unwholsomeness of the season, a great number of men, which put it out of the power of the admiral to hinder, with six ships and twenty-seven gallies, the Moors from passing. Donna Elvira, the wife of the admiral, hearing what weak and improper judges said, wrote to her husband that his fidelity was suspected, and that it was supposed he had received a vast sum of money to let the Moors pass; upon which the admiral, having received a reinforcement of six gallies, sailed with so considerable a strength, and, to wipe off this imaginary stain, sacrificed himself and the whole fleet, five gallies only excepted ^r. The king Don Alonso provided Tarefa for a long siege, and was forced to apply to the king of Portugal, his father-in-law, for assistance by sea; and, in order to obtain it, had recourse to the queen Donna Maria, who wrote in the most pressing terms to the king her father, and sent it by the dean of Toledo, her chancellor; upon which he sent the fleet of Portugal to Seville.

Portugal.

DON Alonso dispatched also a minister to Genoa, and Don Juan Martinez to expostulate with the king of Arragon, for not sending the vessels he had promised to his fleet. The king answered plainly, that it was for want of money to equip them, otherwise he had ten gallies which he would have sent. Don Juan advanced the money necessary, and, instead of ten, the king sent twelve ^s. The Genoese also sold him their assistance, but sold it dear. While the king was employed in these precautions, the king of Morocco transported upwards of sixty a thousand men into Spain; and when the king of Castile had notice of this, he sent an embassy to Don Alonso, king of Portugal, to thank his father-in-law for the succours he had given him, and to let him know that he was desirous of turning the truce, which they had concluded, into a solemn peace, which was signed on the 10th of July. One of the articles was, that the king should permit Donna Constantia, the daughter of Don Juan Emanuel, to go into Portugal, to consummate her marriage with the Infant Don Pedro, to whom she had been espoused by proxy, some years before. When Don Alonso laid down the pen, after signing this treaty, Don Juan Emanuel seized his hand, and kissed it with great transport, assuring him he would never forget the obligation conferred upon him by this favour; and the king, to heighten it, gave him leave to conduct his daughter in person, and sent some of the greatest men in the kingdom to accompany him, and to be witnesses of the marriage^t.

ABUL-ASSAN, king of Morocco, arrived in the latter end of the summer; and having joined the army of the king of Granada, marched to invest Tarefa, in which was Juan Alonso invests Tarefa de Benavides, and came before it on the 23d of September. He immediately gave the king notice of the situation things were in, and prepared to make as good a defence as possible. The siege, however, was carried on with all imaginable vigour, and the place in great danger, when the garrison received fresh spirits from the appearance of the fleet of Castile, under the command of the new admiral Don Alonzo Ortiz, riding in the streights, by whom the daily supplies of provisions, which hitherto the Moors had received, were intercepted, and the besiegers reduced to the utmost distress. The face of things was quickly changed, a tempest dispersed the Christian fleet, and all, except three galleys, were lost, which plunged the garrison once more into deep distress. The king being informed of their circumstances, took a generous resolution of hazarding all for their relief. He sent the queen into Portugal, to procure what succours she could, from the king, her father; and that brave prince, as soon as the queen had informed him of the situation that her husband's affairs were in, resolved to march to his assistance with the whole force of his kingdom^u.

Don Alonso received him at Seville with all possible marks of gratitude, reverence, and friendship; and when the two armies had rested and refreshed themselves, they marched towards the enemy, being about eighteen or twenty thousand horse, and forty thousand foot. They arrived in sight of Tarefa on Sunday the 29th of October, and held it for a good omen, that they received intelligence of Don Pedro de Moncado's arrival in the streights, with the fleet of Arragon. In the night, the king threw a reinforcement of one thousand horse and four thousand foot into Tarefa; and the next morning, having made the necessary dispositions, and sent a strong detachment to join the Portuguese, he advanced to attack the king of Morocco, whilst the king of Portugal did the same against the king of Granada. The dispute was long and obstinate, more especially on the side of the king of Castile, but at length the Moors were defeated, with the loss of near half their army, amounting to two hundred thousand men. The king of Granada retired into his own dominions, with the broken remains of his forces; the king of Morocco retired first to Algezira, thence to Gibraltar, from whence he passed to Ceuta in the night; the two kings, after having provided for the security of Tarefa, went together to Seville, where prodigious rejoicings were made; the king of Castile offered his father-in-law all the prisoners and plunder that were taken, which he generously refused; and it was with great difficulty he was brought to accept a few of the principal prisoners, some very rich arms, and a few jewels. His son-in-law accompanied him two days journey, in his march towards Estremos. The king of Castile, from this time, as well out of gratitude as piety, conversed with Donna Leonora de Guzman no more, except in public, and as the mother of his children^v.

THE king, Don Alonso, sent an ambassador with his own standard, twenty-four horses richly caparisoned, and twenty-four Moors to lead them, as a present to the pope at Avignon^{*}. The king having summoned the states of his dominions, and having laid before them his wants, they, in consideration of his late victory, and the zeal expressed for them, and the good of his subjects, made him a tender of a large free gift, which he refused, and accepted only of a part, saying, that his own necessities forced him to take that, and the sense he had of theirs, to decline the rest. The king had formed a design of investing Alcala de Benzayde, a place of great importance to him, because the loss of it could not but be very sensible to the king of Granada, since it opened a passage into the heart of his dominions. By causing a report to be spread that he intended to attack Malaga, and ordering some of his ships to appear before it, he drew the king of Granada's forces on that side, which left him at liberty to invest Remarkable circumstances during this siege, which attracted the eyes of all Europe.

The king at length undertakes the important siege of Algezira.

Alcala without opposition. He had no sooner formed the siege, than Don Gilles de Boccanegra, brother to the duke of Genoa, arrived with a strong squadron of galleys in the straits, and prevented any troops passing from Barbary. The king of Granada, however, was reinforced by the best part of that corps, which his ally, the king of Morocco, had left at Algezira, and with these and with his own army he attempted to relieve Alcala, but in vain; upon which Don Alonso, having offered the garrison that they should march out and be escorted to whatever place they pleased, they very readily accepted these terms. While the king was employed in this siege, some of his generals reduced the castle of Moclin; and after the surrender of Alcala, the king made himself master of several places of less importance; which so alarmed the Moorish prince, that he offered to become his vassal again, and to pay him the accustomed tribute; to which Don Alonso added, that he should renounce his alliance with Abul-Affan, which he rejected, and thus the negotiation ended.^y

THE king found great difficulty in raising the supplies for the next year, and money was extremely necessary, as he had the Genoese and other foreigners in his pay, and therefore what he could not obtain from the states, he borrowed. The king of Morocco had made vast preparations, and seemed disposed to return once more into Spain. Don Gilles de Boccanegra sunk, burned, and took twelve of his galleys that lay in port; and being afterwards joined by ten galleys from Portugal, and the squadron of Aragon, attacked and beat the whole Moorish fleet with great loss.^z The king, notwithstanding he found some backwardness in the nobility, who were really tired out with the length and the hardships of the service, to rid himself once for all from the apprehensions he was under from Barbary, resolved to besiege Algezira, which, as he was informed, was at that time but indifferently provided: this equally amazed and chagrined the king of Granada, who endeavoured and found several methods of conveying succours into the place, which kept Don Alonso before it all the rest of the year. The Moor attempted likewise its relief, by negotiation and by force, but without effect. He likewise commissioned a Moor to make an attempt upon the king of Castile's person, which was happily discovered and prevented, the fellow, as he deserved, being put to death.^a

THERE are few instances in history of a more remarkable siege than this of Algezira, in which, on both sides, there was manifested all that human skill and courage could perform; the king of Morocco raised another great army, and assembled a vast fleet; but when he was ready to pass the straits, one of his sons revolted; and though he found means to have him killed, yet one of his adherents personated him and maintained a rebellion. The king of Granada, having received a part of the succours which his ally had promised, under the command of prince Aly, another of his sons, attempted over and over again to raise the siege, and ventured several actions, in which they were defeated by Don Juan de Lara. The besieged thundered upon the king's camp with cannon, which were here first employed, as all the Spanish historians agree.^b Besides this opposition from his enemies, Don Alonso found himself much straitened in other respects. He could not leave the siege to seek supplies, and his credit was gradually exhausted. At length he thought of a stratagem, which procured him those aids his subjects had refused to his fortitude in necessity. He sent his own plate, and that of the lords who were with him, to Seville, where he ordered it to be coined into pieces current, at a higher rate than the standard; of which the inhabitants in his great cities having notice, offered him a large free gift to desist from that expedient, which he willingly accepted.^c

THE pope and the French king likewise sent him large sums.^d The fame of this siege was so great, that Don Philip, king of Navarre, repaired thither with a great body of troops, and died in his return: several English and French men of quality, with considerable reinforcements, came thither, and served for a time; but the extreme length of the siege tired out all the strangers, and brought the king into fresh distresses for money, the Genoese threatening to return or to revolt if they were not paid.^e On the other hand, the king of Granada made a proposition to pay the whole expences of the war, if the king would raise the siege; and this, in effect, was a fresh distress, for his hungry troops importuned the king to close with these offers; but his good sense furnished him with an expedient to turn, even this, to his advantage; for he demanded three hundred thousand pistoles in gold, and granted a passport for a gally to go to Centa to receive them from the king of Morocco. This gally in her return, notwithstanding the king's passport, was attacked by the Genoese, but, however, escaped; but, instead of bringing the money, brought an order to hazard a battle, and to save the place a at any rate. These orders were obeyed, and the Moors thoroughly beaten^f. Still the place held out, notwithstanding the port was blocked up, not only by a strong squadron, but by a kind of dyke, in spite of which one Muza, a Moorish seaman, at stated times when the nights were dark, passed with fifty small vessels that drew little water, and carried supplies of provisions; so that, notwithstanding the king's information was true, that their magazines were low at the beginning, yet they were, by this means, supplied, and the place remained in the hands of the Moors all this year^g.

At the beginning of the next the king discovered Muza's practice; and having made such alterations in his dyke as rendered it impossible for the future, of which Abul-Affan being informed, he directed the king of Granada to make the best terms for the garrison he could. ^{1343.} Algezira at last rendered to Don Alonso by the kings of Morocco and Granada.

b That prince proposed to Don Alonso, that the troops and inhabitants should have free leave to march out; that he would acknowledge himself his vassal, and pay the usual tribute; and that a truce should subsist for fifteen years; the king, to maintain his dignity, reduced the truce to ten years; and upon these terms the capitulation was signed on the twenty-sixth of March, when the plenipotentiaries of the king of Granada kissed Don Alonso's hand, in token of homage^h. The place was evacuated the next day, and Don Juan Emanuel entered it with a corps of troops, and the banner of Castile displayed, to the immortal honour of this great prince, and of his faithful nobility; by whose constancy, expressed in expending vast sums in his service, and by exposing their persons, this great conquest was attained. As soon as the king came to Seville, he ordered that the princesses, daughters of c Abul-Affan, who were taken in that monarch's camp at the defeat of Salcedo, should be provided with most magnificent equipages, and sent them with a suitable train on board his own galleys to Ceuta, without ransom, and with all the rich jewels in their possession when taken. Abul-Affan was amazed at this act of generosity, and soon after sent an embassy to return the king of Castile thanks, and to testify his esteem by presents of jewels, rich arms, gold and silver stuffs, most exquisite balsams and perfumes, together with lions, tigers, ostriches, and a considerable number of camels and horsesⁱ. Soon after, Don Alonso received ambassadors from England and from Aragon, the former in reference to a marriage, which he thought proper to defer, and the latter in regard to the alliance subsisting between the two crowns, which the king was content to renew for ten years^k.

d THE sovereignty of the Canary islands, held in vassalage from the holy see, by a tribute of four hundred pistoles a year, having been conferred by pope Clement the sixth on Louis de la Cerda, count of Clermont in France, son of Don Alonso de la Cerda, the king of Castile, at the request of the pope and of that young prince, desisted from his pretensions to them, as appears by his letters, dated February the eighteenth, which, however, proved of little service to this nominal monarch, notwithstanding that he procured the like renunciation from the king of Portugal^l. The king indeed was entirely occupied in finding ways and means to discharge the vast debts he had contracted during the tedious siege of Algezira, in pacifying the king of Portugal, who took it much amiss that he was not comprised in the peace he made with the kings of Morocco and Granada, and in protecting his sister the queen of Aragon^m.

e The kingdom of Castile, it is true, and the dominions annexed to it, enjoyed a profound peace, which, however, contributed very little to repair the losses sustained by the late war, since the inhabitants were afflicted with a grievous plague and other calamities these distresses created; which the king endeavoured to remedy to the utmost of his power, by several wise regulations, and by sparing them in the point of supplies as much as it was possible. He would in all probability have pursued this method of acting, at least, to the expiration of his truce with the Moors, if his ambition had not been awakened by an unforeseen event, which seemed to promise himself and his subjects very great advantagesⁿ. ^{1344.}

ONE of the sons of Abul Affan, forgetting the respect due to him by the laws of nature as well as civil society, had taken up arms against him, and thrown all that monarchy into con-

f fusion; of which Don Alonso was no sooner informed, than he conceived in his mind a scheme for turning these dissensions in Barbary to his advantage. battle of Salsedo. This assembly closed with the king's proposition, and granted him the supplies that he demanded, which, however, was chiefly owing to his dexterity in managing such assemblies, an art in which he has hardly been excelled. These points settled, he sent to demand of the king of Arragon a squadron of gallies, and ambassadors likewise to other foreign powers^o. About the beginning of the month of August, having intelligence that four Arragonefe gallies had joined his fleet, and that it was cruizing off Gibraltar, he traversed Andalusia with a potent army, and invested that place, round which he opened a large and deep trench.

Dies of the plague before that place, at the very time it was about to capitulate.

THE siege continued that whole year, notwithstanding the king was so fortunate, at least in appearance, as to see all his schemes take effect; for his fleet effectually prevented succours coming by sea; the king of Granada was afraid to attempt any thing openly, and the confusions in Morocco prevented that monarch from being able to do any thing for its relief. The garrison and inhabitants therefore being in want of provisions, and the fortifications in a manner ruined, began to think of a capitulation, when the plague broke out in the camp^p. The Infant (of Arragon) Don Ferdinand, his nephew Don Juan Nunez de Lara, who was always near his person, Don Ferdinand Emanuel, and other great lords, pressed him either to raise the siege, or at least to retire himself; but it was in vain: he observed to them that Gibraltar had been lost during his minority, that he was under a kind of obligation to recover it to his country, and that the plague might reach him in his court as well as in the camp. It may be, he had not considered, that though this enterprize had been very maturely concerted, and executed with great circumspection, yet it was a direct violation of the law of God, and of nature; and that, therefore, notwithstanding these favourable appearances, he had no reason to flatter himself with success. However it was, the plague seized him at that critical juncture, and of it he died on Good-Friday, March the 26th, exceedingly regretted by the army, and by all his subjects^q. His nephew the Infant Don Ferdinand, Don Juan Nunez de Lara, Don Ferdinand Emanuel, and some other noblemen, attended the king's body when it was removed from the camp, and the Moors in Gibraltar shewed, upon this occasion, a politeness that ought to have covered their enemies with confusion: they suspended hostilities that whole day, and refused to take advantage of that sorrow and confusion which reigned thro' the Christian camp. The king's body was carried first to Seville, and deposited in the royal chapel till it could be removed to Cordova, where, by his last testament, he desired to be buried with his father^r.

THE peace and glory of his country expired with Don Alonso. His successor, Don Pedro, furnished the cruel, was the only surviving son by the queen; for Don Ferdinand died in his infancy: but by Donna Leonora de Guzman he had Sancho, who was weak in his mind and infirm in his body; Henry Frederick, whom the Spaniards call Fradrique Hernando or Ferdinand, and Tello^s. At the time of his demise Don Pedro was in his sixteenth year; and tho' not a legal minor, yet absolutely governed by the queen his mother, and her favourite, Don Juan Alonso de Albuquerque. The siege of Gibraltar was carried on after the king's death, till orders could be received from court, and was then raised, though the place might have been easily taken^t. But the spirit of government was lost, and the spirit of intrigue occupied the court. Donna Leonora de Guzman retired immediately to Medina Sidonia, which the king had given her, which was well provided and excellently fortified. She had intrusted it to the care of Don Alonso Coronel, an experienced officer, who had long enjoyed her protection, and who, as soon as the king expired, sought that of the queen. Many persons of great distinction, and most of the nobility of the illustrious house of Guzman, resorted to Donna Leonora, which filled the court with apprehensions; these, however, it was thought proper to dissemble; and upon the faith of Don Juan de Albuquerque, and Don Juan de Lara, Donna Leonora was prevailed on to go to the court at Seville, where, without any ceremony or regard to their faith, she was clapped into prison^u. Her sons, notwithstanding this, were well received; and the king gave them to understand, that though he would not protect their mother, with whom he had no connections, yet he should always consider them as his brethren. They were permitted to visit Donna Leonora, who, in spite of the endeavours of the court, procured for Don Henry, Donna Joanna, the sister of Don Ferdinand Emanuel; which marriage so provoked the queen, that she gave orders for arresting Don Henry, but he made his escape into Asturias^v. The king falling ill soon after, increased those jealousies that were but too high already; and upon his recovery, Don Juan de Lara and Don Ferdinand Emanuel retired from court, and died soon after, the former at Burgos, and the latter at Valena^x.

- a THE king Don Pedro removed in the beginning of the year from Seville, and carried with him Donna Leonora, under a guard. He visited, however, his brother Don Frederick, and feasted with him several days. After this, the court removed to Talavera, where, by the persuasion of his mother, the king consented to the death of the unfortunate Donna Leonora, the first stain on the annals of his reign, which were afterwards wrote in blood. This place belonged to the dowager, and, to perpetuate the memory of this cruel act, is thought to have received the epithet of Talavera de la Reyna, which it still retains^y. Upon the king's arrival at Burgos, which city had shewn some dislike to Don Juan de Albuquerque, he sent for Garcilassa de la Vega, the son of the late chancellor; and, as soon as he came into his palace, caused him to be murdered, and his body thrown into the street: he attempted likewise to have got Don Nunez de Lara, the only son of Don Juan, and then a child, into his power, but without effect; however, he died soon after, and then he seized all the estates of that family^z. Don Carlos, surnamed the wicked, king of Navarre, made him a visit at Burgos, where he was well received, and after he had remained there some time, the two kings parted, perfectly pleased with each other^a. The states of Castile, assembled at Valladolid, were not very complaisant to the king, who, as soon as they rose, went with his mother to Ciudad Rodrigo, in order to confer with his grandfather the king of Portugal. That monarch gave them a great deal of good advice, and engaged, or rather obliged, the king to be reconciled to his brother Don Henry count of Traстамара^b, who had taken shelter in his dominions, and who, notwithstanding, had no great confidence in the king or his favourite. Consents, at their instigation, to the murder of Donna Leonora de Guzman.
- b THE tranquility of Castile could be of no long duration, under a prince so much hurried away by his passions. He prepared to reduce Don Alonso Fernandes Coronel, and having dropt some expressions that alarmed his brethren the counts Don Henry and Don Tello, they retired privately from court, and stood upon their defence, fully persuaded, that if the king had them once in his power, they should never have such an opportunity again^c. The king Don Pedro followed them into Biscay, and took several places; and it was while he was thus employed, that Don Juan Alonso de Albuquerque, from a base ambition, and through an unworthy scheme of politicks, plunged this unfortunate prince in that fatal amour, which brought upon him destruction and disgrace. He had observed that the king had expressed some emotion at the sight of Maria de Padilla, a young gentlewoman who lived as a companion with his own wife, and who being now grown somewhat older, was become a perfect beauty. By proposals of promoting their interests, he drew her relations to consent to his scheme of her becoming the king's mistress, though he knew that the queen his mother was actually treating of a marriage for the king, with Donna Blanca, daughter to the duke of Bourbon. His scheme succeeded to his wish. The king saw Donna Maria at Sabagun, and became captivated to such a degree, that the common people of those times believed, and the bulk of the Spanish historians have reported, that he was bewitched by her^d (S). An excuse, which, however it might operate heretofore, will do nothing now. A. D. 1351.

(S) We shall have occasion to say so much of this lady, that it seems requisite to give the reader some particulars relating to her in a note, that he may be acquainted with her more particularly. She was of a good, though not of a great, family, and is by some writers represented as if educated according to the custom of those times, in the house of Don Juan de Albuquerque, rather than as an attendant on his lady (1). She was a little woman, but exquisitely beautiful, and was endowed with so many rare qualities, that, it is said, abating her criminal complaisance for the king, she was by no means unworthy of a crown (2). How far this complaisance was criminal, may, notwithstanding, admit of some question; since, after her demise, the king Don Pedro asserted, that he was lawfully married to her, in the presence of Don Juan de Hinesfresa her brother, Don Diego Garcia de Padilla his own chancellor, and his first chaplain (3). The two last were living at the time, and swore it to be truth. We shall hereafter see, that this monarch made no scruple of marrying at any time to gratify his desires, and therefore might very possibly do it now, tho' it must be acknowledged that it was kept very secret; and when published by the king, and sworn to, it was very far from meeting with entire credit (4). The reader may meet with some very judicious and moral remarks upon the consequences of the king's ill conduct, in regard to this lady; the mean and low spirit of his courtiers, in paying her the most profound respect, and the generous freedom of cardinal Albornoz, who not only disdained such a behaviour, but both spoke and wrote freely to the king upon the subject, till he found himself in so great danger, that he thought it best to retire to Avignon, to be safe from the resentment of a monarch whose hands were already dipped in blood (5). The learned Mr. Boyle has vouchsafed this lady an article in his dictionary, which is drawn from the historian last

THIS intrigue did not hinder the king from pursuing his revenge against Don Afonso Fernandez Coronel, whom he besieged all the winter in his castle of Aguilar, took the place by storm, in the beginning of the spring, and put that nobleman and many of his relations to death^c. In the month of February Donna Blanca arrived in Spain, and was received by the queen dowager Donna Maria, and by the queen Donna Leonora, the king's aunt^f. Don Juan de Albuquerque was at that time in Portugal, but returned upon the first news of it to court; and finding that the kindred of Donna Maria de Padilla began to supplant him in the king's good graces, he applied himself with all imaginable diligence to persuade the king to go and consummate his marriage with Donna Blanca at Valladolid, in which he found more difficulty than he expected. But the relations of Donna Maria de Padilla prevailed upon him more easily to receive his brethren Don Henry and Don Tello into his favour, though each of them came attended with such a number of armed followers, as left them no reason to fear any thing from his displeasure. But as they gave out that they were not afraid of him, but of Don Juan de Albuquerque, he received this excuse, and behaved to them very kindly^g. At length, with much persuasion, he went to Valladolid, and in the presence of the two queens, and of all the princes of the royal blood, he espoused Donna Blanca, but left her abruptly the next day, to return to his mistress^h. Don Juan de Albuquerque retired in discontent from court, and refused to go towards Toledo, as the king directed. As soon as Don Pedro was informed of this, he quitted that city, and returned to Valladolid, where he staid two days with the three queens, which was the last time he saw his consort Donna *Blanca*ⁱ. He proceeded from thence to Olmedo, to his mistress, and sent for Don Juan de Albuquerque thither, under pretence of a reconciliation; but, in reality, with a design to cut him off with his principal adherents. Donna Maria de Padilla, having some connections with these lords, gave them notice of the king's design, upon which, not without danger and difficulty, they retired into Portugal. The king was no sooner informed of this, than he shut up his queen Donna Blanca in prison, married his brother Don Tello to Donna Joanna de Lara, the heiress of that family, and removed from all their employments the creatures of Don Juan de Albuquerque^k. And thus, for the present, the court of Castile received quite a new face.

THE king, understanding that Don Juan Nunez de Prada, grand master of the order of Calatrava, was retired into Aragon, he wrote to him in the strongest terms, assuring him he had nothing to fear, upon which that lord returned into Castile. On his arrival at Almagro, the king caused him to be seized, and ordered him to renounce his dignity; and then compelled the knights to elect Don Diego de Padilla, brother of his mistress; but understanding that the knights were not mighty well satisfied with a renunciation, he, to prevent their restoring the old grand master, directed him to be murdered; one of the foulest actions of his whole reign^l. He next took it into his head to make his addresses to Donna Joanna Fernandes de Castro, the widow of Don Diego de Haro; and finding no other way to gratify his desires, he prevailed upon two of his bishops to declare his former marriage null, and then married Donna Joanna publickly. He left her, however, almost as soon as he had done his former queen; and understanding that his two brothers had entered into a league with Don Juan de Albuquerque, he married Donna Isabella, younger sister to Donna Joanna de Lara, to Don Juan of Aragon, and declared him lord of Biscay, in prejudice to his brother Don Tello, who had married the eldest sister^m. The king then ordered Donna Blanca to be removed to Toledo, where, having humbly desired leave to perform her devotions in the cathedral, she refused to come out of it, and by a very moving speech induced the inhabitants to revolt in her favourⁿ. Don Henry, count of Trastamara, with the rest of the confederates, repaired thither, and began to take the best measures they were able for reducing the king to reason, in which they were not a little disappointed by the death of Don Juan de Albuquerque, who was poisoned by an Italian physician. Their party, however, by degrees, became so strong, that the king found himself obliged to come to them to Toro, where he consented to all that they asked, and dissembled mentioned; and she also occupied the first place in a celebrated history of royal mistresses, where, if not accurately, her story is at least elegantly told (6). She was absolutely mistress of the king's heart for nine years; and he was so much afflicted with her death, that he had almost lost his senses (7). Her uncle became his principal favourite; and he committed acts of the greatest violence and injustice, in order to bestow upon her two brothers, Don Diego and Don Juan, the grand master-ships of Calatrava and St. James.

a with such address, that he deceived not only them, but the pope's legate; but having in the mean time, by a secret treaty, detached some of the members of the league, he took the advantage of a thick fog, and withdrawing out of their hands, retired to Segovia^o; a circumstance that alarmed those whom he left behind, and who knew his implacable and sanguinary temper.

THE princes who remained firm in the confederacy, were the king's three brothers, Don Henry count of Traстамара, the grand master Don Frederick, and Don Tello, lord of Biscay, The city of Toledo, which had declared for queen Blanca, reduced by the king. in right of his wife, with Don Ferdinand de Castro, brother to the lady whom the king had abused, under pretence of marriage, and who had himself espoused the sister of those princes. But the Infants of Arragon, who were likewise of this league, now followed the king; who b having artfully drawn from the states at Burgos considerable supplies, took the field with a good army, and upon various pretences cut off several great lords, whom he suspected. At length he made an attempt upon Toro, where the queen his mother was, under the protection of the count Don Henry, by whose valour and prudence the king's army was repulsed^p. Don Pedro, disappointed and provoked, marched with all possible diligence towards Toledo, sending word before him, that, yielding to the prayers of his people, he resolved to live with the queen Donna Blanca as became him. The count Don Henry marched thither also, with such expedition, that he got into the city; yet the greater part of the inhabitants, confiding in the king's promises, received the king's troops also, and the count finding himself obliged to retire, took his measures with such address, that having seized and plundered the king's camp, c he returned with credit to Talavera^q. The king no sooner found himself master of the place, than he sent the queen Donna Blanca prisoner to Sigüenza, caused several noblemen to be beheaded, and twenty-two of the principal inhabitants to be hanged. Amongst other severities, he thought fit to imprison the bishop of Sigüenza; which so irritated the pope, that he sent word to his legate to excommunicate him, and put all the places in his obedience under an interdict. Don Pedro, notwithstanding, made another attempt upon Toro; and, after all that had passed, amused the cardinal legate with such fair promises, that he absolved him from the excommunication, and took off the interdict; but being quickly undeceived, he had recourse to these ecclesiastical thunders again^r. It does not appear, that, except their temporal consequences, the king heeded them much.

d THE king having reduced his mother, and those who adhered to her in Toro, to great extremities, and having found means to draw off his brother the grand master Don Frederick, 1355. Makes himself master of Toro, and of the person of the queen-mother and her adherents. became at length master of the place; the queen dowager Donna Maria retiring to the Alcazal, with Donna Joanna, the wife of Don Henry count of Traстамара, and most of the nobility repaired thither likewise. As the place could not hold out long, she sent in the most humble manner to her son, to desire he would promise life to her, and those who were with her; which he refused, and they were compelled to surrender at discretion. They were no sooner in the king's power, than he ordered most of the nobility to be put to death in the presence of the queen dowager, who fainting at so barbarous a spectacle, was carried back senseless to the palace^s. Amongst so many acts of cruelty, there was one which had an air e of generosity: there was in the place one Martin Abarca, a nobleman of Arragon, to whom the king Don Alonso had committed the care of Don Juan, a son of his by Leonora de Guzman. He sent to the king from the place where he was concealed, and desired him to spare the life of Don Juan and of himself. The king answered, that if he produced Don Juan immediately, that prince should be saved; but that his own death was a thing settled. The generous old man brought his pupil instantly to the king, to whom, having recommended him in the most pathetic manner, he offered himself to die; upon which the king told him, that it was his intention he should live and enjoy his favour^t. He thought fit, however, to proscribe his brothers, Don Frederick and Don Tello, and some attempts were made to assassinate them; but people were become now so much afraid of him, and trusted so little to his promises, that he was not able to accomplish his bloody purposes so easily as he had formerly done. He gave Don Henry count of Traстамара leave to retire into France, but posted murderers upon the roads through which he was to pass; but being well accompanied, he retired safely, though not without difficulty, out of his dominions. This year a war broke out between him and Don Pedro of Arragon, about a dispute at sea, which had very bad consequences^u (T). By which we may discern how early princes began to be jealous of the slightest injuries offered to their dominion of the sea.

THE war with Arragon brought back the count of Trastamara into that prince's dominions, ^a who employed him in his service, and gave him considerable appointments. Don Pedro of Castile, however, gained some advantages this campaign, and might have obtained greater, if he had not laboured to corrupt the views of his two generals Don Juan de la Cerdà, and Don Alvaro Perez de Guzman, which induced them to revolt; when the latter, being defeated and taken, the king caused him to be presently put to death. The pope's legate obtained a truce, which the king of Castile speedily broke; and, as if he had been afraid to leave a single good action upon record, finding Martin Abarca, whom he had suffered to return home, in one of the places he took, he caused him to be put to death ^w. His brother Don Henry, being under continual apprehensions that he would put his wife Donna Joanna Emanuel, whom he had taken at Toro, to death, one Pedro Carillo, who had been long in his service, and ^b unable to bear his master's passionate complaints, left him, and went to the king. He told that prince, that he had been extremely ill used by the count; that he was well acquainted with many others who had personal resentments against him; and that if he would give him leave to raise a troop of these, he would put his brother into his hands, either dead or alive. The king accepted the proposition with joy; upon which Pedro Carillo assembled at his expence a strong body of horse, composed of gentlemen well affected to his master, with which entering Toro suddenly, he took Donna Joanna out of prison, and carried her safe to her lord ^x. Don Ferdinand, Infant of Arragon, about the same time reconciled himself to his brother ^y; so that Don Pedro had various causes of chagrin.

As nothing irritated this prince so much as the escapes of those whom he had destined to ^c destruction, so having still about him Don Juan of Arragon, the brother of Don Ferdinand, and his own two brothers Don Frederick and Don Tello, he resolved to dispatch them all by degrees, and to make use of them in dispatching each other. He resolved to begin with his brother Don Frederick, the grand master, with which he acquainted the Infant Don Juan of Arragon; whom, in consideration of his assisting his designs, he promised to make lord of Biscay. His brother was slain in his presence, on the 27th of May, in the hall of his palace at Seville, and he afterwards dined in the very room, before the body was removed ^z. He directed also several other lords to be killed the same day; and afterwards set out with his cousin Don Juan of Arragon for the castle of Aguilar, where he had determined to treat his brother Don Tello in the same manner; nor was he a little chagrined at finding he was ^d withdrawn; however, he secured his wife, and, to shew how much he was in earnest in this pursuit, understanding that his brother had fled by sea, he went on board a ship, in order to follow him; but a storm obliged him quickly to return ^a. He then proceeded in his journey to Biscay, and carried his cousin Don Juan with him, who, having acted in all things as the creature of his will, pressed him to perform his promise of making him lord of that country. The king gave him to understand, that it was necessary to assemble the states of that country for that purpose; which being done, they resolved, according to the instructions they had received, that they would never have any other lord than the king himself. Don Pedro sent intelligence of this to his cousin, and assured him, that he was very sorry for this disappointment. Don Juan understood him too well to pay any respect to the message, and therefore retired ^e from court; yet he suffered himself to be deceived by a second, in which he gave him to understand, that he would endeavour to persuade the states to admit of his renunciation in his favour. Don Juan went to meet the king at Bilboa, where he then was; and, as soon as he entered the audience chamber, and paid his respects to him, a person behind knocked him down, while those about him stabbed him in many places; some say the king gave him his mortal wound with a javelin. However this might be, the body was presently thrown out

Don Francisco Carrillos, came upon the coast, and took two vessels under Pisan colours, but freighted by the Genoise with oil for Alexandria. As this was done in the very sight of the king, he sent two persons of distinction to let Don Francisco know, that those vessels were under his protection at the time they were taken, and that therefore he expected they should be discharged. Don Francisco answered, that, his master being at war with the Genoise, he took them to be good prizes, and therefore sold them without delay. Don Pedro, upon this, seized the effects of the Catalan merchants at Seville by way of satisfaction. He sent also an ambassador to the king of Arragon, to demand that Don Francisco should be put to death, or sent prisoner into Castile.

The king of Arragon answered very mildly, that he disapproved his admiral's conduct, and that he would call him to an account for it, upon his return. The ambassador of Castile, who, probably, had secret instructions, replied, that his master would take a proper satisfaction by force of arms. The monarch of Arragon told him, in return, that he saw no ground for a breach between the two crowns; but that, if he was attacked, he would repel force by force, and trust the decision of the cause to the Supreme Being, who is the sovereign distributor of justice. Upon these grounds the war began, which Mariana describes as bringing desolation and destruction on both kingdoms.

a of a window, from whence the king looked out and insulted it, in the hearing of the people who gathered about it^b. His aunt, queen Leonora, and the wife of Don Tello, he shut up in prison, seizing upon all they had; but in the mean time his brother, the count Don Henry, with the army of Arragon, took several places on the frontiers, while the king, in order to revenge himself, caused a potent fleet to be equipped at Seville^c, to ravage the coasts. 1358.

At the opening of the ensuing year, the pope sent a legate into Spain, to accommodate these differences between the kings of Castile and Arragon. Don Pedro received that prelate with all the marks of deference and respect imaginable; complained of exceeding ill usage he had met with from the king his neighbour; notwithstanding which, out of pure regard to his holiness, he was ready to make peace upon the most moderate terms; such as, that the king of Arragon should deliver up to him Don Francisco Perellos, with whom he had reason to be offended; should banish his brothers and all the Castilians in his service; should restore Alicant, Oribuela, and other places, that formerly belonged to Castile, and pay him half a million of pieces of gold for the expences of the war. The cardinal reported these terms to the king of Arragon, and laboured to soften their resentments against each other, but to very little purpose^d. As soon as the fleet at Seville was ready, Don Pedro, to shew how much he was inclined to peace, proclaimed Don Ferdinand, Infant of Arragon, Don Henry count of Trastamara, and their adherents, traitors; and that his resentment might not seem to be confined to words only, he ordered his aunt, the queen dowager of Arragon, Donna Leonora, to be put to death, and caused Donna Isabella, the widow of the Infant Don John of Arragon, to be poisoned^e. He went afterwards to spread desolation with his fleets on the coast of Catalonia; but while he was thus employed, his brother, the count Don Henry, made an irruption into his territories, gained a complete victory, and killed his favourite Don Juan Fernandez Hinesrosa, who was uncle to Donna Maria de Padilla, who was this year brought to-bed of her son Don Alonso^f, whom his father afterwards procured to be owned by the states for the lawful heir to the crown. 1359.

Don Pedro, though he could not repair the loss of the last battle, yet revenged it upon such of his subjects as were in the interests of his brethren, or whom he so much as suspected of being so. The many examples he made in this way so frightened the most considerable persons in his dominions, that many, merely out of fear, went and joined the count Don Henry, and others retired into Portugal, where the king gave them a good reception; but after having in vain endeavoured to reconcile his neighbours, at length took part with the king of Arragon, as the more reasonable^g. The king Don Pedro had a good army in the field, which gave him an opportunity of gratifying his resentments, which he did in many instances; but it happens fortunately for us, that the nature of this history does not oblige us to give an exact catalogue of his murders. We are, however, compelled to take notice, that in his march towards Najara, where his brother the count Don Henry was with his army, a priest very earnestly desired audience of him, which, when he had obtained, he told him that St. Dominick had commanded him in his sleep to admonish him to beware of his brother Don Henry, by whose hands he should certainly fall. The king was at first a little surprized; but having recollected himself, ordered the priest to be burnt alive, which was done; and soon after the king lost the opportunity of reducing his brother, who had shut himself up in Najara, when it was actually in his power^h. Towards the close of the year, he entered into a negotiation with the king of Portugal, whom he secretly advised, that as the persons who had taken shelter in his dominions were men who had given him great offence, he would, upon putting them into his power, deliver up those who had taken refuge in Castile, for putting to death Agnes de Castro, the king of Portugal's wife, in his father's life-time, and by his orders. This was soon accepted, and punctually performed on both sides; in consequence of which, most dismal slaughters ensued: amongst these was Samuel Levi, a Jew, who had been his treasurer during the whole reign of Don Pedro. It does not appear that he suffered for any other crime than that of being rich; and that the king might have an opportunity of possessing himself of about 160,000 pistoles in gold, and upwards of 4,000,000 in silver. It is probable he had obtained still more, if, in the midst of those tortures, employed to force from him a discovery, this miserable man had not died sooner than Don Pedro expectedⁱ; at least this the king's unextinguished avarice tempted him to believe. aims at assassinating Don Henry.

A. D. 1561.

His forces defeated by the Moors before the town of Cadiz, with great loss.

Don Pedro, whose passions made him frequently take sudden and strange resolutions, concluded, by the interposition of the pope's legate, a peace with the king of Arragon, that he might be at liberty to revenge himself upon the Moors of Granada^k. About this time, the king, from what particular motive does not appear, ordered his beautiful, but unfortunate, wife, Donna Blanca, to be put to death, in the fortress of Xerez, where she had been long confined (U). The governor excused himself from obeying the order; but the king sent another person who fulfilled his intentions, as some say, by poison^l. In the mean time, Don Henry, count of Traстамара, and his associates, found themselves constrained to retire once more into France, which they did, however, with the less regret, because they discovered that the king of Arragon had actually been taking measures to raise his brother the Infant Don Ferdinand to the throne of Castile, who, for that important service, was to make him a cession of the kingdom of Murcia. This treaty, however, was not extremely well performed on either side; but as hostilities ceased, Don Pedro of Castile made the use he intended of it, and engaged in a war with the Moors of Granada, which was managed with indifferent success. This year, and but a short time after the queen, deceased Donna Maria de Padilla, leaving a son Don Alonso, and three daughters, Donna Beatrix, Donna Constantia, and Donna Isabella, by the king Don Pedro, who is said to have expressed great sorrow for her death^m. But his subjects were far from looking upon this event as a calamity.

In the month of January, the king of Castile ordered the grand master of Calatrava, accompanied by Don Henry Henriquez, and some other old officers, with 1000 horse, and 2000 foot, to surprize Cadiz, which, though a place of so great importance to the king of Granada, was according to his intelligence but indifferently guarded. Artifices of this kind were familiar to the Moors; the army of Castile advanced near the place without discovering an enemy; a small party was detached to the very suburbs of the city to gain intelligence, a more considerable body followed to support them; the first saw no troops, the latter retired from an apprehension of an ambuscade, without being pursued. This proceeding was too fine for the Christian generals; they concluded the city to be defenceless and secure, upon which, they sent off detachments to plunder the country on every side. As soon as those detachments were at a considerable distance, a small detachment of Moorish horse came out of the city, and skirmished with the like number of Christians, who passed the bridge for that purpose. By degrees the Moors grew stronger, the remains of the army under the command of the generals, were obliged to engage to bring off their friends. It was then that they saw their ruin plainly; a great body of Moors, having passed the river, attacked them in the rear, and the Christians being surrounded, were very speedily defeated, the grand master, Don Henry, and most of the chief commanders taken prisonersⁿ. Guilt is never secure: Mohammed Barbarossa had usurped the crown of Granada from his master, who, to save his life, had retired to Ronda, and therefore this victory, instead of rejoicing, alarmed him. He knew that the king of Castile was equally impetuous and obstinate: he was sensible he had provoked him, and he was conscious of his superiority. He acted, however, very prudently in this critical situation; he understood that the grand master and Don Henry were the king's principal favourites; he set them at liberty without ransom, he sent by them magnificent presents to Don Pedro, and he desired them to mediate a peace^o.

(U) We are told by some historians, that the murder of the unhappy queen was the fruits of another extraordinary adventure. The king, Don Pedro, being one day hunting, a rustic, who made a most rueful appearance, came up to him, and admonished him to desist from persecuting so religious and virtuous princess, and live with her as he ought to do, if he meant to escape the heavy vengeance of God. Upon this the king ordered the man to be seized, and thrown into a dungeon, while some of his creatures were ordered to make a strict enquiry, whether the queen had not some hand in sending this messenger; but, being satisfied that this conjecture was groundless, he ordered the peasant to be set at liberty, whether from his imprisonment only, or from all the miseries of this life, is not very clear; for it is asserted, that the man was never seen afterwards: he judged from hence, that his ill usage of the queen, having raised her many friends, and him as many enemies, the most effectual method to prevent any future attempts in her favour was to remove her out of the world; and, having entrusted a physician with this commission, he went to the place where she was confined, and dispatched her with a dose of poison. The Spanish historians seem to make a point of rendering that justice to the queen which her husband refused her: they represent her as the best princess that ever sat upon the Spanish throne; and the elequent Mariana is more eloquent than usual in deploring her misfortunes, which he observes began with her marriage, and ended with her life. Donna Maria de Padilla did not survive her many weeks; and the son which the king had by her followed her to the grave soon after. It may be, that authors are too bold in affirming these were the judgments of God upon the king for the unjust treatment of so good a princess; but it may be very true history, that this was the current opinion at the time, and in that light very well deserved to be recorded.

- a ALL this, however, had no effect; Don Pedro carried on the war with such fierceness, that Mohammed at length Mohammed Barbarossa resolved to go in person to Seville, and submit himself to a prince, whom he found it not in his power to resist. He demanded and received a safe conduct for this purpose, and then executed his design. Don Pedro received him with all the kindness and affability imaginable, and ordered one of the principal lords of his court to make a great feast for his new vassal. But being informed that Mohammed had brought with him great treasures, and that those who attended him had very rich jewels, he caused them to be seized at that feast; and, having mounted the king of Granada upon an ass, sent them out into a public place with a herald, proclaiming before them, that the king of Castile had condemned them to be put to death, as traitors against their lawful sovereign^p. Some say that Don Pedro with his own hands gave the king of Granada a mortal wound, and afterwards cut off his head^q. However that may be, it is universally confessed, that this unfortunate monarch, with thirty-seven of the principal persons in his court, were there slain, in breach of public faith, and spoiled of all their wealth (W). After this, the head of Mohammed Barbarossa being fixed upon a pole, he sent it to Mohammed Yago, at Ronda, advising him to go back to Granada, and resume the government, which he accordingly did; the Moors being so terrified at this action, that they received him without hesitation^r.
- b THE king of Castile soon after called an assembly of the states at Seville, where he declared to them, that he was lawfully married to Donna Maria de Padilla, before he espoused any other woman, in the presence of four witnesses, of whom her uncle Hinestroza was deceased, but the rest were living, whom he accordingly produced; and these were the grand master of Calatrava, Donna Maria's brother, his own chancellor, and his own chaplain, who swore what the king had said was true; upon which Don Alonso was acknowledged for the king's successor, and his three sisters in case of his demise, according to the ordinary rules of succession^s. He proceeded from thence to Soria, where he had solicited Don Carlos, king of Navarre, to meet him. Don Pedro entertained that prince, not only with all the splendour and magnificence, but with all the kindness and respect imaginable. One day, however, after dinner, Don Pedro took the king of Navarre aside, and told him, that having revenged himself on the king of Granada, for hindering that vengeance he would otherwise have taken of the king of Aragon, he found himself now at liberty to chastise that monarch to the utmost, in which he hoped he would not refuse him his assistance. Instead of observing that the peace still continued, or that himself had no quarrel against that king, Don Carlos approved of all, and promised his concurrence; the fate of the king of Granada was fresh in his mind, and the sight of the king of Castile's troops, of whom the town was full, would not suffer him to recollect any scruples, so that they parted very good friends^t. The war began the same year, and being made by surprize, Don Pedro of Castile gained some considerable advantages; the king of Aragon, on the other hand, recalled the count of Trastamara, and the followers of his fortune^u. On the eighth of October died Don Alonso, whom his father Don Pedro had declared his successor, upon which that monarch made his will, under an apprehension that his grief might cost him his life^v; but at the same time he made all imaginable preparations for carrying on the next campaign with vigour. In order to this, he not only pressed the kings of Portugal, Granada, and Navarre, to send troops and ships to his assistance, but entered likewise into an alliance with Edward the third of England, the terms of which were settled with his son Edward the black prince^x.
- c THE king of Aragon, though he paid great respect to Don Henry, count of Trastamara, yet he secretly revived his design of raising his brother, the Infant Don Ferdinand, to the throne of Castile.

(W) The death of Mohammed king of Granada was attended with so many aggravating circumstances, and carried in it such pregnant marks of barbarity, that one cannot easily conceive Don Pedro could hope to ward off any part of the shame that ought to attend such a glaring breach of hospitality, and a violation so apparent of public faith. Yet, in consequence of his being long practised in such mysterious and bloody expedients, he formed a scheme of setting this atrocious act in so plausible a light, that some well-meaning people have been deceived by it. He pretended that Mohammed had usurped the crown of Granada, and therefore was a fit object for public justice, which was executed upon him, and his adherents; not, indeed, according to the ordinary forms, to which usurpers have no title, because it would be unjust to allow the benefit of laws to those who have taken the benefit of them from others. There would, indeed, have been great weight in this, if Mohammed had fallen into his hands as a prisoner of war; but as he knew who he was, and what he was, before he granted him a safe conduct, as he had received his homage and his presents, and taken him into his protection, these arguments were of no weight at all. Besides, avarice and cruelty were the natural vices of this monarch, both of which were gratified in this foul action; and therefore it is the duty of an impartial historian to discover the fallacy, and to shew that these pretended motives of justice were, in fact, the colours only which this cunning prince invented after the fact, to cover the most crying of all crimes.

throne of Castile; which coming to take air, most of the exiles quitted the count Don Henry,^a and adhered to the Infant; and amongst these deserters were his own brethren, which occasioned no little discord. It is not at all unlikely, that this scheme was divulged, in order to promote a peace. Don Pedro, through the pope's legate, expressed himself not averse to it; and the plan, upon which he offered to treat, was this: he was willing to espouse Donna Joanna, the king of Arragon's daughter, and to give his own daughter, Donna Beatrix, to the Infant Don Juan, son and heir of the king of Arragon; but, previous to these measures and some others, he expected that the king of Arragon should oblige him so far as to put his own brother, together with three or four of his brethren, who were at the court of Arragon, to death, without delay^y. At this, that monarch did not much hesitate, though it may be doubted whether he was in earnest or not; however, his brother Don Ferdinand being exceedingly alarmed, excited a mutiny among the Castilians who were about him, and Don Henry, count of Trastamara, desired leave to retire into France. In this confusion, the king of Arragon ordered his brother, the Infant Don Ferdinand, to be arrested, who, resenting this usage, and endeavouring to defend himself, was slain^z. In the midst of these troubles, Don Pedro had a son born by one of his mistresses, whom, upon this event, he determined to marry, and therefore broke off the treaty^a.

Confederacy between the kings of Arragon, Navarre, and the count Don Henry.

ALL the Castilians who were in exile, uniting with zeal, under the count Don Henry, in whom lay all their hopes, the king of Arragon was forced to treat him with much respect. At the same time, advancing towards the frontiers of his dominions, he had a private interview with the king of Navarre, who had hitherto acted in favour of Castile from constraint. They agreed to set up the count Don Henry, and pull down his brother; but, at the same time, resolved that the king of Navarre should have Biscay and Castile for his share, the king of Arragon the realms of Murcia and Toledo, and that count Henry might keep the rest if he could^b. In order to bring this fine project to bear, a new interview was appointed at the castle of Sos, on the frontiers of Navarre, to which the count Don Henry was invited, in order to communicate to him so much of their scheme as might induce him to assist in the execution of it. The count consented to the interview, but upon condition that the castle was put into the hands of Don Juan Ramirez de Arellano, as not caring to trust himself to the good faith of those monarchs. This was agreed to, Don Juan put into possession of the place, which he garrisoned with his own vassals, and then the two kings and the count Don Henry repaired thither, with a very few domesticks^c. While the conference lasted, the monarchs of Arragon and Navarre proposed to Don Juan the massacring the count Don Henry and all his forces, which that nobleman rejected, with equal firmness and contempt; so that, in the end, they found it their interest to treat the count of Trastamara on the footing of an equal, and as a prince whom they meant to assist in becoming king of Castile. That prince discovering soon after the plots that had been formed against him, took a sudden resolution to quit Spain; but the king of Arragon, with some difficulty, pacified him, and made a new treaty, to the performance of which both parties swore, in the presence of the archbishop of Tarragona^d. But it was, notwithstanding, but indifferently kept.

THE next year was full of events of the same kind, and of treasons and murders; which, relating more particularly to the affairs of Arragon, belong to another place. We must, however, take notice, that Don Tello betrayed his brother and the king of Arragon to the king of Castile, who still carried on the war with great vigour and success, both by land and sea^e. As the king of Arragon saw clearly, that, in the course of this war, he was in great danger of losing his dominions, or at least a great part of them, unless the scheme of deposing Don Pedro of Castile actually took effect, he began the next year to turn his thoughts that way in earnest, and Providence furnished the means of chastising that barbarous prince. There were at that time in France upwards of 20,000 veteran troops, who had served against the English, and, from being the defenders, were now become the terrors of that country. These, by the assistance of the king of Arragon, the count Don Henry took into his pay. Under the command of the famous Bertrand de Guesclin, and John de Bourbon, count of la Marche, they began their march for Catalonia, and brought with them likewise some of their old enemies, the English, under several officers of note; for their common wants had made them very good friends, and their business in Spain was to get money^f.

a be proclaimed king, and then began his march directly towards Burgos, where his brother Don Pedro then was^e. The nobility and people solicited that prince, who had a numerous army, not to stir, assuring him of their fidelity; but he told them, that he knew his brother's inclinations and theirs better, and would therefore march to Seville, in order to secure his children and his treasures. The count Don Henry, meeting with little opposition, came to Burgos, where, finding most of the nobility of Castile, they readily accepted him for their king, and he was solemnly inaugurated a few days after^h. One of Don Pedro's creatures, to save his life, discovered an immense treasure in gold; and the Jews, who were ever in danger in such cases, made him a present of a vast sum of moneyⁱ. Henry, who had hitherto known little but danger and distress, and who perhaps was made wise by his brother's misfortunes, resolved, by the actions of one day, to secure the crown to himself and his descendants. His politics were not deep or refined, but they were very sensible and solid. He had in the day of his calamity made many promises, which had been taken in current payment by those who had advanced him to the throne; he thought it would contribute to keep him firmly settled thereon if he performed them punctually; and this he did the very day he was crowned king. The count de Ribagorça, who had married the heiress of Don Juan Emanuel, had all the estates of that family, with the title of marquis of Villena; to Bertrand du Guesclin he gave the lordship of Molina, and his own county of Traстамара to his brother Don Tello; the lordship of Biscay to another brother of his, Don Sancho Albuquerque and Le Desma; and, in short, to all who had rendered him service, he gave, if not to the value of their services, yet beyond their expectations^k.

Don Lopez de Luna, archbishop of Saragossa, upon the king's letter, conveyed the queen and her children to Burgos^l. Soon after their arrival, the king marched towards Toledo, which opened its gates on his approach; while Don Pedro at Seville, who the year before had concluded a marriage for his daughter Donna Beatrix, with the Infant of Portugal, sent her thither with a vast fortune in ready money; and, having embarked his treasures on board his fleet, quitted that city with his army, which he still commanded in person, and marched into Galicia^m. Don Gilles de Bocanegro fitted out a small squadron, and seized the ship in which the king's treasures were, which fell into the hands of his brother Henry, and amounted to thirty-six quintals of gold, and a prodigious quantity of jewels, which he had been amassing all his reignⁿ. Don Pedro, changing his intentions, proceeded to the frontiers of Portugal, and gave notice of his arrival to the king, who sent him word, that he could not prevail upon his son to marry his daughter, whom he therefore thought fit to restore with all her fortune^o; he went next to Albuquerque, where he proposed to leave his children: the inhabitants prevented that, by shutting their gates against him; this obliged him to demand a safe conduct through Portugal, into Galicia, where the people received him very cheerfully, through the persuasion of the archbishop of Compostella, whom he rewarded very strangely; for understanding that he was immensely rich, he murdered him, and seized all that he had^p: then leaving the government of Galicia to Don Ferdinand de Castro, he marched to Corunna, and embarked his troops on board his fleet, with which he sailed to Bayonne, in order to demand assistance from the prince of Wales^q. The king Don Henry, after receiving the submission of all Andalusia, marched with an army into Galicia; and having fully satisfied his mercenaries, dismissed them, reserving only the forces of the count de la Marche, those of Bertrand du Guesclin, of Hugh Corbelay, whose English name, for he was an Englishman, was Sir Hugh Calverly, and some others^r. Don Ferdinand de Castro shut himself up in Lugo, with a good garrison, which the king besieged; thinking his presence, however, necessary in Castile, he made an agreement with Don Ferdinand, that he should surrender all the places he held, if he was not relieved by Don Pedro before Christmas, in consideration of which he would bestow on him the lordship of Castro de Xerez, with the title of count, because it had belonged formerly to his ancestors. On the king's arrival at Burgos, he summoned an assembly of the states, who very cheerfully gave him all that he could ask, for the defence of himself and his dominions^s.

The king, Don Pedro, who in his passage had touched at St. Sebastians, and received on board thirty-six thousand pistoles in gold, which he had there, brought so much wealth into Guienne, that he was extremely welcome to the Black Prince, and to all the great lords of that country, who very readily offered him their services, in consideration of his money^t.

After mature deliberation, it was resolved that the prince should go in person, with a numerous a body of his victorious troops, to restore him to his dominions; which troops the king was to pay, and to bestow upon the prince the province of Biscay, and some other places. The constable of Guienne was to have the town of Soria and its district; and the king of Navarre, in consideration of a passage through his country, was to have the fortress of Alfaro, and all the country as far as Navarette; and, for the just performance of these promises, the king gave his children as hostages^u. It was not long before king Henry obtained a pretty good account of these transactions, upon which he invited the king of Navarre to an interview, in which, having taken great pains to shew him his own interests, and how easily he might prevent Don Pedro and the prince of Wales from passing through his country, concluded with him a treaty for that purpose, to the due performance of which both kings were sworn, in b the presence of the archbishops of Toledo and Saragossa; king Henry promising him Logrono, and giving him sixty thousand pistoles in gold^w. Don Pedro having notice of this, offered him, not only the place before-mentioned, but Victoria also.

Dexterous management of the king of Navarre in deceiving both parties.

The king of Navarre concluded a treaty with him too; and, to shew what a royal politician he was, when the English forces arrived upon his frontiers, he sent for Oliver de Mauny, who was cousin to Bertrand du Guesclin, and desired him to seize upon his person, as he was hunting, and carry him prisoner to a fort of which he was governor, for which service he offered him a sum of money, and the castle of Cherbourg in Normandy, which Oliver, who was a soldier of fortune, accepted; so that Don Pedro and the prince of Wales passed through Navarre without any opposition^x. Such English as had hitherto served king c Henry, left him upon the approach of the Black Prince; notwithstanding which, he resolved to give the enemy battle, contrary to the opinion of Bertrand du Guesclin, and the foreign officers, who assured him that the troops of the prince of Wales were invincible, while in full health and vigour; but that if he drew them farther into the country, and exposed them but for a few weeks to the rays of a Spanish sun, they would either retire of themselves, or fall an easy conquest^y. But Don Henry, knowing that his brother had many partizans, and being diffident, even of some of the troops in his own army, resolved to venture a battle, which was accordingly fought on the sixth of April, between Najara and Navarette, where, thro' the fault of Don Tello, the king's brother, the left wing was quickly beat, which brought on a total route, notwithstanding the king exposed himself extremely to prevent it^z. The loss was d very great; and, besides the numbers slain upon the spot, there were many persons of distinction taken prisoners. The king, Don Henry, made his escape with all possible diligence through Arragon, into France; and his queen, with her children, went to Saragossa^a.

The king, Don Pedro, seated again on the throne, and again endangered by his wiles.

Don Pedro's natural cruelty shewed itself, not only in the usage of the prisoners taken by his troops, but in causing a gentleman to be put to death, who fell into the hands of an English lord, which produced an expostulation on the part of the prince of Wales, which, how much soever he disliked, he thought fit to dissemble^b. They proceeded together as far as Burgos, where the prince lodged in the monastery De las Huelgas, and his brother John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, in the convent of St. Dominick. The prince of Wales found it necessary for his own safety to conclude a truce between the crowns of Castile and Arragon, e and a treaty for himself with the last-mentioned crown and that of Portugal, by which he stipulated the reciprocal assistance of each power in the division of the states of Castile, in case Don Pedro broke his faith with them, which they all suspected; and then, taking leave of him, returned back into Guienne, moved thereto chiefly by a sickness that broke out in his army^c. Don Pedro, now left to himself, began to indulge, in a greater degree than ever, that thirst of blood which rendered him universally odious and terrible. At Burgos, Toledo, and Seville, some people of the first quality were put to death, and numbers of inferior rank. In this political inquisition, even women did not escape^d. The king, Don Henry, did not suffer his spirits to be sunk through his misfortunes; but, on the contrary, solicited the count de Foix, who, out of mere compassion, offered him a retreat in his country, the king of f France by letters, and pope Urban the fifth, who then resided at Avignon, in person. He received from each of them, which rarely happens in such cases, more than he could demand or expect. The count gave him leave to raise forces in his territories, and allowed his son to command them. The pope received him kindly, freed him (if we can suppose that in his power) from all blemish of illegitimacy, and dismissed him from his presence as legal a monarch as he could, and as rich a one as it was convenient to make him^e. The king of

^a France exceeded both; for he ordered his brother, the duke of Anjou, to give him a large sum of money, made him a present of a strong fortress on the frontiers of Navarre, and allowed him to raise what troops he could. In virtue of these assistances, he assembled an army, with which he entered Castile, after having passed through Arragon, without the leave of that monarch, in the month of September, and, before the close of the year, was master of Castile and the kingdom of Toledo^f.

THE generous manner in which he had behaved towards such as assisted him in his former Besieges, in expedition, had induced all, who were not murdered or imprisoned, to put themselves in conjunction motion for his service. By the end of the month of April he became master of the city of Leon, the best part of that kingdom, and a great part of Asturias^g. The city of Toledo, how- with the king ever, refused to acknowledge him, though their archbishop had accompanied him in his exile. of Granada, The king, having in vain tried every method to persuade them, at length invested the city the city of Cor- dova without with a great army, being determined to reduce it by force^h. At this time, Don Pedro, with the very same intention, was before Cordova, with the king of Granada, who had brought six thousand horse, and thirty thousand foot to his assistance, and they pushed this siege with so much vigour, that they became masters of a great part of the city by storm; yet the cries of the women, from the apprehensions of Don Pedro's cruelty, were so loud and piercing, that the sight of their sorrow banishing all sense of danger, the men returned with such fury to the charge, that they dispossessed the Moors of all the places they had taken, and threw the greatest part of them over the walls. The next day the two kings attacked them again, and were repulsed with loss, after which they raised the siege, and separated their forcesⁱ. The people of Toledo, finding themselves exceedingly distressed, sent to Don Pedro for succours; and several towns on the frontiers of Navarre, having entered into an association for their own defence, and having a small body of regular troops, commanded by Don Tello, sent likewise to assure him of their fidelity, and to receive his orders, letting him know at the same time, that, on the one hand, they were pressed by the king of Navarre, and on the other, by Don Henry. Don Pedro returned them for answer, that he was preparing to relieve Toledo, which might create a diversion in their favour; but if, notwithstanding, they found themselves obliged to yield, he chose they should do it to his brother, and not to the king of Navarre. Yet Don Tello prevailed on them to take the contrary course, and to submit to the king of Navarre^k. 1363.

^d The king, Don Henry, in the camp of Toledo, created Don Bernard de Foix, the son of his friend, a count, and gave him the town of Medina Cæli, from whom the noble family, bearing afterwards the title of dukes of the same place, descended^l.

A NEW war having broke out between the French and English, Charles the fifth sent his The king, Don ambassadors to the king, Don Henry, before Toledo, with whom he made a perpetual league Henry, march- for themselves, their heirs, and successors; and the French king, in virtue of his engage- es to give his ments, promised to send Bertrand du Guesclin, with six hundred lances to his assistance^m. brother Don Don Pedro having drawn together all the troops he was able to assemble, in the neighbour- Pedro battle, hood of Seville, summoned his principal ally, the king of Granada, to send him fresh assistance, which he very readily did; and with these, and with the forces of the kingdom of Murcia, he resolved to attempt the relief of Toledo. As soon as Don Henry had intelligence of this, he left the archbishop with a sufficient corps of troops to invest the place; and with the flower of his nobility, and a well appointed army, marched to find out his brother. He looked on it as a good omen, that, at the very time he took this resolution, Bertrand du Guesclin arrived with his six hundred lances that had been promised him from *France*ⁿ. On his march he was joined by the grand master of St. James, with the forces he had brought out of Andalusia; and thus strengthened he advanced into the plains of Montiel. The country people making fires in the neighbourhood to give notice to Don Pedro, he surmised that these troops came to his assistance; but, before it was day, the next morning his advanced guards brought him advice, that Don Henry was in full march with all his forces to give him battle.

DON Pedro made the best disposition he could, and behaved very gallantly, but his troops never recovered the surprize they were in on the first attack, and were quickly routed^o. But Don Pedro, Don Pedro de- with a small body of foot, threw himself into the castle of Montiel, while Don stated, and af- Martin Lopez de Cor- towards dova, with eight hundred horse, and a thousand cross bows, retired into the strong fortress of Car- ted by his tro- mona, which the king had intended for his own retreat, and where he had left his children^p. fortified and well guarded. Don Pedro soon found the place not tenable against his brother's forces, and besides this, his garrison were in great want of provisions; he therefore applied himself to Bertrand du Guesclin, and promised him a large sum of money if he would suffer him to pass through his quarters. Bertrand having consulted his officers, discovered this to the king, Don Henry, and, at his request, assigned an hour, when Don Pedro might come to his tent, where Don Henry, followed by some resolute persons, rushed in, and, having struck him first in the face with his dagger, the rest fell upon him and put him to death, on the twenty-third of March, when he was thirty-five years and seven months old^a. This monarch was debauched, cruel, cunning, faithless, and covetous, in a supreme degree. After all the losses he had sustained, he left behind him at Seville, Almodava, and other places, no less than one hundred and fifty millions in gold and silver, besides jewels and plate to an immense value^b. Besides his children by Donna Maria de Padilla, he left a son Don Juan by Donna Joanna de Castro, and two other sons Don Sancho and Don Diego by Donna Isabella, who had been governess to his son Don Alonso. His two eldest daughters, at the time of his death, were hostages in Guienne, and the rest of his children in the castle of Carmona^c. He expired, therefore, with the most dreadful prospect before his eyes, in respect to all he held dear.

THE king, Don Henry, was far from remaining the peaceable possessor of his brother's dominions by his death; but, upon his arrival at Seville, he acquired all his treasures, which put him into a condition of maintaining the war against all his enemies, though they invaded his dominions almost on every side^d. The first thing he did was to offer good terms to Don Martin, who commanded in Carmona, which, when he rejected, he caused the place to be blocked up. The towns of Molina and Requena declared for the king of Arragon^e. Ciudad Rodrigo, Le Desma, Alcantara, Zamora, Tuy, Corunna, the city of St. James, Lugo, Orenza, and many other places, acknowledged Don Ferdinand, king of Portugal, who immediately coined money, with the arms of his own crown on one side, and those of Castile on the other^f. The king of Granada likewise gave him a vast deal of trouble; and the king of Arragon entered into a league with the prince of Wales and duke of Lancaster, for facilitating the conquests he meditated in Castile; and he likewise entered into another treaty with the king of Portugal, who, in support of his pretensions, invaded Galicia^g. On the other hand, Toledo having surrendered to the archbishop, and the queen and her children being come thither, the king went to meet them^h. He had not been long there, before he received the news of the king of Portugal's invading Galicia with a numerous army, upon which he marched thither with the troops that were about his person, with such celerity, that the king, Don Ferdinand, who was unwilling to risk a battle at so great a distance from his own dominions, left his troops in Corunna, and returned home by seaⁱ. The king, Don Henry, was no sooner informed of this, than he directed his march into Portugal, and having made himself master of the city of Braga, desolated all the country round about with fire and sword; upon which Don Ferdinand sent him a challenge, to which Don Henry answered, that if he came with an army, he knew where to find him; soon after which, having executed all that he designed by this invasion, he dispersed his troops into garrisons on the frontiers, and returned into Castile^j.

AT this juncture, the enemies of the king Don Henry were many, and the obstacles he had to overcome were great; but his notions of government were clear, his temper moderate, his application indefatigable. He had many things to attend; he suffered none of them to escape his notice; he kept his frontiers well guarded, Carmona and Zamora blocked up, and two or three flying armies in the field. In the assembly of the states at Medina del Campo, he ballanced accounts with the officers of the foreign troops in his service, paid them their whole demands, and gave them considerable gratifications, telling the states at the same time, "to these strangers we owe our present safety; it is but just, therefore, we should afford them establishments; as for their posterity, they will be brave men and Spaniards^k." The king of Granada had taken and rased Algezira, which gave the king great concern. He ordered his generals to lay waste the open country, which was extremely well cultivated, which forced the Moors to demand a truce, which his resentment did not hinder him from granting, because it was convenient for his affairs^l. The Portuguese blocked up the river of Seville with a fleet; his admiral Ambrose Bocanegra broke through it, with seven stout

- a galleys, having a large sum of money on board, with which he proceeded to Biscay, where he soon assembled a numerous squadron of large ships, well manned, with which he first beat the Portuguese, and then, by his master's orders, sailed to the assistance of the French monarch, and had the good fortune to defeat an English squadron, and to make the earl of Pembroke prisoner^a. His brother, the Infant Don Tello, dying, he gave the lordship of Biscay to his own son, the Infant Don Juan, and by that means annexed it for ever to the crown^c. On the frontiers of Arragon he kept a body of troops sufficient to defend his subjects, till his affairs were in such order as might enable him to recover what he had lost; and thus, by degrees, and the happy management of events, the prospect began to clear on every side, and the mildness of his administration made him beloved at home,
- b while his prudence and vigour rendered him respected abroad^f.

- In the beginning of the year, the pope sent his legate into Spain, with letters directed to the kings of Castile, Arragon, and Portugal, to persuade them to a peace; and at the same time he wrote to the prelates of Toledo, Seville, Saragossa, and Coinbra, requiring them to give all the assistance in their power to this good work. Don Henry received them with great kindness and respect, but advised them not to lose time at his court, since he was already well disposed in that respect as they could wish, upon which they departed for Portugal^e. In the mean time the king went in person to the siege of Carmona, where, some say, his life was in great danger from a sally made by the besieged. His guards, however, attempted the place by scaling, and about forty of them got into the town; but before they could force their passage to a gate, were surrounded and taken prisoners, and, some days after, the governor ordered them to be put to death^b. At length famine and frequent losses compelled Don Martin to capitulate, when he offered to deliver up his master's treasures and children, provided he might be at liberty to go where he pleased. The king added he must likewise deliver up Don Pedro's chancellor, who had been the great instrument of his cruelties, to which he very readily agreedⁱ. The king sent the treasures and the children of Don Pedro to Toledo, and ordered the chancellor and governor to be put to death. The latter insisted that this was against public faith; but the king alleged the murder of the forty soldiers, which being likewise against public faith, left him, in the king's opinion, no title to it^k. A severe judgment, but a good example. Zamora, and all the country of Galicia, quickly submitted; and the king of Portugal very wisely consented to a peace, and agreed to marry Donna Leonora, Infanta of Castile, with a portion of three hundred thousand crowns. Yet, soon after, falling in love with Donna Leonora Tellez, the wife of John Lawrence de Acunha, he sent ambassadors to the king of Castile, to excuse his declining the marriage; and, having caused the lady to be divorced from her husband, secretly made her his wife. The king of Castile told the ambassadors that he could always find a match for his daughter, and that though he wished him for his son-in-law, he was very well content to esteem the king of Portugal his friend and ally^l. Towards the close of the year, at the request of the pope's legate, he concluded a truce with the crown of Navarre, and another with that of Arragon; and the face of peace being thus universally restored, he sent the Infant Don Juan to take possession of Biscay^m. 1371.
- e As those who have done a great injury can seldom be brought to forgive sincerely, so the king of Portugal, apprehending the resentment of Don Henry, entered into a treaty with John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who had married Donna Constantia, daughter to the king Don Pedro, invited him into his dominions, and promised to support his pretensions; upon which he assumed the title of king of *Castile*ⁿ. In confidence therefore of receiving these succours in due time, he made an irruption into Galicia, surprized Tuy and some other places, which were speedily recovered by the king of Castile, who, when he once understood the bottom of the design, immediately undertook to cure the king of Portugal of a resolution to disturb him. In the first place, he sent a squadron of ships to the assistance of the French, that by finding employment for the English nearer home, he might be in the less danger of being troubled with them in Portugal; and at the same time he charged his admiral with negotiating the repurchase of those lands, which he had given to Bertrand du Guesclin; for, as he was now become constable of France, it was not at all probable he should ever think of returning into Spain, which proposal was readily accepted: and, for the sum of two hundred and seventy thousand crowns in gold, the king recovered all the places he had formerly granted him^o.

compels both him and the king of Navarre once more to demand
peace.

WHILE his fleet was thus employed, the king made an expedition into Portugal, and took several places; but, upon the application of the pope's legate, he consented to a short truce, and likewise renewed that with Arragon for eight months^p. The truce being expired, Don Henry, in the very depth of winter, made himself master of Viseo, and from thence advanced towards Coinbra; but being informed that Donna Leonora, queen of Portugal, had retired thither to lie in, he sent her a compliment, importing that her presence was an invincible garrison^q; upon which he moved towards the king of Portugal, who was encamped at Santaren; but finding that he would act only on the defensive, he proceeded to insult Lisbon, and, by the assistance of a squadron from Seville, he burnt part of the lower town, and some ships in the harbour^r. This gave such a weight to the endeavours of the pope's legates for obtaining a peace, that at length preliminaries were settled, by which the king of Portugal engaged, that whenever king Henry sent a squadron to the assistance of France, he would likewise send five ships or galleys; that Don Ferdinand de Castro, and the rest of the exiles from Castile should be obliged to quit his dominions; and that Don Sancho, the king of Castile's brother, should marry Donna Beatrix, sister to king Ferdinand; and that Don Alonso, the natural son of king Henry, should marry Donna Isabella, the natural daughter of king Ferdinand, when they were of competent age: in consideration of which, the king Don Henry was to restore all the places he had taken. This treaty the two kings signed and swore to, in the presence of the legates; after which, the first of the two marriages was celebrated, and Donna Isabella was put into the hands of the king of Castile^s. A peace was some months afterwards concluded with the king of Navarre, who took advantage from thence to solicit the king of Castile to detach himself from France, and to make a league with the English, which the king absolutely refused, notwithstanding that the duke of Lancaster offered, in that case, to accept of a sum of money in lieu of his pretensions; to which, independent of the league, the king of Castile declared he had no objection: the truce with Arragon was also prolonged; and thus the peace of his dominions was once again restored^t, which enabled him to put his affairs into so good order, that he had no reason to fear any of his neighbours.

length a sincere and solid peace with the king of Arra-
gon.

THE duke of Lancaster being extremely piqued at the refusal of the king of Castile to quit the party of the French, resolved to carry his threats into execution, and with this view levied forces, and entered into a treaty with the crown of Arragon. The king, Don Henry, assembled a great army in the neighbourhood of Burgos, where a quarrel happening amongst the soldiers on the 19th of March, his brother, Don Sancho, interposing, to prevent a mutiny, received a wound in his face with a lance, of which he died, leaving his wife, Donna Beatrix, with child of a daughter, named Donna Leonora, who was afterwards queen of Arragon^u. The king was extremely afflicted, and, in the first transport of his passion, would have put to death all the soldiers that had any share in the quarrel; but the nobility pacified him; so that only a few of the most guilty were punished^v. He sent to the king of Arragon, to put him in mind of their former friendship; to press him to send his daughter Donna Leonora to espouse the Infant Don Juan, prince of Castile, as they had been passionately in love with each other from their very childhood; and to assure him, that he was content to give him any reasonable satisfaction, in reference to the disputes between them. The king of Arragon demanded, in a peremptory manner, the kingdom of Murcia. The king of Castile answered, that it was true he had promised him that kingdom for his assistance, but that this promise was made void by his entering into a treaty with the prince of Wales, and the share he had in deposing him; that, notwithstanding this, he was unwilling to have recourse to arms, in order to recover those places which he had seized in times of public confusion. After much altercation, a treaty was concluded, and signed by the two kings, on the 12th of April, by which a perpetual peace was stipulated for themselves and successors, the time fixed for their marriage, and the sum of one hundred and eighty thousand pieces of gold fixed as an equivalent for the restitution of the places which the king of Arragon was to restore^x. This treaty was ratified and sworn to on the 28th of May, to the great satisfaction of both nations. The same year, the king being informed that the French had obliged the duke of Lancaster to abandon his design of invading Castile, by harrassing his troops in such a manner that they were unable to prosecute their march, he thought himself obliged to return this favour, by making an expedition, in person, into Guienne, and sending also a strong fleet to their assistance, which terminated the operations of this year^y.

- a' IN the spring Don Carlos, prince of Navarre, came to Soria, and there espoused, on the 27th of May, the Infanta Donna Leonora of Castile, and on the 17th of June following the Infanta Leonora of Arragon was married at the same place, to Don Juan Infant of Castile². But Don Alonso, count of Gijon, the king's natural son, taking some distaste to the prince's of Portugal, whom his father had chosen for his wife, fled out of his dominions; and after visiting the court of France, and that of the pope at Avignon, he at length thought proper to return, and to comply with his father's inclinations³. The engagements he had entered into with the duke of Anjou, brother to the French king, who claimed the kingdom of Majorca by donation, gave some umbrage to the king of Arragon, but not sufficient to create any rupture between the two crowns, because the monarch of Arragon saw clearly, that if the king of Castile had meant any thing more than was pretended by those treaties, he would have stipulated greater succours; and, therefore, he thought it best to pass by an offence that might be augmented by taking notice of it. This had a good effect; for the king of Castile gave him to understand, that though he could not refuse his assistance to the brother of the French monarch, yet he meant not to infringe the treaty that subsisted between them⁴. The Infanta Donna Beatrix of Portugal, being the apparent heiress of that kingdom, the king of Castile proposed a match between her and his son Don Frederick, which the king of Portugal readily accepted, though Don Frederick was a bastard; and the children were accordingly married, with great solemnity, by proxy; but, as we shall see hereafter this marriage never took effect. In the course of this year, died Edward, prince of Wales, which was considered as a favourable event in the councils of Castile⁵. A. D. 1375.

THE king of Navarre having entered into a project for exchanging the territories he possessed in Normandy, with the crown of England, for lands of an equal value in Gascony, it was resolved to send the prince Don Carlos to conclude and execute this bargain. As Don Carlos had married the daughter of the king of Castile, it was natural for him to consult him upon his journey, from which the king dissuaded him, as he was to take the court of his uncle, the king of France, in his way; where he must either deal perfidiously with that monarch, or avow to him his father's designs. The prince, notwithstanding, went with some counsellors of his father's, but they were arrested at Paris, and his companions proceeded against and condemned as traitors. In the mean time, king Edward the third, of England, died; notwithstanding which, the king of Navarre continued his intrigues with his grandson Richard the second⁶. He foresaw that this would bring on a war with the crown of Castile, and therefore projected the acquisition of Logrono, a place of great beauty and importance, standing in the midst of a fair plain on the bank of the river Ebro. The method he took was to corrupt Don Pedro Manrique, a nobleman of the nicest honour in Castile, and the sum he offered him was 20,000 pieces of gold. Don Pedro, having first acquainted the king his master, closed with the proposals, received all the money at several payments, and, at the time appointed, admitted six hundred of the king of Navarre's troops; but immediately after disarmed and made them prisoners of war, and was very near trapping the king himself⁷. Soon after, the Infant Don Juan of Castile made an irruption into Navarre, and advanced within sight of Pampeluna. At this time there was a schism in the church of Rome, occasioned by the election of Urban the sixth, and Clement the seventh, to the papal dignity; the French adhering to the former, and the English to the latter; but the kings of Castile and Arragon very wisely declined owning either; and this by the advice of the wisest of their prelates and great lords⁸. So that in such cases as these, we find those suing to be acknowledged to have any power, who, as soon as that was admitted, laid claim to all. 1376.

THE king thought fit to hold an assembly of all the prelates in his dominions, in the town of Illescas, where a resolution was taken to sequester the papal revenues, till it could be known to whom they belonged; for the discussion of which matter another assembly was held at Burgos⁹. There the king of Navarre applied himself to Don Henry, to obtain a peace, of which his affairs stood in great need. The king of Castile prescribed to him such terms as he thought fit, and amongst the rest, discharging the English and the Gascon troops that were in his pay, to which the king of Navarre objected that he had no money to give them, and they would not go without; upon which Don Henry lent him a considerable sum; and having taken the necessary securities for his observing the peace, restored all that he had taken during the war¹⁰. In a very short time after the conclusion of this treaty, the king fell ill of a slow consuming disease, which having gradually wasted his strength, brought him at last to the grave, on the 25th of May, as is reported by Don Pedro Lopez de Ayala¹¹; 1377.

though many other historians report, that Mohammed Yago, king of Granada, perceiving a that he had at length accomplished his plan of settling a firm peace with all his neighbours, suspected that it must be with a view of attacking his dominions with his whole force, and therefore prevailed upon an old servant of his to seek shelter at the court of Castile, as if he had been ill treated by him, and to watch an opportunity of poisoning the king, which he is said to have effected by a present of a pair of beautiful buskins, which were scented with a venomous perfume^k. Ferreras considers this as a vulgar report, which might take rise from the king's falling ill not long after this present was made him. Indeed, if we consider the propensity of the common people to attribute the deaths of princes to some extraordinary cause, and their implacable hatred of the Moors, it will not appear at all improbable.

THE Infant Don Juan succeeded his father, and was crowned on the 25th of July, with his queen Leonora, at Burgos; and, on the 4th of October following, the queen was delivered, in the same city, of the Infant Don Henry^l. About the same time arrived embassadors from France, to thank the king for the succours sent by his father and himself, which had done remarkable service. - Mohammed Yago, king of Granada, dying, was succeeded by his son Mohammed Guadix Abulbagen, a prince of many virtues, and of a most pacific disposition, who immediately sent ambassadors to felicitate the king Don Juan on his accession to the throne of Castile, and to renew the truce between the two crowns during their reigns; which proposition was well received, and the embassadors returned highly satisfied with the civilities that were paid them^m; and this, which seemed but a temporary expedient, by the correspondence between their tempers lasted all their reigns.

A. D. 1379. THE young king of Castile resembled his father extremely in his temper, and laboured nothing so much as to preserve peace, and to protect his subjects in the full enjoyment of it: with this view he sent embassadors into Portugal, where they were extremely well received by the king Don Ferdinand, who, with some great and many amiable qualities, was one of the most fickle and mutable princes of that ageⁿ. He desired, therefore, that the marriage formerly contracted between Don Frederick, the king's natural brother, and his daughter, the Infanta Donna Beatrix, should be cancelled, that she might be at liberty to marry the Infant Don Henry, who was not quite a year old. To this the king readily consented; and though there was something very whimsical, not to say ridiculous, in this affair, yet the treaty was managed with a great deal of ceremony; a very singular clause inserted, that if either of the parties should die without issue, the other should inherit the dominions of both, and was with great ceremony ratified by the states of both kingdom^o. The monarch of Castile having adjusted these points, and dispatched a squadron of twenty men of war to the assistance of the French, went to Toledo, in order to assist at his father's funeral; and afterwards held an assembly of the states at Medino del Campo, where, after mature deliberation, it was resolved to acknowledge pope Clement the seventh^p. Before this assembly was dissolved, the king had intelligence, that in the midst of all that appearance of cordiality shewn by the king of Portugal, he was actually negotiating an alliance with Richard the second, of England, and with John, duke of Lancaster, who still continued to use the title of Castile, and whom Don Ferdinand had invited to come with a fleet and army to Lisbon. Don Juan, instead of expostulating upon this subject, ordered his forces to assemble, and the principal places on his frontiers to be repaired: being thoroughly persuaded, that the best way to prevent a war is to prepare for and provide for it in time^q.

That crown negotiates an alliance against him at the same time, and soon after commences war.

On the 25th of May deceased Donna Joanna, queen dowager of Castile, a woman distinguished by virtues the most rare, as well as the most unaffected piety, whose firmness in adversity rendered her always respected, and whose humility in the time of her prosperity was universally admired^r. The king being informed that his brother Don Alonso held a private correspondence with the king of Portugal, endeavoured to surprize him, but he made his escape into Asturias, where he took shelter in his strong castle of Gijon; to which, when the king followed him, Don Alonso came out, assured him that he had been misrepresented, upon which they were presently reconciled^s. The king, Don Juan, then resolved to attack Portugal, both by land and sea, before the arrival of their auxiliaries from England; but Don Ferdinand spared him the labour, by sending a fleet of four ships and twenty gallies to insult the harbour of Seville. In their passage they met the admiral of Castile, Don Ferdinand de Tobar, with twenty gallies, who at first declined fighting; but perceiving that five of the Portuguese gallies were gone to take in water at a port upon the coast, he attacked the rest of the fleet with so much vigour, that he took sixteen gallies, and on board of one of them Don Juan Alonso, who was the queen's brother, and with these prizes returned in triumph to a Seville. The king, Don Juan, besieged the castle of Almeyda and reduced it. On the 18th of July the English fleet arrived in the harbour of Lisbon, commanded by Edmund, earl of Cambridge, the eldest son of the duke of York, having with him a small army of between three and four thousand men, his countess, and his son Edward, afterwards duke of York, who was killed at the battle of Agincourt, then a child of six years old; notwithstanding which, the first thing done was, to marry him to the Infanta Beatrix, and they were not only married but bedded in public. The good correspondence, however, between the English and Portuguese, did not last long; there were great complaints, and very probably not altogether without cause, on both sides; of which the king of Castile having notice, he resolved to shut up the port of Lisbon against fresh succours, and to deal with those who were already arrived as well as he could.^a

A. D. 1381.

WHILE the king meditated certain important operations, both by land and sea, his brother Don Alonso, Count de Gijon, actually quitted his dominions, and retired to Braganza in Portugal, with several lords who were attached to him. The king dissembled the offence against him, continued his preparations, and fitted out a fleet, with which he gave great disturbance to the inhabitants of Lisbon, and obliged the king of Portugal to remove his court from thence.^w As soon as his army began to be in motion towards the enemies frontiers, he signified to his brother, who was still at Braganza, that he should return without delay, upon which he repeated the order; Don Alonso returned for answer, that if he would send him the Infant Don Ferdinand, his second son, the sons of six of the principal nobility, and put a certain number of castles into his hands for his security, himself and his friends would return. Don Juan, without taking the least notice of this proposition, sent a third order for him and his adherents to return to their duty by a certain day, on pain of being declared traitors, and all their estates confiscated; upon which his friends retired without taking leave; and, after a few days, he was constrained to follow their example.^x The king of Portugal having assembled all his forces, and seeming determined to give the Castilians battle, the king created Don Hernando Alvarez de Toledo, and Don Pedro Ruys Sarmiento, marshals of the field, which was the first time that title had been heard of in Castile.^y The king of Portugal, to shew he would not be vanquished by titles, gave that of constable to Don Alvaro Perez de Castro, and made Vasquez de Azevedo marshal.^z The two armies being in sight of each other, the new constable and marshal advised their master to make peace, to which he readily listened, and granted them full powers for that purpose, but desired they would treat it with great secrecy. Upon this, they went in the night to the camp of Castile, where, having acquainted the king with their commission, he likewise named two plenipotentiaries, by whom the peace was presently settled on the following terms. The Infanta Donna Beatrix was to be once more married to the Infant Don Ferdinand, son to the king of Castile, who was in the second year of his age; the Portuguese admiral, with his gallies and men, were to be set at liberty; and the king of Castile was to furnish a fleet to carry the English home. Don Juan scrupled this at first; but the Portuguese plenipotentiaries represented, that home they must be sent, and they had no fleet; and, if they had, they were afraid of its being seized in England; so that at length it was ratified.^a As soon as this came to be divulged, the earl of Cambridge and his troops were extremely irritated; but the Spanish fleet arriving before the bay of Lisbon, and there being no remedy, they embarked, and were very safely carried home. The joy which the king Don Juan conceived at the conclusion of this troublesome affair, was quickly turned into grief, by the death of his queen Donna Leonora, in childbed, exceedingly regretted, as she was universally beloved by his subjects.^b At the request of the king of Navarre, he interposed with the French monarch, for the liberty of the prince Don Carlos, and Charles the sixth granted it, as a very particular mark of his esteem. Upon his return home, the king, his father, sent him to return thanks to the king of Castile, in person, who received him very kindly, and dismissed him with rich presents, by which he attached him most cordially to his interests.^c

The king, Don Juan, forces Portugal to conclude a secret and separate peace.

A. D. 1382.

f As soon as it was decent, or, perhaps, a little earlier, the king of Portugal sent one of his ministers to insinuate to Don Juan of Castile, that his daughter, the Infanta Donna Beatrix, being of a fit age to be married, he would be much better pleased to have him for his son-in-law, than that the Infanta should wait for the Infant Don Ferdinand. There was some opposition to this in the councils of Castile; but, as the king himself was inclined to the marriage, it was quickly concluded, upon condition that the children of the king and the Infanta should succeed to the kingdom of Portugal; and that, in case the throne became vacant before such children were born, the queen-dowager should govern with the title of regent.^d Donna

By his marriage with the Infanta Donna Beatrix he acquires a title to Portugal.

Leonora accompanied her daughter to the frontiers: the king, Don Juan, arrived at Badajoz ^a on the first of May, from whence he proceeded to Xelves, where he espoused the Infanta Donna Beatrix, brought her the same afternoon to Badajoz, and the next day received the nuptial benediction in the cathedral church ^c. Soon after this his brother Don Alonso revolted the second time, or rather the third, and retired to Gijon, whither the king followed and reduced him; and, though he did not deprive him of his liberty, yet he reprimanded him severely ^f. In the assembly of the states, held soon after at Segovia, the old method of reckoning by the æra of Cæsar was laid aside for that of our Lord, according to Ferreras, in the year of that æra 1421 ^e. While the king was employed in regulating the domestic concerns of his government, he had intelligence that his father-in-law, Don Ferdinand, lay at the point of death; upon which he sent some persons, in whom he could confide, to Lisbon, ^b and drew himself nearer to the frontiers. On the 22^d of October that monarch departed this life, and left his dominions in almost inexpressible confusion ^h. Donna Beatrix, his only daughter, had been acknowledged by the states as the legal heiress of the throne. The people, in general, however, inclined to Don Juan the king's brother, who was son to Don Pedro by his second wife, the famous Agnes de Castro. This Don Juan, a few years before, falling in love with Donna Maria Tellez, sister to Leonora queen of Portugal, married her; which raised such a spirit of envy in the queen, that she caused it to be insinuated to Don Juan, that her sister was false to his bed, and that, if he was once free from so bad a wife, she was inclined to give him the Infanta Donna Beatrix: upon which, transported with jealousy and ambition, he barbarously murdered the innocent lady ⁱ. But discovering, when it was too ^c late, the falshood of the queen's information, and of her promise, he retired into Castile; where, upon the death of his father-in-law, the king caused him to be arrested, together with his brother the Count Don Alonso, whom their father had married against his will to a bastard daughter of the late king of Portugal, in whose right, or rather in whose name, he attempted to form some pretensions ^k. The queen-dowager had the title of regent; and her daughter, the reigning queen of Castile, was proclaimed queen of Portugal: but another brother of the late king, whose name was likewise Don Juan, but a bastard, being grand master of the military order of Avis, seized upon the government, partly by force, partly with the consent of the people, and assumed the title of protector ^l.

THE more the king of Castile considered the affairs of Portugal, the more he found himself ^d at a loss how to conduct himself therein. He was very desirous of complying with the engagements to which he had sworn at his marriage, and signified the same to the states of Portugal, assuring them that he was willing the queen-dowager should govern with the title of regent, during her life; and that he did not seek the crown for himself but for his posterity ^m. The queen Leonora being constrained to quit Lisbon, retired to Santaren, and from thence intreated the king to come to her relief, as she had no other resource. Upon this Don Juan of Castile put himself at the head of his forces, and marched with them into Portugal. The grand master of Avis declared this a breach of the marriage treaty, and that he had forfeited all his rights thereby. At the same time he sent ambassadors into England, to make an alliance with king Richard the second, or rather with his uncles who governed him. The king of ^e Castile, perceiving plainly that there was no hope of acquiring Portugal but by conquest, ordered his fleet from Seville to block up the port of Lisbon, and invited his brother-in-law Don Carlos prince of Navarre to come to his assistance ⁿ. War was now carried on with great fury on both sides; several great towns, and many of the nobility, acknowledged Don Juan of Castile for their king; but the Portuguese nation in general adhered firmly to the protector ^o. Several actions happened with variety of success; sometimes the troops of Castile had the better, sometimes they were beaten by the Portuguese. This great confusion was increased by the king's discovering that the queen dowager had entered into a new intrigue with Don Pedro count of Trastamara, whom she proposed to marry, and to murder the king. Upon this he caused her to be arrested, and sent prisoner into Castile ^p. He then besieged Lisbon, took ^f the fort of Almeyda, and, upon the arrival of Don Carlos, with a noble body of troops, his affairs began to wear a better appearance; but the scene was soon changed; the plague broke out in his army, and, though he persisted some time in carrying on the siege, yet at length, chiefly by the persuasion of the prince of Navarre, he decamped; and, having put strong garrisons into the places that had declared for him, retired with the rest of his army into his own dominions, not a little chagrined at the turn things had taken ^q.

- a dangerous enemy, he would reward it as a most acceptable service. The count embraced this ^{potent army,} infamous proposition, and took his measures with two other noblemen for the execution of it: ^{and is beaten} but the protector arresting two of their friends upon certain suspicions, the conspirators ^{by Don Juan,} imagined, though without any grounds, they were discovered, and immediately consulted ^{whom the Por-} their safety by flight ^{tuguese elected} ^{for their king.} This mortified the king Don Juan extremely; nor was it long before he received another piece of news, which gave him still greater uneasiness, which was, that the states of Portugal had taken upon them to elect and proclaim the protector king ^a. After mature deliberation, however, and a thorough persuasion of his own title, and that the force of his dominions was infinitely superior to that of Portugal, he determined to invade it by land and sea. With this view he ordered a great fleet to be fitted out at Seville, as well as a strong squadron from Biscay, with a vast quantity of provisions on board, for the support of his army, at the head of which he marched to the frontiers ^b. There, however, he held several councils of war, in order to settle the operations of the campaign; and some of the ablest persons about him dissuaded him from proceeding further, at least in person, as he was very ill of an ague, as the new king of Portugal had obtained a considerable victory at Truncofo, as the king had lost most of his father's old officers by the plague the preceding year, and as the whole nation seemed determined to succeed or perish in support of their new king: but the young lords, who were about him, had their heads so full of the glory of Castile, and relied so much on the superiority of their forces, that at length the king was persuaded to prosecute his design; and, after having in vain attempted to enter into a treaty, he resolved to stake all upon a decisive action ^c. It is said that the army of Castile exceeded thirty thousand men; whereas those who carry things highest acknowledge, that the king of Portugal had not above twelve thousand, and the historians of that country say not above half that number. He did not, however, decline fighting, but chose an advantageous post, and declared his resolution to wait there for the army of Castile. When the king, Don Juan, was in sight of the enemy, he halted, in order to advise once more with his principal officers, amongst whom there were some who suggested that, as the enemy were posted between two morasses, it would be very imprudent to attack them, more especially that day, the army being fatigued, and having had scarce any refreshment: but the young officers insisted that it would be infamous, after looking the Portuguese in the face, not to attack them without delay. The king, being himself under great doubts, had recourse to M. de Rie, the French ambassador, a man of sixty years of age, who had spent his whole life in arms. He modestly told the king, that, a battle being resolved upon, the point was to gain a victory, and not to pique himself upon being hasty in attacking. In spite of this the young people prevailed; the Portuguese were immediately attacked in their advantageous post, and, in half an hour, the Castilians were routed. There fell upon the spot Don Pedro de Arragon, son to the marquis of Villena, the king's two nephews, Don Juan, son to Count Tello, and Don Ferdinand, son to the count Don Sancho, with many other persons of great distinction, and a multitude of private men ^d. This, which is generally stiled the battle of Aljubarotta, was fought upon the fourteenth of August, about three in the afternoon: the king fled that night to Santaren, upon his mule, which is above thirty miles: there he embarked on board a tartane, which carried him to his fleet, and soon after he returned to Seville ^e. The just sorrow arising from so heavy a loss, was not a little increased by the Portuguese invading Castile, and beating the grand masters of St. James, Alcantara, and Calatrava, with a superior army, the first of these great men being killed on the spot ^f. To repair these disasters, and to provide against the consequences of the duke of Lancaster's arrival in Portugal, with a numerous fleet and army from England, A. D. 138. Don Juan dispatched ambassadors to pope Clement the seventh, at Avignon, and to king Charles the sixth of France, to desire their advice and assistance ²; an employment his ambassadors had never exercised before.
- His ministers were received at Paris with all imaginable marks of kindness and respect, and were sent back with the strongest assurances that the king would second his professions of friendship, by marching two thousand lances to his assistance ³. Don Pedro, the son of Don Fredrick the grand master, who was the king's uncle, returned with these ambassadors to Castile, and was, in consideration of the French king's letters, very kindly received by the king his cousin. As for the pope, he had nothing to give but a little good advice, which he sent him very freely ^b. At the opening of the spring, the king of Portugal sent a fleet of twelve ships and six gallies to bring over the duke of Lancaster and his forces; soon after which he took the field and besieged Chaves, which, after a gallant defence, he reduced. In the month of July the duke of Lancaster landed at Padron, in Galicia, with fifteen hundred lances and the like number of cross-bows. He marched directly to the city of St. James at Compostella, which opened her gates as to her sovereign, and there he was proclaimed king of Castile in right of his wife Donna Constantia, who accompanied him, with their daughter Donna Catalina, and two daughters that the duke had by his former wife, Blanch, heiress of the house of Lancaster^c. The king of Portugal sent him a present of twelve white mules; the duke, in return, gave him as many greyhounds and falcons: a treaty was, not long after, concluded between them, in consequence of which that monarch espoused Donna Philippa, one of the duke's daughters, the other, Isabella, being already married to the earl of Pembroke^d. Within a short space after the conclusion of this treaty, the Duke of Lancaster sent a herald at arms to Don Juan, requiring him to surrender the kingdom of Castile; who thereupon sent Juan Serrano, a clergyman, and two doctors of the civil law to Orenza, where the duke then was, to acquaint him with the grounds of his title, and they were both patiently and publicly heard. But Juan Serrano, having sought a private audience of the Duke, told him, that his master was willing to put an end to the difference, by marrying his son and heir, the Infant Don Henry, to Donna Catalina, his daughter; which the duke did not at all dislike, and which his wife, Donna Constantia, highly and heartily approved; but, for the present, the treaty with Portugal stood in the way, and the duke contented himself with giving them a civil answer^e.

A. D. 1386. THE king, Don Carlos of Navarre, dying on the first day of the succeeding year, and his son, the prince Don Carlos being raised to the throne, his brother-in-law the king of Castile, as a mark of his affection, remitted, the twenty thousand pistoles that were due to him from that crown, and restored the castles that had been put into his hands to secure the repayment of that sum^f. In the summer the Portuguese and the English made an irruption into the territories of the king of Castile, who, at that time, either had not an army sufficient to give them battle, or, from motives of policy, sought to decline it. He therefore caused the country before them to be laid waste, harassed their troops upon every march, and gave them so much disturbance in one or two sieges, that they found it very expedient to retire into Portugal. Thither the king of Castile sent some of his ministers again to the duke of Lancaster, who, finding that the climate did not by any means agree with his troops, resolved to return into Gascony, and sent the king of Castile word he should be glad to receive his ministers at Bayonne^g (X). Thither, accordingly, repaired the king's confessor and two doctors, who were of his privy council, met with a very gracious reception, and, in a very short time, concluded a decisive treaty; by which it was settled, that the Duke's only daughter by Donna Constantia should espouse, as soon as he was of an age to marry, the Infant Don Henry: and, in case he died before the consummation of the marriage, she should become the wife of his younger brother Don Ferdinand: that five good towns, with their territories, which were named, should be given as a dowry to Donna Constantia: that the duke should receive six hundred thousand pieces of gold for the expences of the war: that

(X) The campaign completed the ruin of the English army, which the winter had begun. The climate of Galicia did by no means agree with English constitutions: the season proved rainy and unwholesome; provisions were scarce, which tempted the soldiers to plunder, and, in revenge of this, the Spaniards knocked them on the head. It was with difficulty, therefore, that he assembled a tolerable force to join the Portuguese, and, when he did, they could do but little. The Spanish historians relate all this, but very modestly, and without treating our countrymen with the least disrespect; whereas our own historians, who wrote in or near those times, expose this expedition of the duke's as very rashly undertaken, and very unskillfully conducted. One writer particularly assures us, that the duke's troops, through famine, deserted in such numbers, that the king of Portugal insisted upon giving the enemy battle immediately; because, in their present feeble condition, the English deserters would be a burthen to them; whereas he dreaded the effects of their valour, if they had time to recover their strength: but the duke is said to have dissuaded him from this, being sensible that it was not through disaffection that they went over to the enemy, but thro' downright want. Upon this our author assures us, that the duke humbled himself in a very extraordinary manner before God; promised an amendment of life, and made other vows, to which he attributes entirely the king of Castile's renewing the treaty, and offering an enemy in distress all that he could have demanded if he had been victorious; for the duke of Lancaster's only view was to see his daughter queen of Castile. Mariana and this author likewise seem to be a little premature in affirming that the principal points of the agreement were settled while the duke remained in Portugal; whereas, in reality, he declined treating while within that kingdom, but gave the king Don Juan good reasons to believe that things would be amicably adjusted by permitting lord John Holland, upon his arrival at Lisbon from London, to enroll as many of his men as were willing to go with him into Gascony; which very plainly intimated either a resolution in him to put an end to the war, or an absolute inability to continue it. There is no doubt that the king of Portugal was not very well pleased with this treaty, which he foresaw must be concluded; but his people were very weary of the company of foreigners; so that, upon the whole, he was well enough satisfied to be rid of those who might do him a great deal of hurt, and who could do him but very little good if they would.

- a his duchess should receive forty thousand franks a year; and that, in consideration of the due performance of these articles, the duke and duchess should renounce for ever their rights to the crown of Castile. All this was ratified and approved in an assembly of the states of the kingdom, as well as by the king Don Juan: but when it came to be ratified by the duke and duchess, they did it with this proviso, that the heir apparent of the crown of Castile should thenceforward bear the title of prince of Asturias^h. The princess, Donna Catalina, was conducted from Fontarabia to Palencia, and there, in the presence of the king, espoused to the Infant Don Henry; that prince being about nine years old, and herself about fourteenⁱ; Mariana says the prince was ten and the princess nineteen years of age; but this is clearly a mistake, since it is very certain that the duke of Lancaster had not been married to Donna
- b Constantia above sixteen years^k. Some short time after the duchess of Lancaster sent to let the king know, that she was extremely desirous of seeing him and her children the prince and princess of Asturias; upon which he sent several persons of the first distinction to conduct her to Medina del Campo, where he was; and, during her stay there, she was treated with such respect and cordiality, that she presented the king with a crown of gold, that had been made for her husband, and a vessel of the same precious metal, exquisitely wrought^l. After a considerable stay at Medina, she complied with the king's request of going to pass the winter at Toledo, where she received the compliments of almost all the nobility of the first rank in Spain, and where her conduct was so prudent, as gained her the hearts of the king and queen.

- In the spring the king accompanied the duchess of Lancaster to Burgos, with an intent to
- c have proceeded to Fontarabia, that he might also confer with the duke her husband. But, A. D. 1388. The king of Castile's tender and laudable affection for his subjects. within a very short time after his arrival he fell extremely ill; but, growing better, he set out with her again for Vitoria, where he was attacked with the same disease, in such a manner, that he was obliged to excuse himself from proceeding farther northwards; and sent his compliments, by his ambassadors, to the duke of Lancaster, with whom all things were amicably adjusted: the large sum that had been stipulated was paid, and hostages were given for the duchess's annuity. The king of Portugal having, this year, gained some advantages, the king of Castile took much pains, and sacrificed some places that were still in his hands, to get the truce renewed. He appears to have been a most conscientious prince; for he grudged every thing that came out of his subjects pockets, and chose rather to suffer any disgrace, than
- d to exhaust them, in order to aggrandize his own family. He carried this so far, that, when the states had imposed an extraordinary tribute, to raise the money for the duke of Lancaster, understanding that, in some places, the people murmured at it, he sent them word, that, it was true, he could not exempt them from paying, because he was to pay it himself; but that he would allow it in the ordinary revenues of the next year^m. This had two good effects, it produced the money, and it put an end to all murmurs. Whether the expences of the war with Portugal, and the misfortunes attending it, had unavoidably exhausted his treasury, or whether there was really any fault in those who managed his affairs, so it was, that the king grew extremely melancholy at the remembrance of the flourishing state of things in the last years of his father's reign, in comparison of his own; which, at length, affected him so
- e heavily, that he called an assembly of the states, to propose resigning the crown to his son, though a minor, and putting the government into the hands of a council, who, by their wisdom and application, might bring things into a better state. But this assembly very wisely remonstrated to the king, that such a resolution might augment, but never could diminish, the mischiefs to which his subjects were exposed; that, as to the regulation of his revenue, they would take that upon themselves, and that, in a little time, under the auspices of so good a prince, they did not in the least doubt, that all things might be brought into orderⁿ.

- The king's spirits were in some measure raised, by the application of the king of Granada A. D. 1389. Sudden and unhappy death of that great and good prince by a fall from his horse. to renew the truce; who, upon that occasion, sent a magnificent embassy, and very costly presents: but what pleased him still more was, that the king of Portugal sent likewise to prolong the truce, which was a thing that the king of Castile heartily desired, but was unwilling to ask^o. In this flow of good fortune he erected a new order of knighthood, which he stiled, of the Holy Ghost; the badge of which was a collar of gold, to which was appendant the figure of a dove, surrounded with a glory^p. At the time the Moorish ambassadors were at his court, he understood that there were many Christians of distinction, who, from time to time, had retired out of Spain, either through discontent or fear, and were settled in the city of Morocco, notwithstanding which they were exceedingly desirous of returning home; but appre-

 The king of Castile, sincerely touched with the misfortunes of these people, whom the Spanish writers stile (Y) Farfanese, applied himself with such earnestness to the king of Morocco, that he gave them leave to depart. Some of the first of them arrived a little before winter, and desired to have the honour of being admitted to the king's presence, that they might return him their thanks. Don Juan, who had heard that they were wonderfully expert in horsemanship, desired they would meet him at Alcala, on his road to Andalusia. Arriving in this city, and understanding that they were at hand, he mounted on horseback, on Sunday, October the 9th, attended by the archbishop of Toledo, and some other persons of the first distinction, with whom he proceeded thro' the gate leading to Burgos; met these new comers, and was infinitely delighted with their exercise: but spurring an high-mettled Barbary horse he rode, the ^b beast suddenly plunged, threw him over his head, and, falling upon him, crushed him to death upon the spot (Z). The archbishop of Toledo caused a tent to be pitched near the place, carried the king thither, and gave out that he was not dead, in order to gain the more time for the peaceable accession of his son; which being accomplished, his body was transported to Toledo, and buried there according to his own desire^c; and afterwards with still greater solemnity, by command of the king his son.

Don Henry, the third of that name, king of Castile, was but five days more than ten years old at the demise of his father, and succeeded him without any hesitation or disturbance; tho' this, like all calms at court, more especially in minorities, was of very short duration'. The late king had a numerous family of women to maintain, and this charge descended upon his son. ^c These were Donna Leonora, the queen-dowager of Portugal; her daughter Donna Beatrix, queen-dowager of Castile; another Donna Leonora, queen of Navarre, the late king's sister, who, with her two daughters, had retired into Castile, under pretence that the air of Navarre would not agree with them, and would not return, though strongly solicited by the king her husband; and the queen consort, tho' as yet the marriage was not complete: to which we may add Donna Constantia, duchess of Lancaster, who had likewise a large annuity, tho' it was but indifferently paid'. In order to keep things quiet, it was found necessary to call the princes of the blood to court, and to gratify them with great places and pensions. These were Don Frederic, duke of Benavente, the natural son of king Henry the second, and uncle to the late king; Don Pedro, count of Traстамара, who was the son of the Infant Don Frederic, grand ^d master of the order of St. James, who had been barbarously murdered by the king Don Pedro; Don Alonso de Arragon, marquis de Villena, and Don Alonso count of Gijon, the king's uncle, then a prisoner, soon after released: to say nothing of the children of the king Don Pedro, or of the Infant Don Juan of Portugal, who were likewise prisoners, and maintained at the expence of the state'. The duke de Benavente was no sooner at court than he meditated a marriage which alarmed the young king and his ministers very much. The lady upon whom he fixed his eyes was also a princess of the blood, Donna Leonora, daughter of the Infant Don Sancho, and, by far, the richest heiress in Castile. The only method that could be thought

(Y) The word Farfan signifies a Christian soldier, or rather a Christian cavalier in the pay of the Moors. There were many circumstances that concurred to furnish the Moorish monarchs in Spain and in Africa with these soldiers. Sometimes it was the pure effects of the spirit of rambling, and that spirit of chivalry which was then so much in fashion; sometimes it was owing to private disasters or disappointments, which rendered their own country disagreeable to them; but the chief cause was being some way or other obnoxious to justice for acts of private resentment, or of public discontent; but resting ever upon this foundation, that a gentleman's sword ought to carve him out a subsistence, and that it was beneath him to exert any other talent for his advancement than his courage. At this juncture, it seems, the Moors were more peaceably disposed than usual; for otherwise they would not have parted with these mercenaries, for whom they had a great esteem. It is also not at all improbable, that the king Don Juan had political reasons for recalling them, which might have appeared in time, if providence had granted him a longer life: at all events, it was an act of generous charity, that could not fail of raising his reputation.

(Z) This melancholy accident, which cost the king Don Juan his life, happened chiefly by his seeing this exercise performed on ploughed lands; so that, upon spurring his horse, his fore feet fell into a deep furrow, by which means the king was thrown over his head. Surgeons were sent for, and processions ordered, that the people might have opportunities of praying for the king's recovery. But this was the effects of the archbishop of Toledo's prudence, for the king gave not the least sign of life after his fall. The reason why this prelate thought these precautions necessary, was the uneasiness expressed by all ranks of people on the apprehensions of losing a prince in the prime of his years, for the king was but three and thirty, and the government's falling into the hands of a child, and he too of so weak a constitution, that they had already bestowed on him the surname of the Sickly. In the midst of these disasters the case of the queen was most to be deplored, for, in losing the king her husband, she lost all: she was already, in a manner, cut off from her own country, deprived of the crown to which she was intitled by her birth, and left amongst strangers, without children, and without any means, except those flowing from the prudence of her own conduct, to support the precarious title of a queen, in a country where the seeds of faction were continually shooting up upon the smallest relaxation in government, and more especially in minorities.

- a of to prevent this was to contract the countess, with her own consent, to the king's brother, the Infant Don Ferdinand; with a proviso that, if the king should die before he was of age to consummate his own marriage, the contract should be void, and the Infant at liberty to espouse the queen^a. Some disputes there were about settling a regency: it was surmised that the king had left a will, and, at length, that will was found: but the contents of it being disapproved, it was ordered to be burnt, which was prevented by the archbishop of Toledo, on account of some legacies that were given to his church. At length a council of regency was formed by common consent, consisting of the duke de Benavente, the count de Trastamara, the marquis de Villena, the archbishops of Toledo and Compostella, the grand masters of St. James and Calatrava, and sixteen deputies from the principal towns: though this regency
- b was approved and established by authority of the states, yet, before the end of the year, the archbishop of Toledo withdrew from court, declared against them, and drew the duke de Benavente into his measures^w. So soon are factions formed!

THE regents laboured all they could to bring this prelate into their measures, but in vain; The duke de upon which they removed the court to Segovia, and gave the title of constable to Don Pedro Benavente's count of Trastamara^x. At length, through the mediation of the queen of Navarre, things intrigues perplex the queen and the re- were brought to an accommodation; and the states were assembled at Burgos, where the principles of the late king's will were adopted, a new regency framed, and a great deal of public gency. money very prudently bestowed in pensions to preserve the public peace. Though the duke A. D. 1391. de Benavente had all the reason in the world to be satisfied, and a variety of alterations had been

- c made for that reason solely, yet he still persisted in his intrigues; in consequence of which he formed a project of marrying a natural daughter of the king of Portugal, with whom he was to have a large sum in ready money, and the protection of the king besides^y. To balance this the council of regency offered him the like sum of money to decline that marriage, and upon A. D. 1392. this the duke was brought to suspend it.

- THIS disjointed state of affairs in Castile gave its neighbours many opportunities of behaving Wearied with otherwise than they were wont. The Moors of Granada made a sudden irruption, in breach perpetual contrivances to of the truce which Joseph the son and successor of Mohammed had made with the young king, disturb the and carried away a great booty; but the Castilians attacked them in their retreat so judiciously, regency, the and with so much vigour, that they recovered all they had taken, and cured them of the king assumes desire of making such incursions for the future: this, together with some quick measures taken the administration. against the duke de Benavente, induced the king of Portugal to let fall some very haughty and unreasonable articles, upon which he had insisted in respect to a truce, but which he at length thought proper to conclude for fifteen years, upon condition that some of the principal lords would sign it within a limited time; and of these the duke de Benavente, the count of Trastamara, and the count of Gijon refused^z. The regency, suspecting the archbishop of Toledo of a design to excite fresh troubles, caused him to be arrested: but, upon his giving them proper assurances, he was quickly released. Charles the sixth of France sent, about this time, ambassadors to compliment the young king upon his accession, and to let him know that he heard that some of his nobility were inclined to create disturbances, which, if true, he would give
- e him what aid he desired; or, if it was requisite, march in person, with the whole force of his dominions; the king thanked him, in the warmest terms, for this noble instance of his friendship, but did not demand his assistance^a. As he was now within two months of thirteen complete, and of a capacity far beyond his age, Don Henry assumed the government, held an assembly of the states at Madrid, and, having confirmed the privileges of Biscay, and done other necessary and popular acts, he set out for Toledo, where he caused the obsequies of his father to be performed in his presence with great solemnity^b. He next celebrated his marriage with the princess Catherine of Lancaster, and his brother Don Ferdinand at the same time espoused the countess of Albuquerque. These salutary steps taken, he curtailed those exorbitant pensions which the regency had been obliged to give to the princes and princesses of the royal
- f family; for he was thoroughly tinctured with his father's maxim, that kings were to be the fathers of their people, and were not to impoverish a nation to enrich their families^c. A. D. 1393.

BUT the princes and princesses of the blood were very unwilling to learn this lesson, which All the princes and princesses of the blood concur in opposing the king's measures. they understood to be a most crying act of injustice with respect to them, retired to their respective estates, and began to cabal as usual. The king, finding the archbishop of Toledo a very sensible man, and ready to give him good advice, when his own interests were well secured, gratified him in that particular, and took him into his confidence^d. He then sent the marshal of Castile to the queen of Navarre, the duke of Benavente, and the rest of the malecontents, to let them know that what he had done was by the advice of his states; and that, when the times were better, they might expect better provisions. This had no great effect, for as yet they did not know the king, whom a strange affair had drawn, in the midst of these disputes, from Castile to the city of Toledo (A). By the midst of summer he was on his return, and the marquis de Villena met him at Illescas with a hundred lances. The king received him kindly, but insisted upon his subscribing the truce with Portugal, to which he assented*. The king proceeded to Valladolid with an army about him; and understanding that the malecontents had entered into a league, and were all armed, he proceeded with caution.

He persists in his own resolution, and triumphs gloriously over them all.

It is very remarkable that this young king, foreseeing that whatever he did would be ascribed to the archbishop of Toledo, if he was with him, left him behind, and this measure was of the utmost consequence. The archbishop of Compostella, hearing that his competitor was absent, came readily to the king, and was reconciled. The king then granted a safe-conduct to the duke de Benavente, who came, made a long defence, and submitted to the terms that the king prescribed; but he would not suffer him to subscribe them there, requiring him to return to his own fortress, and consider them for a week, that he might not pretend to be forced†. The king then reviewed his forces, and dismissed the greatest part of them; the duke did the like. The count de Trastamara followed the duke's example, first demanded a safe conduct, and then made his terms with the king. He insisted upon the restitution of a place that had been taken from him by the count de Gijon, and the king promised him justice. The name of this place was Parades de Nava, to which the king went, and sequestered it, allowing sixty days to the count de Gijon to make out his title. While the king was thus employed, the count de Trastamara went to visit the queen of Navarre, at her request, and by the advice of the duke of Benavente, that they might take their measures together. The king being informed of this, after his arrival at Burgos, caused the duke to be arrested, and seized all his places. After this, he reduced Roa, where the queen of Navarre had taken shelter, and made her a prisoner likewise. He marched next in person into the Asturias; and understanding that the count of Gijon had taken possession of Oviedo, with a body of troops,

(A) The occasion of the king's journey to Toledo would have been too great a digression, if we had given it a place in the text; and yet it seems a point of too great importance to be totally neglected, for which reason we have placed it here. Amongst the lords of Portugal, who followed the party of the king of Castile, was Don Martin Yanez de la Barbuda, who was treasurer of the military order of Avis in that kingdom, a person of great courage, and esteemed one of the ablest officers of his time. The king, in reward of his fidelity, procured his election to the office of grand master of Alcantara, which gave him at once title, rank, and a large revenue. There dwelt not far from Alcantara, in a desert part of the country, an hermit, whose name was Juan Sago, who had acquired a reputation of sanctity; this man addressed himself to the grand master, affirming, he had a revelation, that if he would attack the Moors, merely as enemies to the Gospel, and without any secular views, he should drive them out of Spain, and this without the loss of a man. The grand master was weak enough to credit this, and sent two of his esquires to challenge the king of Granada, offering to fight him alone, or with any number of troops he would appoint, allowing him two to one, in defence of the Gospel against the Koran. The king of Granada rejected this proposition, and put the persons who brought it into prison. The king, Don Henry, hearing that he was raising forces, sent for the grand master, to put him in mind of his duty, and of the truce that subsisted between the two crowns. This had no effect, his hermit persuaded him to assemble an army; and, upon a promise of their being invulnerable, this was easily done; so that in a short time he had a body of three thousand, some writers say, five thousand foot, and about three hundred lances, all men of family, and tried courage. Upon his arrival with these forces at Cardova, the inhabitants were inclined to have disputed the passage of their bridge, which at length, however, they declined. On his arrival at Alcala, Don Alonso Fernandez de Cordova, lord of Aguilar, with his brother Don Diego, met him, and used all possible arguments to dissuade him from this rash enterprize, but to no purpose. When he entered the territory of Granada he attacked a small fort, where he lost three men, and was himself wounded in the hand; upon this he reproached the hermit, who retorted his reproaches, by telling him, that the promise he made him did not regard pillaging small places, but rendering the truth of religion visible by the defeat of the Infidels in a decisive battle. These altercations were hardly over, when the king of Granada appeared at the head of five thousand horse, and one hundred and twenty thousand foot. The Christians were presently surrounded, and the fight, or rather the slaughter, began. Some say that the infantry were intimidated, and endeavoured to make their escape; others, that they behaved bravely. About fifteen hundred returned, twelve hundred were made prisoners, and the rest killed. As for the three hundred lances, they had no thoughts of retreating, the grand master disposed them in the best order imaginable; gave the highest proofs of his skill and experience in the art of war; but, in the end, after wonderful instances of valour, he fell, covered with wounds, and with him all that glorious body of cavalry, who were thus offered as victims to his credulity and their own. At the request of the Christians, the Moors permitted them to search for and carry away his body, which was buried in the church of our lady, at Alcantara, under a tomb, with this inscription, by his own order: Hic situs est Martinus Yanez, in omni periculo experti timoris animo. "Here lies Martin Yanez, on whose mind the sight of the greatest danger could never impress a sense of fear." When this history was told the emperor Charles the fifth, he answered, smiling, and yet I dare say this grand master would not have snuffed out a lighted flambeaux with his fingers. It was this unfortunate affair that brought the king of Castile to Toledo, where he began to assemble his troops, from an apprehension that the Moors would attack his dominions; but upon his acquainting the king of Granada that it was an act of temerity in a single man, which he could not either foresee or prevent, and ought not to be considered as a breach of the truce, that monarch answered, that he was of the same sentiment; and so this affair was blown over.

a he attacked and put the best part of them to the sword. He then invested Gijon, which the count had fortified with great industry, and in which he had a numerous garrison. While he remained there, he summoned the count de Trastamara to join him with his forces, who, though he was not without apprehensions, obeyed. The king received him kindly, pardoned all that was past, and gave him part of the lands of the duke of Benavente. The winter drawing on, the count de Gijon offered to submit his dispute with king Henry to the king of France, which was accepted; but care was taken that no supplies should be put into the place^s. A. D. 1394.

THE king carried his aunt, the queen of Navarre, with the two princesses her daughters, to the frontiers of that kingdom; and, having taken her husband's oath that he should live kindly with her, sent her home^h. The marriage was now celebrated between the Infant Don Ferdinand, and Leonora, countess of *Albuquerque*ⁱ. The French monarch having decided that Alonso, count of Gijon, had forfeited all his lands for rebellion, the king returned to the siege of the castle, which was defended by the countess, who offered to surrender, if the king would restore her son who was in his hands as an hostage. The king consented to this, and as soon as the castle was in his hands, demolished it^k. He returned through Castile, to pass the winter at Seville, where he renewed the truce with the king of Granada, and suppressed the factions that disturbed the peace of the city and kingdom of Murcia; the Portuguese, having corrupted an officer intrusted with the care of one of the gates of Badajoz, surprized that place, and attempted Albuquerque, in which they failed. The king, Don Henry, resolved to revenge this affront, and made great preparations for that purpose by land and sea. The king of Portugal sent ambassadors to pacify him, but he ordered them to depart his dominions, and prosecuted his resentment with great violence, which gave some of the Portuguese nobility, who were much disgusted with their king, an opportunity of retiring into Castile^l. Joseph, king of Granada, dying, Mohammed, his son and successor, went, as some writers say, in person, to the court of the king of Castile, and renewed the truce; the Portuguese having recovered from their consternation, made an irruption into Castile, with some effect; and, on the other hand, the Castilians beat the Portuguese at sea^m. 1395.

The king, Don Henry, being desirous of determining this dispute, levied a tax throughout his whole dominions, and began to make vast military preparationsⁿ. Being desirous of putting an end to the schism which still continued, he resolved to withdraw his obedience from Benedict the thirteenth, who resided at Avignon; but before pope Boniface, who governed at Rome, could be informed of this, he endeavoured to take advantage of the war with Portugal, pronounced the king a schismatic, fallen from his crown and dignity, and incapable of governing, and sent a bull to this purpose to the archbishop of Braga^o. The next year a negotiation was set on foot between the kings of Castile and Portugal, which ended in a truce of ten years; soon after died Don Pedro Tenorio, archbishop of Toledo, at the age of seventy-five, to whom the king was much indebted for his advice^p. The corsairs of Barbary being extremely troublesome, the king ordered the fleet that had been prepared against Portugal to clear the seas of those robbers, which they did; and taking it to be a proper appendix to their commission, undertook to clear the land a little also; with this view they landed their forces, and attacked Tetuan, of which they quickly became masters, pillaged it, carried away all the inhabitants, and then burnt it to the ground^q. There was this year a most violent and destructive plague in Spain, but more especially in Andalusia, insomuch that the king was constrained to suspend the law, which restrained widows from marrying within a year after the death of their husbands. On the sixth of July, this year, the first clock that was ever seen in Spain was erected at Seville^r. 1396. 1397. 1398. 1399. 1400.

THE king having called an assembly of the states of Tordesillas, made several laws there for the benefit of his subjects. As the great point he had in view, in withdrawing his obedience from pope Benedict the thirteenth, was to put an end to a schism, which, in the present situation of things, proved very detrimental to Christendom in general, and to his own dominions in particular, and perceiving that this step increased the latter, without diminishing the former inconveniency, he acknowledged the same pope again, who thereupon took the advantage of naming his nephew, Don Pedro de Luna, to the archbishoprick of Toledo, upon the lapse of the dean and chapter^s. The same year the king having heard of the great reputation of 1401.

Timur Bet, whom the Spanish writers of those times call Tamerlan, he sent two ambassadors ^a to compliment him, and to make him an offer of his friendship ¹. As under the reigns of the three last princes the people in general had been treated with great lenity and kindness, their circumstances were much altered, more especially in the great cities; and this proved the source of factions, that were very detrimental to the public peace. In Seville and Cordova especially they were risen to such a height, that the king was forced to interpose, but he did it with such a spirit of equity, as left no room for complaints, and with an air of dignity, which shewed he was not to be moved by clamour ². The ambassadors of Castile saluted the illustrious emperor of the Tartars, immediately after he had vanquished the whole power of the Ottomans, and taken Bajazet prisoner. He received them very kindly, expressed a proper sense of the compliment paid him, and sent an officer of his household, with rich presents into ^b Spain, to return it. The name of this ambassador was Mohammed Acagi, and he brought with him two young ladies, the daughters of an Hungarian count, who had been taken by Bajazet, at the fatal battle of Nicapolis, and were found amongst the spoils upon his defeat. These young ladies, who were exquisitely handhome, and whose names were Donna Maria and Donna Angelina, being thus set at liberty, were extremely acceptable to the king and queen, and were very soon happily married in Spain ³. On the 14th of November, the queen was delivered of a daughter, named Donna Maria, to the great joy of the king, and of his subjects; and, in the beginning of the next year, the states at Toledo acknowledged and swore to maintain her title, in case the king left no heir male ⁴. The king sent a second embassy ^c to Tamerlan, with letters of thanks, and presents of very considerable value. The Infant Don Ferdinand, out of reverence to the blessed virgin, instituted a new order of knighthood, which he called de la Jarra, that is, of the Jar or Vase, because the device was a flower pot filled with white lilies ⁵.

^a The king's great frugality founded on the most generous motives. As the kingdom enjoyed a profound peace, the monarch of Castile thought it a proper time to put his plan in execution. He saw, with regret, the finest country in Spain in the hands of the Moors; and they growing infinitely more strong and powerful every day, by that spirit of industry and frugality that reigned amongst them, he saw that a very long and expensive war would be necessary to reduce them. He knew, that how chearfully soever his people might begin such a war, they would very soon grow weary of the taxes that were necessary to support it; he determined therefore to reduce the expences of his government as much as ^d possible, and, out of his own saving, to heap up a treasure sufficient for this purpose. The king of Granada, afraid of his great power, and perhaps not altogether ignorant of his scheme, sent two of the principal persons about his court to testify his respect for him, with very rich presents, and, which he esteemed the highest mark of reverence and regard, one of the finest women in his seraglio; the king of Castile received this compliment and his presents very politely, and made him a proper return; but there afterwards grew a suspicion, that the principal end of this embassy was of a very dark nature, as hereafter will appear ².

^b After a very long and tedious illness, dies at length of a slow poison. The king being at Toro in the spring, the queen was there delivered on the sixth of March, of the Infant Don Juan ³. He held, soon after, an assembly of the states at Madrid, where some laws were made to moderate the exorbitant usury taken by the Jews, and to oblige them ^e to wear a mark of distinction upon their garments, and at the same time the concubines of priests were forbid to appear in publick, without a piece of scarlet cloth or ribbon, tacked to their head dress ⁴. The queen taking advantage of the extreme good humour the king was in, upon the birth of his son, prevailed upon him to set at liberty Don Pedro and Donna Constantia, the children of her uncle Don Juan, who died a little before, in the castle of Soria, upon a promise that Don Pedro should enter into holy orders ⁵. This year the king built the royal palace of Madrid, which was burnt some time after. He likewise built the alcazal of Murcia, and was the founder of the pleasant country villa, called Pardo; for he was naturally very magnificent, and frugal only from a principle of publick spirit ⁶. His ambassadors returned the next spring from the court of Tamerlan, and the king was extremely well ^f pleased with the account they gave him of the reception they had met with. On the complaints of the common people, that provisions were grown scarce and dear, the king found it necessary to settle the prices of grain of all sorts, to prevent extortion ⁷. The state of the king's health being better known at Granada than in Castile, the Moors began to break that truce which they had begged with so much seeming humility; Don Henry complained, by his ambassadors, without obtaining redress, and then threatened to seek it by force of arms; by

- a way of reply to which the king of Granada marched into the realm of Jaen, and on the fourth of October invested Guezada, with an army of four thousand horse, and twenty-five thousand foot: he was not, however, able to take the place; and in two actions that happened this year the Christians had the better^f. The king, Don Henry, hoped the time was come to which Providence had fixed the subversion of the Moorish kingdom; and therefore he directed an assembly of the states to be held at Toledo, with a view to concert measures with them for pouring the whole force of Spain upon the kingdom of Granada; but when the states were assembled, he was too weak to assist there in person, and therefore sent his brother, the Infant Don Ferdinand, who opened to them at large the king's scheme. While the substance of it was under deliberation, Don Henry breathed his last, about nine in the morning, on Christmas-day, after a lingering tedious illness, which was discovered to be the effects of a slow poison, given him by a Jew physician. His obsequies were performed with all due solemnity, and his subjects in general, but more especially the common people, who rather loved and obeyed him as a parent than a prince, deplored him with tears^g (B).

- His son, Don Juan, who was but fourteen months old, was recommended particularly to the care of his uncle, Don Ferdinand, who, as soon as the royal funeral was over, went into the assembly of the states, and, in a short speech, desired them to take proper measures for proclaiming their king: many of the prelates, and some of the nobility, fearing a long minority, and knowing the great abilities of Don Ferdinand, put one of their number upon asking him what king he would have them proclaim? The royal Infant was thunder-struck at the insinuation; but quickly recollecting himself, he turned to the marshal, and said, It is impossible that my nephew should have any competitor: display the standard of the crown immediately for Don Juan the second, the only lawful king of Castile and Leon^h. He afterwards caused the late king's will to be read, and then sent it to Segovia, to the queen. By this will the king nominated two gentlemen to have the care of his son's person and education; but the queen being determined not to part with him, caused the gates of Segovia to be shut against the Infant Don Ferdinand, from an apprehension that he was come to take away her son. But, upon his prevailing on those two persons to accept of a sum of money, and to make over their claim to the queen, she altered her sentiments, and consented that the young king should be publicly inauguratedⁱ. The states declared the queen and the royal Infant regents; and, to prevent all disputes, the dominions of Castile were divided between them^k. Don Ferdinand carried on the war against the Moors with vigour, and in some great actions with success; though the king of Granada, which is almost incredible, brought, more than once, armies of fourscore thousand, and once an hundred thousand, foot, into the field; the fleet of Castile likewise defeated the combined squadrons of Tunis and Tremecen, and prevented their landing any succours to the Moors in Spain; so that the campaign concluded both happily and honourably for the Christians^l. The states granted very considerable supplies for the support of the war; but the king of Granada was early in the field, and under took the siege of Alcaudeta with a very numerous army; but the garrison made so obstinate a defence, and the Moors were so much harrassed, that they were at length constrained to raise the siege with discredit; notwithstanding which, the states of Castile resolved, merely to save expence, to act only upon the defensive; and upon the king of Granada's demanding a suspension of arms for eight months, the proposition was accepted. He did not survive long; and his brother Joseph, whom he had kept in prison during his whole reign, succeeded him^m. Some of the queen's favourites, notwithstanding all he had done for her service, created a misunderstanding between

(B) This monarch was highly commended for the sweetness of his temper, and for his great affability to all ranks of people, in which, however, he lost nothing of his dignity, because it did not arise from any feebleness of mind, much less from timidity. There never was a king of Castile, of whom the nobility stood more in awe than this: because he was entirely beloved by the populace. On the other hand, this affection was not the fruit barely of his indulgence, but arose also from their respect and esteem, founded, in part, upon his strict justice, of which he gave a strong instance in the severity with which he punished the repeated disturbances occasioned by the two factions in the city of Seville; on account of which seditions, there were no less than a thousand persons put to death. Yet he was never suspected of cruelty; and though he amassed a much greater treasure than any of his predecessors, it was without any imputation of covetousness. His common saying was, that he did not fear the hatred or the arms of his enemies, but the disaffection and curses of his subjects. The Spaniards, who often fancy their kings are poisoned upon very slight, and sometimes without any grounds at all, had no apprehension that this was the cause of Don Henry's death, because he had been infirm for many years; but some time after, certain Jews, who were executed at Segovia, for insults offered to the Christian religion, confessed, that long before he had received a slow poison from a physician of their religion, by which he gradually wasted to the time of his decease.

THE grand master of Alcantara dying, the Infant Don Ferdinand procured that important office for his son, the Infant Don Sancho, at whose installation the queen and the whole court assisted ^o. The duke of Austria made a proposal of marriage to the queen-dowager Donna Beatrix, widow of the late king Don Juan, but she modestly declined it, by saying, that women of her rank married but once ^p. The Moors, after having committed hostilities more than once, desired, and were permitted, to renew the truce ^q. The queen, plainly perceiving that her confidence had been abused in respect to the umbrage she had taken against the Infant Don Ferdinand, very wisely resolved to connect their families more closely, and with this view contracted her daughter Donna Maria to his son Alonso ^r. The grand master of the order of St. James dying, that office, though with some difficulty, was procured for the Infant Don Henry, another son of the Infant Don Ferdinand, though he was then very young ^s. The war with the Moors broke out again, and great preparations were made for carrying it on, on both sides. The Infant Don Ferdinand prevailed upon the states to change their sentiments in regard to a defensive war, and to furnish the supplies early, so that he took the field with a numerous army, and invested Antequera, a large and well-built town, within twelve leagues of Granada, defended by a strong citadel, and, from its situation, of very great importance. The king of Granada practised every method in his power for its relief, but without effect. He at last attempted a negotiation, with a view of corrupting some of the Moorish slaves in the Christian camp, to assist in a perfidious contrivance for the destruction of their masters; but a converted Moor discovering the plot in time, the conspirators were very severely punished, and not long after the place was taken by assault, and the city by capitulation ^t. This so humbled the Moors, that they demanded a truce of seventeen months. The Infant Don Ferdinand put in his claim to the kingdom of Arragon; and, upon the demise of the king Don Martin, pushed his pretensions warmly by his ambassadors, the queen giving him all the assistance in her power; notwithstanding which, the troubles in that country lasted a long time ^u.

AN assembly of the states was held at Valladolid, during which the Infant Don Ferdinand fell dangerously ill. Don Frederick, duke de Benavente, who had been many years prisoner in the castle of Montreal, murdered the governor of that place, and made his escape into Navarre, where, at the instance of the court of Castile, he was secured, though he was the queen of Navarre's brother ^w. The states granted forty-eight millions of marvadies, to be employed in the war against Granada, at the expiration of the truce. In compliance with the desires of the subjects of both nations, a peace was concluded between the crowns of Castile and Portugal. The Infant still continued to solicit his claim to the crown of Arragon, which, as Ferreras rightly observes, must have proceeded upon this foundation, that the junction of the two crowns was not to be admitted; for otherwise his nephew, the king of Castile, had a prior right; but it is plain, that this was never insisted upon, and that the queen continued to do every thing that he could ask or desire ^x. The king of Granada, in the beginning of the ensuing year, desired to renew the truce, to which the queen consented. Don Ferdinand, finding that money was a very useful thing to a man in his situation, earnestly desired to have the money that had been laid by for the war: the council were divided upon this; some were for giving it to him, but others observed, that the queen and the Infant had sworn not to employ that money but in war; but this objection was easily removed; pope Benedict the thirteenth absolved them from their oaths, the Infant had the money, and by the help of it carried his point ^y. Donna Leonora Lopez de Cordova, who had been the queen's favourite, and disgraced, applied herself to the Infant Don Ferdinand, to make her peace; but the queen wrote to him to banish her into Andalusia, and immediately disgraced her brother, and all her relations. Towards the close of the year, the nine judges chosen by the states of Arragon, after long and mature deliberations, declared the Infant Don Ferdinand king, who immediately repaired to Saragossa, where he was proclaimed and crowned; notwithstanding which, he found himself engaged in a civil war, raised by the count de Urgel, who was in possession of many strong places, and had a numerous party at his devotion ^z.

- a make trial of the affection of the nobles of Castile; and, upon his signifying his request by letters, they drew together so great a force, and made so expeditious a march to his relief, as not only astonished his new subjects, but placed him in the quiet possession of his dominions, after a short and sharp dispute, which ended in his competitor's surrendering himself at discretion; and the king, to shew how much he relied upon his friends, sent him prisoner into Spain^a. By his interposition, the king of Navarre was prevailed upon to deliver up the duke of Benavente, who was carried back into Castile, and continued there a prisoner to his death^b. In order to fix himself more effectually in his new dominions, and to strengthen that union which already reigned between the two crowns, the king pressed the marriage of his eldest son Don Alonso, with the Infanta Donna Maria, to which the queen-dowager of Castile very readily consented, and the ceremony was soon after performed with great solemnity^c. This great point thus settled, the king was inclined to make a short tour to visit his sister; but a distemper, from which he had but lately recovered, surprized him again upon the road; and, after a short illness, carried him to the grave, on the second of April^d. He left behind him Don Alonso, who succeeded him to the throne of Arragon, the Infant Don Juan, the Infant Don Henry, grand master of the order of St. James, and the Infant Don Pedro; as for Don Sancho, grand master of the order of Alcantara, he died a month before his father. By the demise of this brave and prudent prince, the regency of Castile devolved solely upon the queen, who, with the advice of the nobility, made choice of a council to assist her. The first act which distinguished their administration, was representing to the queen, that Agnes de Torres, one of the ladies of her court, was a busy intriguing woman, and ought therefore to be forbid the court, together with Don Juan Alvarez Ossorio, who had great connections with her; to which the queen consented^e. The king of Granada being desirous of renewing the truce, the queen regent consented to it, upon condition that he released one hundred Christian slaves: in this year also some historians place the expedition of Jean de Bethencourt, for the reduction of the Canaries^f. In the council of Constance, which was held to put an end to the schism that had so long subsisted, the ambassadors of the crown of Arragon disputed precedency with those of Castile, but without effect, the point being clearly decided in favour of the latter^g. On the first of June, the queen regent was found dead in her bed^h. The Spanish writers allow her to have been a modest, charitable, and religious princess; but they likewise say, that she listened too much to the women that were about her, and that she was addicted to wine, which they insinuate to have been the cause of her deathⁱ. The archbishop of Toledo, whose name was Don Sancho de Rojas, Don Henry, Infant of Arragon, the amirante, the constable, Juan de Velasco, Pedro Manrique, and other great lords, thought it best to proclaim the king of full age, though he was scarce thirteen, which they did; and on the 20th of October, that young prince, in the presence of Donna Leonora, queen-dowager of Arragon, and the three Infants her sons, espoused Donna Maria their sister^k.
- A GENERAL assembly of the states being held at Madrid on the seventh of March, the king declared to them, that he had assumed the government, and was complimented thereupon^l. He renewed the truce with Granada, and received into his favour Don Alvaro de Luna, of whom we shall have occasion to speak more at large^m. The two Infants of Arragon, Don Juan and Don Henry, who were men of abilities, but not of the same rectitude of intention with their father, had each of them a great desire to engross the person and favour of the young king of Castile, and to govern his dominions in his name. Don Juan having negotiated a marriage with Donna Blanca, daughter to the king of Navarre, and presumptive heiress of that kingdom, went thither to conclude it, which gave his brother an opportunity he did not slip, of seizing the king's person, which he did at Tordesillas, being supported in that insolent action by the constable, the bishop of Segovia, and some other personsⁿ. On the fourth of August, the king, being in his hands, married his sister; and, in the assembly of the states of Avila, the king justified and approved all that Don Henry had done, as being in his power; and disavowed the endeavours of the Infant Don Juan to raise forces for his deliverance. The Infant Don Henry, to maintain his power, was very desirous of espousing the princess Catherine, the king's sister, who declared her dislike, and, when he surprized the king, had fled to a cloister, from whence she would not be drawn, till he had promised, upon oath, not to force her inclinations; and yet, on the eighth of November, she married him^o. This gave the king an opportunity of making his escape, trusting the secret entirely to Don Alvaro de Luna, who made use of Frederick, count of Trastamara, and Don Rodrigo Pimentel, count of Benavente, to assist him therein. It was accomplished, but not without difficulty and hazard; so that, after crossing the river Tagus in an open boat, the king got to the castle of Montalban, in which he was besieged by the constable, and afterwards by the Infant Don Henry; but, the Infant Don Juan assembling great forces, they thought fit to retire, and leave the king at full liberty to go where he pleased^p.

THE king, who was alike unwilling to put himself into the power of the Infant Don Juan, treated him with great civility, when he admitted him to his presence, but did not suffer him to remain long at court; and at length sent him a positive order to disband his troops, as his brother had done. It was not long, however, before the Infant Don Henry created new disturbances; for the king, while he was under constraint, having bestowed upon him, by way of portion with his sister, the country of Villena, with the title of a duchy, he thought this warrant sufficient to take possession of it, and began to do it without waiting any forms. The king, Don Juan, was not only displeased, but thought himself at liberty to retract that grant, and therefore forbid such as held lands in or of that duchy, to acknowledge the Infant for their lord^q. Don Henry persisted in his first scheme; but the king persisted likewise: they would both be obeyed; and, as that was impossible, the greater part of the people chose the greater lord, and adhered to the king. In the mean time, the consort of the Infant Don Juan was brought to bed of a prince, who was named Don Carlos, whom his grandfather presently declared his successor^r. The truce with the Moors was renewed; and though he struggled hard, and gave the king a great deal of disturbance, yet, in the end, the Infant Don Henry was obliged to disband his troops, and to wear, at least, the appearance of submission, notwithstanding the king, Don Juan, refused to admit him to his presence.

THE troubles of Castile were but begun. The Infant Don Henry having parted with his troops, received the king's orders to come to court, which he was very unwilling to obey, insisting upon promises, and even upon hostages, for his safety; the king would have given him some moderate satisfaction, but that would not content him. At length, suspecting the use his enemies might make of his contempt, he took a sudden resolution of going to Madrid; but Don Ruez Lopez de Avalos, the constable, and Pedro Manrique, refused to accompany him, which, however, could not determine Garcia Manrique, who followed him out of personal affection. The Infant came to Madrid on the 13th of June, kissed the king's hand, and would have spoke to him that day, but the king advised him to go home and take his repose, and promised to send for him the next day. He did so, and the Infant found himself in the midst of the king's council, where he was charged with being privy to some letters written by the chancellor to the king of Granada, exciting him to make war, that the presence and assistance of the Infant Don Henry might be more necessary to the king: the Infant denied the fact, tho' the letters were shewn and read to him; and Garcia Manrique, who was a warm man, said, that he was ready to prove with his sword that they were forgeries, as indeed they were, which, however, did not hinder their being both imprisoned: the Infanta, though she had married Don Henry unwillingly, would not desert his interests in his distress, but, putting herself under the care of the constable, retired to the kingdom of Valentia^s. The queen was this year delivered of the Infanta Catalina; and the archbishop of Toledo, who was an active and ambitious prelate, departed this life^t. The truce between the crowns of Castile and Portugal was renewed for nineteen years, the circumstances of both nations making it equally acceptable to their ministers^u. The king of Castile deprived the constable of his dignity, which he gave to the count Don Alvaro de Luna; and distributed his estates, which were very considerable, amongst the lords who were most in his favour^v. In the month of September the queen was delivered of another daughter, named Donna Eleonora^x.

ALL the time the disturbances subsisted in Castile, Don Alonso of Arragon was in Italy, endeavouring to procure the kingdom of Naples; but, being obstructed in that design, he this year returned home, upon which the king of Castile sent ambassadors to prevail upon him to deliver up the Castilian lords, and the princess his sister, who had taken shelter in his dominions. The king of Arragon insisted that his were a free people; and that, as they had obtained the protection of certain towns, it was not in his power to give them up. On the other hand, he solicited the king of Castile to set his brother, Don Henry, at liberty, which was refused; and the misunderstanding between the two crowns rose so high, that military a preparations were made on both sides^y. The Infanta Donna Catalina of Castile dying, to whom the states had sworn as the presumptive heir of the crown, the king, Don Juan, thought it necessary to take the same precaution, with regard to her surviving sister, Donna Leonora^z. A.D. 1424.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, this measure, which had been thought so necessary for the security of the royal family, and the welfare of the nation, was set aside by the queen's being delivered of a son, on the sixth of January, who was named Don Henry, after his grandfather, who, within a week after, was acknowledged for the heir apparent of the dominions of Castile^a. The disputes with the crown of Arragon continued in the same situation, or rather rose higher, as Don Alonso declared his resolution to have recourse to arms, for the deliverance of his brother Don Henry. The states of Castile, at the instance of their monarch, approved the commitment of that prince, and gave the king the supplies necessary for defending himself, in case he should be attacked; for which purpose he raised forces in all parts of his dominions. At the bottom, however, both monarchs were inclined to accomplish, if possible, their respective ends, without having recourse to arms^b; the king of Castile being well informed, that many of his nobility hated his favourite Don Alvaro, and wanted only an opportunity to shew it; and the king of Arragon having many affairs upon his hands, which rendered a war with Castile very improper at that season. To deliver himself from the perplexities he was under, and in order to be thoroughly informed of the sentiments of his antagonist, he summoned his brother Don Juan to return home, which, though a prudent step in him, perplexed that prince extremely, who was equally unwilling to differ with either of these kings. Upon his application to Don Juan of Castile, he drew him out of this difficulty, by advising him to comply with his brother's summons, and gave him full powers to treat of a peace^c. He went accordingly, and was extremely well received in the camp of Arragon, where he had scarce began to treat with his brother, before Providence put it in his power to treat with him on the level, by the death of Don Carlos the noble, king of Navarre; upon which Donna Blanca, the daughter of that monarch, and the wife of the Infant Don Juan, sent him the royal standard to the camp of Arragon^d. Soon after, he concluded a treaty with his brother Don Alonso, by which it was agreed, that the Infant Don Henry should be set at liberty, and should take a new oath of fidelity to the king of Castile, and be restored to all that he possessed; and that the king of Arragon should bear no ill-will to those who advised his cousin to imprison the Infant^e. 1425.

The calm derived from this treaty was of no long continuance: factions never want pretences; and those in Castile soon run as high as before, chiefly from the jealousy which the nobility had of the constable. The king, perhaps, by his advice, found a way to awe the king of Arragon, by ordering the count of Urgel, whom his father had sent prisoner into Castile, to be removed nearer the frontiers, and treated with great indulgence^f. But Don Alonso was not a prince to be long restrained; he sent his mother Donna Leonora, and his sister of the same name, to treat with the king of Castile; and, under the shadow of this negotiation, dispatched an officer, upon whom he could depend, to corrupt the governor of the castle, in which the count of Urgel was confined, who carried him swiftly and secretly into the dominions of the king of Arragon, who confined him for the rest of his life to the castle of Xativa^g. The king, Don Juan, of Navarre, was not so much pleased with his new title as with the power he had in Castile, where all the nobility, who hated the constable, considered him as their protector and support. Pedro Manrique, encouraged by them, charged Don Alvaro de Luna, whether true or falsely is a little uncertain, with very enormous offences. He suggested that he was enamoured of the queen; and that, by the help of Donna Maria Tellez, he proposed to remove the king, and to administer publick affairs at his pleasure, during a long minority. He charged him, on the other hand, with persuading the king, Don Juan, to part with that princess, and to espouse an Infanta of Portugal. After much confusion, the king found himself obliged to cause his favourite to retire, though he shewed his resentment strongly against such as had compelled him to that measure, and began to countenance the Infant Don Henry, who had little or no hand in it^h. 1426.

Success is often dangerous to a faction. The great lords, who had concurred in obliging the king to banish the constable, quickly fell out among themselves, and fearing no restraint, committed so many and so great excesses, as raised an universal clamour; insomuch that the far greater part, with the king of Navarre at their head, desired the king to recal him. Don Juan dissembled the pleasure he felt from this request, and, by a short delay, made the evil thence. 1427.

more conspicuous, and them more earnest in their solicitations¹. About this time died Don Ruez Lopez Avaloz, formerly constable of Castile, in very mean circumstances; but when he was in his grave, his illustrious friends prevailed upon the king to restore his fame, by reversing the proceedings against him: an odd instance of respect for a man's memory, whom they had suffered to want bread². When the constable was again brought to court, he was introduced into the king's presence by the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry, who first quarrelled with each other about his friendship, whom not long after, by his dextrous policy, he caused, upon honourable pretences, to be removed from court³. Mohammed, surnamed the Little, having dethroned Mohammed the Left-handed, king of Granada, who, for his own safety, was retired into Africa, was encouraged by the king of Castile to attempt the recovery of his own dominions; and some hostilities passed between the Castilians and the Moors^m.

out between the crowns of
Arragon.

THE heart-burnings against the constable naturally revived, upon his being known to have more power at court than ever; the various arts he practised to maintain that power, increased the number and the rage of his adversaries, amongst whom the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry, perceiving that they had been both his dupes, might be reckoned the chief. The king of Arragon adhered to them firmly, raised an army in their support; so that a new war was on the point of breaking out, and both armies took the field; but such was the zeal and the address of the queen-dowager of Arragon, and the cardinal Foix, the pope's legate, that the kings of Arragon and Navarre were prevailed on to retire, though the armies were within sightⁿ. After the retreat of their forces, Don Juan finding his own army much strengthened, resolved to revenge the insult he had received, having first sent a herald to the king of Arragon to denounce war. This produced a great deal of trouble and bloodshed on both sides; for, while the king, or rather the constable of Castile, plundered the dominions of Arragon on one side, the Infants Don Henry and Don Pedro did the like in Castile, and even carried their irruptions as far as Toledo: by degrees, however, the king Don Juan, and his loyal subjects, repressed the malecontents every where, gradually dispossessed the Infants of almost all their strong places; and, at length, blocked them up in Albuquerque, which the Infant Don Henry had received from his mother, whose hereditary estate it was^o. The same year, Mohammed, surnamed the Left-handed, recovered the throne of Granada, and Mohammed the Little, who had usurped it, suffered death^p.

A peace concluded, and the king Don Juan turns his
the Moors.

IN the beginning of the ensuing year, the king came with an army before Albuquerque; and knowing what great advantages he might reap by dividing his adversaries, he had thoughts of treating the two Infants favourably: with this view, he advanced in person under the walls, where he ordered a general amnesty to be proclaimed to all who would accept it. Don Henry and Don Pedro, instead of accepting the king's mercy, answered with shot, stones, and arrows. The king retired upon this, and immediately proclaimed the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry rebels, and gave away all their estates in Castile to his followers; and it was remarkable, that the nobility of all ranks put in for their share, only the constable de Luna, out of policy, refused any part of their spoils; and a gentleman, whose name was Dias, to whom the king gave a handsome gratification, refused it upon a more generous motive; he said he could take no joy in the acquisition of that, for the loss of which another man must lament^q. The kings of Arragon and Navarre offered to submit all points in dispute to the judgment of the king of Portugal. The count de Foix offered his mediation; but it was rejected, with so little ceremony, that he joined his forces with those of the two crowns. At length the king of Castile, perceiving that the Moors began to be turbulent, made a truce with the kings of Arragon and Navarre, upon condition that the exiles and malecontents of both countries should remain where they were; that the Infants Don Henry and Pedro should deliver the town and castle of Albuquerque into the king's hands; and that, for all points in dispute, they should be left to the decision of a certain number of judges, to be chosen by both parties. This gave offence to the king of Portugal, who thought himself slighted^r. Don Juan was now resolved to turn his arms upon the Moors; but first he sent an embassy to the king of Tunis to signify that the king of Granada, notwithstanding the assistance he had given him to remount the throne, had withheld his tribute, given assistance to his enemies, and made an alliance with the king of Arragon. Upon this the king of Tunis sent word to the monarch of Granada, that he had countermanded the succours he intended him, and that he had nothing to expect from him till he had given satisfaction to the king of Castile. The war that followed was very prejudicial to the Moors, the Castilians making incursions within sight of the walls of Granada^s.

- a THE king, Don Juan, kept so strict an eye upon such of the nobility as he suspected of having any intercourse with the Infants of Aragon, and harrassed them in such a manner, that they were afraid to stir. At the same time, under colour of the war against the Moors, he raised so formidable an army, as induced all his neighbours to behave towards him with great complaisance and respect. At length, after having secured one or two great men who had been intriguing, or were suspected, he proceeded into Andalusia, and put himself at the head of his troops, carrying with him the queen and the prince of Asturias; but, when the season for action approached, he sent the prince to Madrid, the queen to Carmona, and ordered his council to remain at Cordova†. On the 13th of June, he marched from that city for the plains of Granada, where, on the 25th of the same month, he came to an engagement with the whole force of the Moors, at a place called Caveca de los Ginetes; some writers say, that each of the armies consisted of upwards of one hundred thousand men; but that they were pretty near equal is, on all hands, agreed, as well as that, after a long dispute, the Moors were defeated, with the loss of upwards of ten thousand men in the field of battle, and near twice as many in the pursuit; their camp and baggage fell also into the power of the Christians; and Don Alvaro de Luna, perceiving a great body of troops who had taken a strong camp on the top of a mountain, he caused it to be invested, and obliged them to surrender prisoners of war^u. After this decisive victory, in which both the kings commanded in person, it was proposed, in the council of war held in the presence of Don Juan, to seize this favourable opportunity, and to lay siege to the city of Granada; but to this many objections were made, and the king, following the advice of the majority of his officers, resolved to lay waste all the adjacent country, and then to retire into his own dominions. The true motive of this resolution, as the most unprejudiced historians agree, was the secret aversion of the nobility to the constable, who therefore would not suffer him to have the honour of delivering Spain from the Moors; but this step was no sooner taken, and the army upon its march towards Cordova, than they gave out positively, that he was the author of the retreat; and that, under colour of a present of figs, the king of Granada had sent him fifty thousand doubloons in gold^w. Before the end of the year, the king concluded a peace with Portugal, and completed his revenge on the king of Granada, by enabling Joseph Ben Muley, grandson of that king of Granada whom Don Pedro the Cruel put to death with his own hands, to dethrone Mohammed the Left-handed, who was forced to fly to Malaga, while the new king declared himself a vassal of Castile; upon which all hostilities ceased^x. Gains a complete victory over them, and causes the king of Granada to be dethroned. A. D. 1431.

- THE troubles of Castile, which had been suspended during the war, broke out again as soon as it was over; for Don Juan de Soto Major, grand master of Alcantara, whom the king had long in suspicion, and who would never trust himself in his power, perceiving that his master was bent upon reducing him, as well as the count de Castro, and others, who had pursued the same measures, followed the dictates of his ambition, and resolved to join himself to the Infants Henry and Pedro; in consequence of which he delivered the town and fortress of Alcantara to the latter, and retired with the former to Albuquerque, which was become the chief seat and rendezvous of all the malecontents^y. This affair took a very strange turn; for, at the time of delivering the fortress he made prisoner therein one Dr. Franco, whom the king had sent to treat with him, and seized all his effects, and sent his nephew Don Guitterez de Soto Major, with a strong detachment of horse, to pillage the king's subjects, for the benefit of the Infants. This Don Guitterez, who was commander of the order, and next in authority to his uncle, had, upon his return, a conference with Dr. Franco, who hinted to him, that it was in his power to repair the disgrace of his family, and to establish himself for ever; and pointed out to him how it might be done. This staggered the young man; who knowing the mutability of his uncle's temper, and finding that he did not return, suspected that the Infant Don Henry, to make sure of him, had confined him in the castle of Albuquerque. Having once taken this in his head, he surmised his own turn would be next; to prevent which, he took Dr. Franco's advice, arrested the Infant Don Pedro, and declared for the king^z. This totally ruined the malecontents; for the king immediately ordered the uncle to be deposed as a traitor; and, upon his recommendation, the knights very willingly elected the nephew^a. In the next place the king threatened Albuquerque with a siege, and to bring Don Pedro to his trial. Upon this, his brother Don Henry, seeing no other remedy left, addressed himself to the king of Portugal, and desired him to propose to the king of Castile, that, upon evacuating all the places he held in his dominions, his brother should be released, which was readily accepted, and punctually performed on both sides^b. a Joseph Ben Muley, by the advice and with the assistance of the king of Castile, made great preparations for attacking Mohammed in the town of Malaga; but, when he was on the point of taking the field, he was seized with a distemper, which carried him off in a few days; in consequence of which, Mohammed the Left-handed was, for the third time, placed on the throne of Granada; and, joining his forces with those of his competitor, became, for the present, so formidable, that the king of Castile thought fit to dissemble his resentment, and conclude a short truce with him^c.

1432. Don Frederick count de Luna, the natural son of Don Martin, king of Sicily, had been one of the pretenders to the crown of Aragon; and, in the first disputes which the king of Castile had with his cousin Don Alonso, had taken up arms against that monarch, and adhered ever after to his benefactor the king of Castile, who bestowed upon him the duchy of Arjona, and several other places; which, being a man of boundless extravagance, he had sold, and consumed the money^c. A man without principles, and in distress, is capable of any thing. He framed, in these circumstances, a design of surprising Seville, of plundering the citizens and merchants, and then equipping a squadron to seek his fortunes elsewhere. Into this base design he had drawn some gentlemen, who very probably were in like circumstances with himself; and, upon its breaking out, they were all secured. His accomplices were broke upon the wheel; but as for himself, his treason against the king of Aragon excused him from sharing their fate as he deserved, and he was only imprisoned for life^f. The queen Donna Maria of Castile, touched with pity for Don Diego, son to Don Pedro the Cruel, who was grown grey in confinement, interceded with the king, her husband, on his behalf, who gave him the town of Coca, in Castile, for his prison, where he spent the remaining part of his days^e. The war with the Moors was carried on with various successes, only the Castilians had the good fortune to render themselves masters of the town of Huesca; but, to balance that, Don Guiterrez, grand master of Alcantara, was defeated with a considerable loss^b. The military expeditions of the succeeding year were of the same kind, without any thing decisive in favour of either side: but the king of Castile a was in one respect, very happy, since he was now entirely free from the disturbance which had been given him by the kings of Aragon and Navarre, and the other princes of that house, who were engaged in a troublesome and fruitless war in Italy. There, being defeated in a sea fight, they were, together with all the Castilian exiles who had followed their fortunes, taken prisoners, which could not fail of affording Don Juan, notwithstanding their near relation to him, much satisfaction, at the same time that it left their dominions almost at his mercy^l. However, he continued the truce, in consequence of the promise he had made, some time before, to his sister Donna Maria queen of Aragon, in an interview that he had with her at Soria. In a short time after Don Juan king of Navarre obtained his liberty, and returned into his own dominions; and Donna Leonora, queen-dowager of Aragon, mother e to these princes, died suddenly, perhaps of grief, at Medina del Campo^k.

1435. Donna Maria queen of Aragon, in an interview that he had with her at Soria. In a short time after Don Juan king of Navarre obtained his liberty, and returned into his own dominions; and Donna Leonora, queen-dowager of Aragon, mother e to these princes, died suddenly, perhaps of grief, at Medina del Campo^k.
 The next year was more fortunate for the Castilians, in respect to their war with the Moors, since several towns on the frontiers of the kingdom of Granada submitted themselves voluntarily to the king Don Juan; but the most remarkable event of this year was the peace concluded between the crowns of Castile, Aragon, and Navarre, by which the tranquility of the Christians in Spain was effectually secured^l. The county of Ampurias falling to the crown of Aragon, the king very generously gave it to his brother the Infant Don Henry, and sent him home: it was this that induced the king of Castile to push the conferences that had been opened for a general peace to a speedy conclusion; and it was accordingly signed on the twenty-second of September. By this treaty the prince of Asturias f was to espouse Donna Blanca, daughter of the king of Navarre, who was to enjoy the revenues of his estates in Castile for four years, and after that an annual pension of ten thousand crowns, in lieu of all his pretensions. The Infant Don Henry of Aragon was to have a like annuity of five thousand crowns, and the sum of fifty thousand crowns in ready money, in full satisfaction of the Infanta Catalina's portion. The Castilians who had embraced the interest of the king of Navarre and the Infants were to be pardoned, and all the places taken on either side restored. The king of Navarre and the Infants his brethren were a not, on any pretence, to set foot in Castile, without the express leave of the king Don Juan; and all memory of past misunderstandings was to be buried in oblivion. To shew his sincerity, the king Don Juan immediately sent full powers to the king of Navarre for contracting the prince of Asturias and the Infanta Donna Blanca, with a promise that the marriage should be celebrated as soon as the season would permit^m.

THE king, to the many marks of favour which he had already granted to the constable Don Alvaro de Luna, added the gift of the town of Montalvan, though it belonged to the queen, and obliged her to accept of Arevalo in exchangeⁿ. The winter proved extremely hard, notwithstanding which the king advanced towards the frontiers himself, and sent the prince of Asturias, accompanied by the constable, the bishop of Osma, and a great train, to Alfaro, where he espoused the Infanta of Navarre, Donna Blanca, esteemed the most beautiful woman of her age in Spain^o. In a short time after this marriage, the king caused Don Pedro Manrique to be arrested and put into the hands of the constable, which occasioned great discontent. As soon as it was known to the amirante, he began to fortify his places; upon which the king sent for him, and even granted him a safe-conduct. In this conference it was agreed, that, as the king was determined to shew his resentment, Pedro Manrique should be confined for two years in the castle of Roja, with leave to hunt sometimes, for the benefit of his health, and that things should go no further. The reader may discern from hence, that the kings of Castile neither had nor claimed a power of imprisoning without crime, or of treating as a criminal, any man who was not charged with an offence^p. The war with the Moors still subsisted: the Christians were so fortunate as to surprize the town of Huelma, and were very near losing it again by their imprudence. In another expedition of more importance, their troops were not only beaten, but most of them cut off. The king, having gone before to the castle of Roja, Pedro Manrique, who was confined there, with his wife and two daughters, was removed to another place, and from thence, on the 20th of August, they all made their escape; but would have been presently retaken, if the amirante and his friends had not taken up arms in their defence^q. After taking this step, they endeavoured to interest the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry in their support, to whom Pedro Manrique had been formerly a great friend, but, in respect to the treaty lately concluded, they refused to interfere, otherwise than by their good offices. The king, taking advantage of the war against the Moors, ordered the nobility to repair with their forces to the frontiers, early in the ensuing spring; and, as most of them testified great willingness to comply with the king's order, the constable advanced money to such as wanted it for their levies^r.

WHEN they came, however, to open the campaign, it clearly appeared, that the king and his minister were totally mistaken in their measures; for a great part of the nobility after having raised their troops, joined the malecontents. The king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry, who had obtained a safe-conduct, on account of the marriage of the prince of Asturias, made use of it to enter Castile each with a great body of troops. The king sent to compliment them, and to know the meaning of this; to which they answered, that, in a country where every-body was in arms, they thought it requisite, for their own safety, to go armed also^s. The king Don Juan sent for them to join him, which the king of Navarre did, but the Infant Don Henry went to the malecontents^t. After many conferences and much trouble, the king yielded to an accommodation, by which the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry were to be restored to their estates, and the constable was to be banished the court for six months. Yet, after a little time, the king went off from this agreement, and endeavoured to collect such a force as might reduce the malecontents to reason; but he found things strangely altered; and many of those who had formerly served him with the greatest fidelity going daily over to the malecontents^u. While things were in this situation, he received a very long letter, or rather manifesto, subscribed by the king of Navarre, the Infant Don Henry, the amirante, and all the lords of their party; in which, after very warm professions of the utmost duty and respect, they told him, that it was not against him, but against Don Alvaro de Luna, that they had taken up arms; because that, without his knowledge, he had imposed taxes upon the people, taken away men's goods and estates at his pleasure, caused money to be coined below the standard, had prevailed upon the king to seize persons of distinction without cause, and then carried them to be murdered without his privity; that he disposed of all civil offices at his pleasure, threatened such as were in the king's service if they did not pay a servile complaisance to his will; and that, at Arevalo, he had killed one man, and beat another in his majesty's presence; so that they could not look upon him as acting freely, or believe themselves or the kingdom in safety, while such a man remained about his person. The king did not much regard this letter; but found himself under a necessity of assembling the states at Valladolid; and, previous to their meeting, he formed the household of the prince of Asturias; at the head of which he placed Don Alvaro de Luna^w. One of the first things done at Valladolid was completing the marriage of the prince Asturias and Donna Blanca, as they were then both of age; which was done with great solemnity and at a vast expence^x, though, as it afterwards appeared, there was no consummation. About this time Don Pedro Manrique, in whose quarrel these disturbances began, deceased; and, in a short time after, the prince of Asturias, by the persuasion of his favourite Don Juan Pacheco, privately quitted the court, and retired to the malecontents^y.

The queen and the prince of Asturias concurred with the malecontents.

THE king of Castile received early the next year the mortifying news of the Infant Don Henry's having taken possession of the city of Toledo. He marched thither with such troops as he could assemble, in hopes of recovering it, but without effect: and though he proceeded to extremities, and issued various edicts and proclamations, yet they neither encouraged his own party, nor intimidated that of the malecontents. The constable, and his brother the archbishop of Toledo, had assembled a great strength at Escalona, and their friends, in several small actions, came off with great reputation; insomuch, that they accepted a challenge of deciding all differences in a single battle: but the king sending an order in writing to both parties to forbear hostilities, on pain of being denounced rebels, he was obeyed^z. Some fortunate attempts made by those who adhered to him, encouraged the king so much, that he began to seize the estates of the principal persons embarked in what was now called the league; but it gave him great concern to find both the queen and the prince of Asturias affecting to act as mediator between him and his subjects, while in reality they were in the interests of the malecontents: however, he yielded nothing to their intercessions. He sent for the constable and all his forces to Medina del Campo, where, as some writers say, he was betrayed, but, as all agree, surprized, by the forces of the league, who entered the town in the night^a. The first thing the king did, was to send to the constable and the archbishop to retire with their friends, and provide for their own safety; whilst himself, with such as he could depend upon, formed in the square, and by that disposition, hindered an immediate pursuit; but as soon as the constable had forced a passage, the king sent the archbishop of Seville to the lords of the opposite party, to let them know he should be glad to see them. This passed on the 28th of June; and the king, finding himself now intirely in the hands of those he esteemed his enemies, consented to whatever they asked, as appears from a long treaty of twenty-nine articles, which amount to no more than this, That the constable should be separated from the king one half of the year; that he should give his son as a hostage, and also nine fortresses, by way of security, that he would submit to these terms; and all forfeitures and all grants from the king were to be void^b. He went, soon after this, to Burgos, and consented to call an assembly of the states, as they desired him; but made choice of Toro instead of Madrigal, which they recommended: and, in the mean time, both sides carried on their intrigues^c.

By which the king is compelled to yield to their requests.

THE king, instead of caressing Don Juan of Navarre, or his brother Don Henry, paid a great deal of respect to the amirante, with whom also the constable endeavoured to entertain a private correspondence, which in all probability had succeeded, but for the circumstance of the count de Castro, who, considering that Donna Blanch, queen of Navarre, and the Infanta Catalina of Castile, were both dead, advised the king, and the Infant Don Ferdinand his brother, to strengthen their interest by marriage; proposing to the former Donna Joanna, daughter to the amirante, and Donna Beatrice, sister to the count de Benavante, to the latter; and those marriages being quickly settled, strengthened the league extremely^d. At the assembly of the estates at Toro, the king obtained a considerable supply, and had very probably done more, if it had not been discovered that the constable had procured the lodgings of the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry to be undermined, with an intent to have blown them up, which added not a little to that hatred that was already borne him; but notwithstanding this, a dispute having happened in the order of Calatrava, in which some

^a blood had been spilled, the king marched with the forces about him to put an end to the disorder, reduced Talavera in his way, and then proceeded to Toledo^c. In his route the constable Don Alvaro came to kiss his hands, and had a private conference with the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry, after which he returned to Escalona, not a little chagrined at the loss of his brother the archbishop of Toledo^f. The king managed his affairs with great address; for, perceiving that factions were formed, and that seditions broke out in several parts of his dominions, he commissioned the principal lords of the league to reduce these disturbers of the public quiet; and actually engaged the Infant Don Henry to besiege the new grand master of Calatrava, who had been chose without the king's consent, and who lost his life in this dispute^g. But the constable giving the king notice that his wife ^{1442.} ^b was delivered of a daughter, the king and queen went to Escalona, and assisted at the christening, which piqued the league extremely^h. The king coming to Madrigal, the prince of Asturias repaired thither, and proposed in the privy council that several persons should be removed from his father's presence, and all the creatures of the constable dismissed; so that, in a short time, from being a great king, Don Juan found himself very little better than a prisoner, and this with the bitter circumstance of being thus treated by his son.

At the opening of this year the affairs of the king of Castile were in a most distressed condition; the malecontents, and more especially the amirante, being so jealous of him, that they appointed the brother of that lord, and another person in whom they could confide, to keep him constantly in view; which as soon as that prince perceived, it threw him into a ^{The bishop of Avila prevails on the prince to attempt his father's release.} ^{1443.} deep melancholy. This affected the bishop of Avila to such a degree, that he addressed himself to Don Juan Pacheco, and asked him how he could be guilty of such ingratitude to Don Alvaro de Luna, who had made him every thing? or how he durst inspire the prince his master with sentiments of disloyalty to his father? Pacheco gave him to understand, that the prince needed no tutors in an affair of that kind, and that himself was sick at that time; but that he was willing to bring his master off from the league; in which he was as good as as his wordⁱ. The prince then made a treaty with the constable Don Alvaro, and stipulated certain terms for himself and his favourite, on which he was willing to attempt his father's release. In managing this affair he acted with the most profound dissimulation and deceit, till the bishop of Avila had engaged the count de Haro, and many other great lords, to take ^{1444.} ^d up arms in the cause of their sovereign^k. The prince of Asturias then put himself at their head; upon which the league took the king from Tordesillas, and sent him to the fortress of Portillo, under the care of count de Castro, and then marched with all their forces to give the prince battle. While they were in the field, the king, by the assistance of cardinal Cervantes, made his escape, and, by his own authority, quickly raised another army; so that the king of Navarre and his partizans had now the prince in their front, and the king in their rear; which struck them with such a panic, that many daily deserted them. At length, their army breaking up, the king of Navarre retired into the territories of Arragon, and the Infant Don Henry, losing all Andalusia, the king, who, at the beginning, was a close prisoner, found himself, before the close of the year, at least as much a monarch as he ^e had ever been^l.

THE king of Navarre was not long before he collected fresh forces, and gave notice to all his partisans to dispose things in the best manner they could to join him; and if they found that impracticable, to repair to his brother Henry, who, with infinite hazard and diligence, drew together the broken remains of the league^m. The king, having the prince his son, the constable, and a considerable body of troops about him, endeavoured to hinder the brothers from joining, but without effect; so that they brought their whole strength together at Almedo, before which place the king soon presented himself with his forces. On the 19th of May in the morning, the prince of Asturias, at the head of two hundred horse, went to reconnoitre the place; upon which Don Rodrigo Manrique issued out with a superior body of cavalry, and drove him into his father's camp. The king, provoked and astonished at this insolence, ordered his standard to be displayed, and advanced towards the town in order of battle, and kept his troops under arms till it was within two hours of night, by which time the king of Navarre drew out his forces in exact order, and an obstinate engagement ensued. The king's forces had the advantage from the beginning, when, a little before night, the malecontents were entirely routed, the amirante, with Don Henry his brother, the count de Castro and his son, and many other persons of distinction were made prisoners. The king of Navarre, and his brother the Infant Don Henry, who was wounded in the hand, retired first to Almedo, and from thence in the night towards the frontiers of Arragon; where, when they arrived, the Infant Don Henry died of his wound^a. The king, by the advice of the constable, gave a loose to his resentment, put some of the prisoners to death, and granted away the estates of most of those who had been in arms. This disgusted the prince of Asturias, who, with his favourite Don Juan de Pacheco, retired to Segovia; and the amirante, having made his escape, joined such of his friends as had retired to Andalusia; and, having drawn together a considerable body of men, fought to make his retreat out of the kingdom^b. The king went on, reducing the places belonging to the malecontents, and to that lord in particular; in which, however, he met with some obstruction; the prince very roundly declaring, that he had taken the amirante and his family under his protection^c. In the mean time, the constable of Portugal entered Castile with a body of troops, which the king, by the advice of Don Alvaro de Luna, had demanded, contrary to the opinion of the rest of the nobility, who foresaw that they would come too late. However, he gave them a good reception; and Don Alvaro had several private conferences with the constable^d. The queen Donna Maria of Castile, sister to the kings of Arragon and Navarre, died in the beginning of the year, not without suspicion of being poisoned, by the contrivance of Don Alvaro; and that ambitious favourite, without so much as saying a word to his master, concluded with the constable of Portugal a marriage for that prince with Donna Isabella, daughter to the Infant Don Juan of Portugal^e. When the strangers were departed, he acquainted the king with what he had done, and the advantages he proposed from the match, with which Don Juan was exceedingly offended, as he proposed to have married a daughter of France: but Don Alvaro had such an ascendancy over him, that he consented to the match^f. He was soon after obliged to digest another disagreeable proposition from the prince of Asturias, which was the pardoning the amirante and the count of Benavente; at the same time he made Don Lopez de Mendoza marquis of Santillana, and Don Juan Pacheco marquis of Villena. He procured likewise Don Alvaro de Luna to be elected grand master of the order of St. James; and having deposed Don Alonso, the natural son of the king of Navarre, from the office of grand master of Calatrava, Don Pedro Gironne was placed therein, though not without difficulty, to oblige the prince, who was still out of humour, and to whom he was obliged to give the town of Caceres, as he did the important town of Albuquerque, with all its dependencies, to the grand master Don Alvaro^g. But, at the close of the year, deposing Don Pedro Lopez de Ayala from the government of Toledo, and ordering his process to be made for numberless crimes, the prince of Asturias took fresh offence thereat, and the king his father was obliged to promise him satisfaction in this and every thing else^h. There happened this year a revolution in the kingdom of Granada, where Mohammed ben Osman, the nephew of Mohammed ben Nacer, at this time upon the throne, having intelligence at Almeria where he lived of great heartburnings in the court, he came secretly to Granada, and causing a tumult to be raised by his partisans, proceeded suddenly to the Alhambra, or palace, where he seized his uncle, and, having confined him to a prison, mounted the throne. As this was conducted by the populace, and by a few inferior officers, Abdilbar, who was the chief magistrate, retired to Monte Frio, on the frontiers of the kingdom of Jaen, and, with others of the nobility, invited Isbmael, a prince of the blood, then in the service of Don Juan of Castile, to come to them, with a promise of using their endeavours to make him king; in which he had also some assistance from the monarch of Castile, but not enough to carry his point, though his partisans adhered to him with great fidelityⁱ.

THE misunderstanding between the king Don Juan of Castile and his son the prince of Asturias rose higher, and grew much more public than ever; insomuch, that it was no secret to the people, that, under colour of repressing the insolence of the grand master Don Alvaro, he really meant to take the crown from his father's head, and to place it upon his own. Don Juan, being apprised of this, and having more steadiness in his temper than his son, thought the sooner this was decided the better; and therefore, hearing the prince was in the field, he marched against him with pretty near the same force^j. The two armies met between Arevalo and Madrigal; but the clergy and people of discretion, who were about the king and prince, prevailed upon them to spare their subjects blood in so unnatural a quarrel; upon which it was agreed to leave the discussion of their respective grievances to the real authors of them, Don Alvaro de Luna and Don Juan Pacheco, who, for the present, patched up an

- a agreement to their own satisfaction, who were to be the only gainers by it, which was subscribed on the eleventh of May^y. The king Don Juan then turned his arms against his cousin of Navarre, and endeavoured to reduce the few strong places he had left; but while he was thus employed, Don Juan Pacheco revived in the prince's mind a desire of obliging the king to banish the grand master, who was become his own enemy: the king knew this well enough, and had no dislike at all to the thing, for he knew him to be a bad man, and hated him as a great one. Don Alvaro was not at all ignorant of this; but he shewed the king so clearly that it was by his power and abilities that he was himself kept on the throne, that he rendered him more steady to him through timidity than he had ever been through affection. By his advice the king wrote to the amirante and to the count de Benavente, to whom
- b he knew that his son had made propositions, assuring them that he would make fidelity more their interest than treason. A more miserable nation than this, unconquered by a foreign force, was never seen; and yet into this miserable condition must every nation come, where factions long prevail^z. The king of Navarre, to be revenged on the monarch of Castile, procured a great body of Gascons, hungry and out of pay, to make a quick march through his own dominions, and take up their winter quarters in Castile, where, to all the untoward consequences of civil broils, they added every dismal misfortune that could offend a barbarous invader. To heighten the horrors of this scene, the king of Granada, having first reconciled Ishmael, made several incursions into the territories of Castile, in quality of confederate to the king of Navarre, burnt several places, and drove multitudes into slavery; while, to
- c give the finishing touch to the piece, the prince of Asturias, who commanded on the frontiers, forbid any succours being sent to the places attacked, from the wicked desire of rendering his father more odious, and his administration more contemptible, as the most effectual A. - It was not possible for any prince to have a truer or a sharper sense of his condition than Don Juan of Castile; but, for many reasons, he was obliged to dissemble; and, if that is to be esteemed, as some say it is, a royal quality, he possessed it in a supreme degree. Don Juan, king of Navarre, bearing continually in his mind what noble estates he once had in Castile, meditated every method possible for recovering them, and found none more promising for the present than to complete the marriage with Donna Joanna Henriques, daughter to the
- d amirante, which he had contracted some time before; the brother of that lady being acquainted with his intentions, conveyed her privately to the frontiers of Arragon, where that monarch met and espoused her^b. This alliance prompted him to raise new troubles in Castile; but his son the prince of Viana interposed, and by his great influence with the states of Navarre and Arragon, prevented him from doing what he proposed^c. Don Juan of Castile married also a second time Donna Isabella, daughter to the Infant Don Juan of Portugal, who, in a very short space of time, acquired his affection to such a degree, that he intrusted her with his great secret, which was, that he mortally hated, and was extremely desirous of being rid of, Don Alvaro, who had been so long his favourite, for which he assigned many motives, but, in all probability, suppressed one, which was none of the least, that he had

(C) This great favourite Don Alvaro de Luna, having maintained himself so many years in the possession of power, by studying the king's temper, and complying with it, saw plainly enough that he could not long remain a widower; and that it was of the last importance to his safety that he should receive a wife from his hand. It was this that induced him to set on foot a secret negotiation with the crown of Portugal, or rather with the regent and his family, that in case of any revolution in Castile, which he had always to fear, he might have some neighbouring country, from which he might expect succours, or into which he might retire in case of necessity. Donna Isabella, in all probability, came to the court of Castile, with sentiments of respect and gratitude for Don Alvaro; but when she found the easiness of Don Juan's temper, and that Don Alvaro had lost his inclinations, though he preserved his influence over his master, she conceived a design of making herself what he had formerly been, the sole oracle of the king, and the absolute mistress of his affairs. In order to this there was no other way than to enter into the king's secret, and to manage the destruction of her benefactor; which, though he had a very good will, the king wanted capacity to bring about. For this, the Spanish historians, and it is no wonder, load her memory with the strongest imputations of ingratitude, and even cruelty; since the king relented at last; and if it had not been for the queen, would have preserved this great man's life. The vanity of oblique policy is evident in the pains that Don Alvaro took to bring about his own destruction, while, in his own opinion, he was taking the most effectual means to support his power, or at least to preserve his person. On the other hand, the folly of female intrigues is no less apparent from the queen's behaviour, who, by sacrificing Don Alvaro, exposed herself to all that contempt, ill usage, and severe treatment, which she met with in the succeeding reign. They had both of them great address in turning circumstances and events to the facilitating of their private views; both of them triumphed in their turns by these sinister contrivances; and both of them perished in the end by the success of their own arts.

A. D. 1447. in quality still of ally to the king of Navarre, made himself master of several places that lay very conveniently for him, and which the prince of Asturias might easily have prevented, but for the reason that has been before assigned; which, though the worst in the world, continued to be the rule of his conduct^c: or, if that be any apology for his conduct, it was the maxim of Don Juan Pacheco, who then and ever after governed him at his pleasure.

An interview
between the king of Castile
and his son.

THE grand master Don Alvaro de Luna, perceiving that the greater part of the nobility of Castile inclined to the party of the king of Navarre, judged it absolutely necessary, for his own safety, that the king and the prince should be reconciled; and this he brought about, as he had often done before, by gaining Don Juan de Pacheco. In order to this reconciliation, an interview was to be had between the father and son, to which they came with an equal number of guards, and at which the king caused the count de Benavente, Don Henry Henriquez, and Don Suero de Quinones, to be arrested; and the prince, on his side, did the same, with regard to the count Alba de Tormes and Don Pedro de Quinones, persons who had given umbrage to their respective favourites^f. This, as might have been easily foreseen, augmented the troubles, which were already but too great, and obliged many of the nobility to unite more strictly to the king of Navarre. The Moors also renewed their incursions; and though the prince, as a proof of his reconciliation, sent Alonso Tellez against them with a small body of forces, yet this served only to increase the evil; since, through his own ill conduct, most of his troops were cut to pieces^g. The count of Benavente, having made his escape, took up arms against the king, and gave him a great deal of trouble. The grand master Don Alvaro, having the king's order to protect the frontiers against the Moors, first went to Toledo, in order to borrow a sum of money; which so irritated the citizens, that they revolted, and made Pedro Sarmiento, who was governor of the castle, their chief. He defended the city against the king, whom he treated with the utmost insolence; and, when he found himself hard pressed, offered to declare for the prince, who thereupon required the king his father to raise the siege, as he had taken Toledo and all its inhabitants under his protection; which, to avoid a new civil war, the king was constrained to do^h. For these good services Pedro Sarmiento thought it reasonable to pay himself, by stripping most of the rich citizens of all that they were worth, which he did, with all the circumstances of oppression and barbarity that can be imagined. The prince, being informed of this, went thither and turned him out; but suffered him to carry away all his ill-got wealth, with which he retired into *Aragon*ⁱ. The Moors continued their incursions, and took several places upon the frontiers. The king of Castile, growing old and weary of continual disturbances, and becoming more and more uneasy at the power which the grand master Don Alvaro assumed, though he shewed him as great marks of favour as ever, resolved to reconcile himself, once for all, to the king of Navarre and the malecontents. While he was engaged in a negotiation for this purpose, the prince of Asturias fell into the like distaste of his favourite Don Juan Pacheco, marquis of Villena; but as he could never keep a secret, the design he had laid to seize him miscarried, and he was forced to give him leave to quit his court, which he did, and retired to one of the fortresses in his own possession; yet, in a short time after, this quarrel was composed, and the marquis restored to the prince's good graces^k; who, though a weaker man, was a better master than his father.

Reconciliation
between the king and his son.

THE pope being fully acquainted with the sad and strange situation of affairs in Castile, which gave the Moors an opportunity not only of enriching themselves, by their annual excursions, but likewise to strengthen and enlarge their dominions, sent a bull, addressed to most of the prelates in Spain, requiring them to excommunicate such as refused to submit to their sovereign, and, by perplexing his affairs, gave such advantage to the Infidels. This bull being published, had a great effect; insomuch that the prince of Asturias found himself obliged to submit himself in earnest to his father; and to take away all grounds of suspicion, took an oath, which was administered to him by the archbishop of Toledo, to remain inviolably attached to him for the future. In consequence of this, Toledo returned to the king's obedience^l. Several of the adherents and instruments of Pedro Sarmiento were seized, convicted, and suffered cruel deaths. He was also condemned as a traitor, and his estates confiscated; but the king suffered him to live privately with his family, which, however, did not exempt him from the heavier sentence of another tribunal; for, falling into a violent illness, he suffered for a long time most excruciating tortures, and ended his days in the most deplorable manner^m. The prince, in virtue of his reconciliation with the king, prevailed upon him to make war with Navarre; which, however, was soon compromised, by the prince of Viana's repairing to the king's camp, and assuring him, that he took no share in his

a father's measures; the truth of which quickly after appeared by the breaking out of a war between them. On the 23d of April this year, the queen was brought to bed, some say at A. D. 1451: Madrid, others at Madrigal, of the Infanta Donna Isabella, who, in process of time, became queen of all Spain^a.

THE queen continued incessantly to irritate the king against the grand master Don Alvaro, to which she herself was chiefly instigated by the treasurer Don Alonso Perez de Vivero, a man of address and abilities; who, at the same time, owed all his preferments to the man whom he thus laboured to destroy, and by whom, at this time, he was entertained as a bosom friend. The king had it several times in his mind to cause him to be arrested; but the sense of continual danger had taught the grand master such an habitual caution, that every attempt b of this kind was found impracticable. Yet he who, without knowing their schemes, could defend himself against others, facilitated his own ruin by the methods he took to accomplish theirs. He persuaded the king to attack his old enemy the count de Placentia, or rather to lend him the concurrence of his person and authority to despoil that nobleman of his estates; which the king, who no longer considered every man as his enemy that was so to his favourite, refused^c. Of this project Vivero gave that nobleman a full account; who thereupon framed the scheme of a general confederacy for the grand master's destruction, which he sent to the prince of Asturias, and to several of the nobility. The prince, at that time, was not very clear, whether the destruction of the grand master was his interest or not, and therefore sent a loose and inconclusive answer; but the count de Haro, the marquis de Santillan, and c the count de Benavente, entered into the confederacy, and promised to support it at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, and it was this that brought the grand master to his ruin^d. The king and the prince of Asturias concurred in supporting Don Carlos, prince of Viana, against his father, and indeed he had all the plausible pretences that could be offered for such a proceeding. But Don Juan of Navarre was another sort of a man than Don Juan of Castile, and not to be frightened by appearances. His son took the field against him with a superior army, and endeavoured to force him to a battle; but, before the quarrel came to be decided by the sword, he offered him peace, upon such terms as he thought fit to prescribe. The king of Navarre, who looked upon the loss of his honour and authority as a far greater misfortune than the loss of life, rejected those terms, and upon this an engagement ensued; d in which, if the prince would have been content with victory, he might have had it; but attacking the king's guards, and putting his father's person in danger, his brother Don Alonso exerted himself with such passion for the preservation of him who had given him being, that the prince's party were not only defeated, but he was forced to deliver up his sword into his brother's hands, and so became his father's prisoner, who treated him sternly indeed, but not with cruelty^e. Battle between the king of Navarre and his own son. 1452.

THE king of Castile had a conference with the prince of Asturias at Madrigal, to concert measures for procuring the prince of Viana's liberty; and in this conference Don Alonso Perez de Vivero engaged the prince to concur with his father in the destruction of the grand master, for arresting of whom some plots were laid, but without effect^f. This did not hinder the king's accepting an invitation from the grand master to go with the queen and the whole court to Tordesillas, where they were splendidly entertained at his expence; and it was in the midst of these diversions, that, by an accident, the grand master discovered the intrigues and correspondences of Vivero; upon which he first thought of destroying him, but referred it to another occasion, when he might withdraw himself from court, and stand upon his defence; but, considering that he had always a gallant company of guards, commanded by a natural son of his, Don Pedro de Luna, he rejected that likewise as beneath him^g. He went therefore with the king to Valladolid; but, when his master proposed going to Burgos, he demanded a safe-conduct, which was granted him. When the court arrived there, the king sent a person of confidence to the count of Placentia, with orders to arrest the grand master; but the count suspecting this was no more than an artifice to entrap him, declined the commission, which, however, he cheerfully accepted, upon the king's writing him a letter with his own hand. But, being confined to his bed by the gout, he committed the direction of this difficult affair to his son Don Alvaro de Zuniga, who, with a small body of determined men, went privately to Burgos in order to effect it^h. This design, though conducted with all the art and all the spirit possible, was attended with such difficulties, that the king once sent that young nobleman orders to desist; but, upon his undertaking for the success, he renewed his command to proceed. The grand master, though he had no distinct a intelligence of the measures pursued, knew in general that something was brewing against him; and therefore, upon Good-Friday, called a council of his particular friends to concert the properest means for securing his safety, to which, amongst the rest, Don Alonso Perez de Vivero was invited. The place where this consultation was held was the top of a tower of the palace in which he lodged; and, having first shewn Don Alonso his own letters, and the king's, which he could not deny, he then turned his back upon him; on which signal two of his friends caught up Don Alonso, and threw him over the tower, by which his brains were beat out in the street". Upon this they set up a great cry, as if it had happened by accident; which, however it deceived the people, could not deceive the king, who by this action was determined in his measures. At length Don Alvaro de Zuniga invested his house, b and would have forced it, but the king sent an order to the grand master to submit himself prisoner, which he offered to do, provided he had the king's promise that nothing should be attempted against his life or honour: this he accordingly received, tho' some say the words of that promise were, nothing should be unjustly attempted". However, upon this he submitted. His castle of Portilla being soon after reduced, the king ordered him to be sent thither, and directed a commission to twelve lawyers and lords of the council to form his process, and to proceed to judgment, which they did, and unanimously pronounced sentence of death on him*. He was transferred from thence to Valladolid, by Don Diego de Zuniga, who had the custody of him, where he suffered death, on a scaffold, on the seventh of June, c as Ferreras^y says, though Mariana and other writers affirm, on the 5th of July^z. He died with great steadiness and courage; and it is said that the king, if he had not been withheld by the queen, would have preserved him even on the morning of his execution (D). This action has been considered by different authors in very different lights; for some regard him as a criminal who met with no worse usage than he deserved, while others represent him as a victim of state, whose only crime was being a very able minister to a very weak prince (E). In this, however, most historians agree, that the king regretted the loss of him when it was too late, and when experience taught him that faction was not buried in the grave of the grand master, but that the powers of repressing it were much lessened by his death. He enriched himself exceedingly by the forfeitures, and by seizing the treasures of that great minister; though, by a kind of composition, he left much wealth to his widow and children. d

(D) It was contrived by those who were about the king of Castile, that this sacrifice of the great master of St. James, and high constable, Don Alvaro de Luna, should be accompanied with all the pomp and solemnity possible, that it might make the greater impression on the people. The scaffold was erected in one of the most public places in Valladolid; there stood upon it a table covered with black velvet, upon which was a cross, between two flambeaux of white wax lighted; to which, as soon as he came upon the scaffold, he made a profound reverence. Upon the reading of his sentence, he said, My sins have deserved not only this, but a much heavier punishment. He then gave his hat and his ring to one of his pages, saying, These are the last favours I have to bestow; upon which the youth burst out into such a passion of tears, as affected all the spectators. He cast his eyes next on the master of the horse to the prince Asturias; Baraza, said he, tell your master from me, that he will do well not to follow his father's example in the rewarding of his old servants. Observing a very high post with an iron hook upon the top of it, he said to the executioner, My friend, what is that for? It is, returned the executioner, to place your head on when I shall have severed it from your body. Don Alvaro, without the least emotion, replied, when I am dead, you may do with my remains what you please; no death can be shameful, which is supported with courage and intrepidity, or untimely, after a man has for many years been at the head of affairs, and conducted all things with dignity and reputation. He then laid himself along upon the cloth prepared for that purpose, for in Spain they do not behead, but cut the throats of persons condemned for high treason, and afterwards separate the head from the body. Immediately before he lay down, the executioner would have tied his hands behind him with a cord; but Don Alvaro putting his hand into his bosom, pulled out a ribband, which he gave him for that purpose. As soon as he was prostrate the executioner struck his long knife into his throat, and presently after divided his head from his body, which, after it had been exposed to the people, was placed upon the pole before-mentioned, and remained there nine days, though the body lay on the scaffold but three. A basin was placed near it, to receive the alms of charitably disposed people, to defray the expence of burying, says Mariana, a man, who in power and wealth, but a few days before, was equal to some sovereign princes. Others, with more probability, say this money was bestowed to procure masses for his soul. He was at first interred at St. Andrews, where malefactors were usually buried; but leave was afterwards procured to remove his body to the church of St. Francis, in Valladolid: some years after, with the king's permission, it was transferred to Toledo, and finally buried with great pomp in the chapel of St. James, belonging to the cathedral in that city, which was of his own foundation. This was the end of him who had served his master forty five years, thirty of which he had governed at his pleasure both the king and kingdom.

(E) We might expect to find some distinct account of the crimes of which he was convicted in the sentence that was read to him on the scaffold, in the hearing of the people; but upon perusal of the sentence, it will appear that it consists only of general suggestions, and seems to ground the opinion of the king's justice upon the notoriety of his offences.

a On the 15th of November the queen was delivered of the Infant Don Alonso, at Tordesillas^d. About the same time a revolution happened in the kingdom of Granada, where Ishmael at length found means to set himself on the throne, at least he was proclaimed king, though not without a rival, as will be seen hereafter^e. The king of Navarre, at the request of the states of that kingdom and of Arragon, released the prince Don Carlos, upon certain terms; neither ought we to omit that the prince of Asturias was separated from his princess Donna Blanca, daughter to the king of Navarre, and sister to Don Carlos, on account of a reciprocal frigidity towards each other; a cause which then, and ever since, has been considered in a proper, that is, in a ridiculous, light^f. The king of Navarre sets his son at liberty. A. D. 1453.

b THE king, Don Juan, having now learned from experience, the proper mistress of such kind of men, that the only way to be safe, after a reign like his, was to be armed, kept eight thousand lances about his person, which had a good effect^g. The intelligence he received of the discoveries made by the king of Portugal, and the great advantages that he was like to reap from them, chagrined him so much, who, during a very long reign, had gained no advantage at all to his people, that surmising these discoveries to be inconsistent with the grant which his predecessors had obtained from the pope of the Canary Islands, and whatever depended upon them, he threatened Portugal with a war, if the king did not desist from all thoughts of discovery; but that monarch having made him a general promise not to invade his rights, pursued them without any regard to the threats of Don Juan^h. His sister, the queen Donna Maria of Arragon, being come into Castile on purpose to confer with him, he went, though he was ill of a fever, from Avila towards Medina del Campo to meet her, but was taken so extremely ill upon the road, that those about him thought he was dead; yet, upon exhibiting a proper cordial, he recovered so much strength as to be carried to Medina del Campo, and from thence to Valladolid, where he relapsed, and, with great patience and resignation, breathed his last, on the twenty-first of *July*ⁱ. By his testament he devised to the queen Donna Isabella the towns of Soria, Arevalo, and Madrigal, with all their dependencies; to the Infant Don Alonso the administration of the grand mastership of St. James, and to the Infanta Donna Isabella the town of Cuellar, with its revenues and territory. He recommended in the strongest terms to the prince of Asturias unanimity in the royal family, and a proper regard in him for his mother-in-law, and for his brother and sister; of which, however, it does not appear he had any great hopes (F). His demise was not much regretted by his subjects, and perhaps it would have excited still less sorrow if they had not been so well acquainted with his successor^k. Death of Don Juan king of Castile, who is succeeded by his son Henry IV.

c As soon as the obsequies of the late king were performed, his son, Don Henry the fourth, took possession of the kingdom, at Valladolid, with great ceremony, the principal nobility and prelates of the realm repairing thither to pay their allegiance, and testify their regard for the new king^l. Upon this occasion Don Henry affected, by his behaviour as a king, to efface all memory of the strange things that had been done by the prince of Asturias. He caused Don Diego Manrique, count of Trevino, whom he had, for some time, kept in prison, to be set at liberty; and he did the like with respect to Don Hernando Alvarez de Toledo, count of Alba, who had been restrained for a much longer time; which acts of grace were very acceptable^m. Soon after he sent ambassadors to renew the antient alliance with the crown of France; and, within as short a space as could be expected, he regulated with Donna Maria, queen of Arragon, the treaty of accommodation which had been begun by his fatherⁿ. This settled and extinguished all the pretensions of the king of Navarre and his family, as well as their adherents. That monarch, his son Don Alonso, and his nephew Don

(F) We are told by Mariana that this unfortunate prince died on the twentieth, instead of the twenty-first, of June, 1454; and he assures us, that though, by his last will and testament, he assigned the great offices of grand-master and constable to the Infant Don Alonso, it was much less than he designed, and yet even that was more than was in his power. The truth, in the opinion of this and of other historians, was, that he meant to have disinherited the prince of Asturias, as incapable and unworthy of the royal dignity, and one who had forfeited his right to it by his frequent rebellions. Ferreras takes no notice of this, and yet he seems to confirm the truth of it, by observing, that, in the fit which the king had a little before his death, one of his principal ministers sent immediately for the prince Don Henry, from an apprehension that some of the nobility might get the person of the Infant Don Alonso into their hands, in order to create new troubles. This is scarce intelligible, unless some such intention of the king his father was known; and allowing this, it will enable us to understand and account for many things that would otherwise appear very strange at least, if not altogether incredible, in the succeeding part of the history.

Henry, had each of them a large annuity as a satisfaction for their estates; and for their partizans they were, a few only excepted, restored to their titles, dignities, and possessions, without being liable to any enquiry for what was past; the intire settlement of so perplexed an affair being referred to a congress^a. As to the affairs of Arragon, the king Don Henry thought fit to settle these by an embassy sent for that purpose to king Don Alonso in Italy; and this being in a fair train, he called an assembly of the three estates of the kingdom, in which his design of attacking the Moors was highly approved, and a liberal supply granted him for that purpose. He likewise negotiated a marriage with Donna Joanna Infanta of Portugal, which was concluded, though that princess was no stranger to the suspicions created by the dissolution of his former marriage with the Infanta of Navarre^p, which indeed were the common topics of discourse through Spain.

upon the Moors.

In the congress held at Agreda all the points in difference between the crowns of Castile and Navarre, and their allies and adherents on both sides, were very happily terminated, on the conditions that have been already mentioned. The war with the Moors was undertaken in the spring with a great force, but with no great effect, since the king only ravaged the open country about Granada. This displeased some of the nobility; who, perceiving that the king was as much held in leading-strings by the marquis de Villena, as his father had ever been by Don Alvaro de Luna, resolved to seize on the person of their monarch, and then to make such alterations as they should think convenient. But this design was discovered and prevented^q. He went afterwards to Cordova, where he espoused Donna Joanna of Portugal^r. In the autumn he made a new irruption into the territories of Granada, where he did infinite mischief; insomuch, that Ishmael king of Granada entered into a negotiation, which, however, was attended with no effect; and at length, the season being spent, the Christian army retired^s. The grand masterships of St. James and Alcantara being vacant, the king took their revenues to his own use; but the marquis de Villena was secretly ambitious of attaining the first. In this he was traversed by Michael Luc, whom the king had lately taken into his good graces, and who, though a man of very mean birth, was supported by the duke de Medina Sidonia, the bishop of Cuenca, and others of the nobility, out of spleen to the marquis; though the people in general bore an equal hatred to them both^t: but, of the two, Don Michael had a better character, and deserved it.

Makes an excursion to the coast of Barbary.

THE late treaty of peace concluded at Agreda appeared to the king of Castile of so great consequence, that he resolved to send ambassadors to the king of Arragon, then at Naples, in order to have his concurrence, in which he met with all the success he could desire. In the war with the Moors it was otherwise; he gave them, indeed, a great deal of disturbance, destroyed their country, and took some places of little importance, but there happened nothing decisive; and it was of very ill consequence to let the Infidels see armies of forty or fifty thousand men entering their territories in a hostile manner, and quitting them again in a few weeks^u. After his summer expedition was over, the king had a strong inclination to visit all the sea coast as far as Gibraltar, which he accordingly did, under the protection of a proper escorte. There, having a sight of the opposite continent of Africa, upon the invitation of the governor of Ceuta, he took a resolution of going thither, and that in a small vessel, and with a few attendants, which alarmed the principal persons about him exceedingly. The king, persisting in his own scheme, traversed the strait of Gibraltar, and, after a few days amusement at Ceuta, where the governor omitted nothing that could give him pleasure, he returned safely, though not without some difficulty and danger, to Tarifa; and there he was so unlucky as to hear that the bishop of Jaen, and the count of Castenada, being defeated in a battle against the Moors, were carried prisoners to Granada^v. Towards the close of the year, he sent the marquis de Villena to regulate with the chief justice of Arragon the disputes that still subsisted in reference to the commanderies of the order of St. James in that kingdom, which were to have been restored by virtue of the late treaty, and which, notwithstanding, remained in the hands of those to whom the king of Arragon had given them. The marquis, instead of executing this commission as he ought, took occasion from thence to enter into engagements of quite another kind. He suggested to the chief justice, Lanuza, that, very possibly, there might come a time when he might be as much persecuted in Castile as the grand master Don Alvaro; in which case he was desirous of being sure of the king of Arragon's protection: with this view he offered, and actually took, an oath of fidelity to that monarch, which was administered to him by the chief justice Lanuza: and

- ^a thus, without taking any care of his master's business, he returned to the court of Castile, very well satisfied with what he had done in his own². The whole country of Biscay being in commotion, through the disturbance excited by the factions of the Gamboas and the Otanex, the king found himself under the necessity of going thither: arriving at St. Sebastians, he embarked there on board a small vessel, that he might, with greater facility, examine the sea coast: and, having ordered several small castles to be demolished, as serving only for retreats to such as were disposed to trouble the peace of the country, visited most of the great towns, and quiered the whole province. He appointed Don Juan Hurtado de Mendoza, governor of Biscay, and prepared to return into *Castile*³. Before he could put this in execution, he received an unexpected account of a new confederacy, into which the arch-^{Confederacy a-}gainst him.
- ^b bishop of Toledo, the amirante, the count de Haro, the marquis de Santillan, the count de Alba, the count de Benavente, and several other noblemen had entered, in order to procure a reformation in the government. They represented to the king, that, through his indolence and inattention, the laws had lost their vigour, industry was almost every-where ceased; that, jealous of his nobility, he gave up a great part of his private life to persons unworthy of his conversation; that, from hence, the civil administration was contemned, his military expeditions had no effect, and, while he governed, as it were, at random, and without any system, things were every-where declining into ruin and confusion. The king was exceedingly chagrined at this news; but, by the advice of the archbishop of Seville and the marquis de Villena, he resolved to have an interview with the king of Navarre, in order to prevent
- ^c his giving any countenance to this new confederacy: they met accordingly on the frontiers, where it was agreed, that the Infant Don Alonso of Castile should espouse the Infanta of Navarre, and that the Infant Don Hernando, or Ferdinand, of Navarre, should espouse the Infanta Isabella of *Castile*². These points settled, the king went to Segovia, and, having acquainted the lords of the confederacy, that, after the campaign was over, he would call an assembly of the states, in which all the grievances they had enumerated should be redressed, he desired them not to impede the progress of the war, which was of so great consequence to religion and the public welfare. With this they seemed to have acquiesced, since the king took the field against the Moors with a great army, and yet there passed nothing of more importance than the year before; at length the king of Granada proposed to acknowledge
- ^d himself the vassal of Castile, and to pay a large annual tribute, to which Don Henry listened; but hostilities, notwithstanding, continued to the close of the year³. The rebellion of Don Alonso Fijardo in Murcia, which had broke out about seven years before, continued still to give the king a great deal of trouble, in consequence of the support which, from time to time, he received from the Moors. He laboured this year, by an embassy sent expressly for that purpose, to reconcile the French king Charles the seventh to his son the Dauphin, though without effect^b.

Don Alonso
Fijardo:
A. D. 1457²

HISTORIANS agree that it was not without foundation this monarch of Castile was suspected of impotence, notwithstanding which he had several mistresses, for the sake of one of which, of the noble family of Castro, he treated the queen extremely ill. The disorders of his family, though they might resemble, were by no means comparable to those in his government; for, knowing that he was hated by many, he suspected most of his nobility, and laboured to secure himself from the effects of their resentment by raising up new families, supposing that gratitude must naturally follow favours. With this view he made Michael Luc his secretary constable, and gave him several towns that belonged to the crown; which places, however, refused to acknowledge him for their lord. The mastership of Alcantara he bestowed on Gomez de Solis, a gentleman of good family indeed, but very poor. Don Juan de Valencuela he made grand prior of St. John, and Bernard de la Cueva master of his household^c. The deaths of the marquis of Santillan and of the count de Triveno were favourable to the king, as they proved the cause of some disputes amongst their relations.

^f The rebellion of Fijardo was entirely suppressed, and the war with the Moors carried on with various success, that is, with various losses to both nations. This year died Don Alonso king of Arragon and Naples, in the last-mentioned city, leaving all his dominions in Spain to his brother Don Juan king of Navarre, who became now a very potent, as he had been always a very active, prince^d. The former league amongst the nobility being in some measure broken, was again renewed, by the industry of the archbishop of Toledo; upon which the king surprized some of their places, and amongst the rest deprived the unfortunate house of Luna of the best part of their estates, though they had given him no sort of provocation. The marquis de Villena was sometimes in full possession of his master's favour, and at others under a cloud. His brother Don Pedro Giron, master of Calatrava, who had been a malecontent from the beginning of the king's reign, was, by his brother's interest, restored to the good graces of his sovereign, about the end of this year, or the beginning of the next^a.

THE confederate lords transmitted to the king, by the hands of Diego de Quinones, a memorial, in which they exhorted him to observe the laws of the kingdom, which he had sworn to at the time of his accession, and not to violate the liberties of the church, the nobility, or the people; to cause exact and impartial justice to be every-where administered; to dismiss the Moors that were about his court; to reform his household, to carry on the war against the king of Granada with effect, in virtue of the great supplies he had received; to cause the Infant Don Alonso and the Infanta Isabella to be educated in a manner suitable to their rank; and to declare the former his successor to the throne, since he had no posterity of his own. The king answered, that he would consult of those things with the lords of his council^b. Don Bernard de la Cueva was now become his principal favourite; and, being very desirous of making his fortune, he proposed to the marquis of Santillan that he should marry his youngest daughter, in which he prevailed. By restoring him to his estates, and giving the title of count to his son-in-law, Don Bertrand, he detached him from the confederacy: but what gave him the greatest uneasiness was, the knowledge he had that Don Juan king of Arragon and Navarre had deserted his alliance, and subscribed the confederacy; to shew his resentment for which, he entered into a secret negotiation with the prince Don Carlos, and offered him his sister the Infanta Donna Isabella, in breach of his former agreement with the king his father^c. The next year was a scene of strange confusions; Don Henry took the Catalans under his protection who had revolted from their sovereign, on behalf of the prince Don Carlos; he invaded Navarre, and took some places there, reconciled himself to most of the malecontents, and, to gratify them, made various alterations in his government; brought the Infant and Infanta to court; so that there was a seeming harmony beyond any thing that had appeared during his reign. There was, however, much deceit and falshood on both sides. The king trusted these great lords by force, and there was abundance of fraud in their service; for, in the midst of the war they carried on against the king of Arragon, they held a private correspondence with that prince, as did also the marquis of Villena, and some others of the favourites. By these intrigues a new treaty was made between the two crowns with such secrecy, that the prince Don Carlos could learn nothing of its contents; and this raising many suspicions in his mind, threw him into a fever which cost him his life^d.

Infant Don Carlos.

The queen is

In the beginning of the year the queen Donna Joanna of Castile was delivered of a daughter, styled the Infanta Donna Joanna, on account of which vast rejoicings were made^e. The king had treated her, during the course of her pregnancy, not only with the utmost tenderness, but with all possible marks of affection, and even of fondness, with a design to persuade his subjects that this was his daughter as well as the queen's; which, notwithstanding all the pains he could take, very few or none believed. However, she was solemnly baptized; the marquis of Armagnac, a French nobleman of the first rank, and ambassador from that crown, the marquis de Villena, and the Infanta Donna Isabella, being sponsors; the archbishop of Toledo performed the ceremony; and two months after the king caused her to be acknowledged heiress of the crown, the Infant Don Alonso and the Infanta Donna Isabella being the first who swore to the succession^f. Yet some of the nobility privately protested against this preposterous proceeding; and the whole nation was so thoroughly persuaded that the child was not the king's, but the daughter of Don Bertrand de la Cueva, that they bestowed upon her the surname of Bertraneja^g. The archbishop of Toledo, supported by the rest of the secret friends of the king of Arragon, prevailed upon the king Don Henry to make a tour to Alfaro, while the monarch before-mentioned was at Tudela, that, being so near each other, all the little points that were still unadjusted might be the sooner settled. But, while the king of Castile was thus employed, the queen, whom he had left at Aranda, miscarried, by an unlucky accident, of a son, upon which he went immediately away to comfort her, and sent the marquis de Villena to Saragossa in order to conclude and sign the treaty with the king of Arragon and Navarre, which he accordingly did. Upon his return to the court, then held at Madrid, he met with a very gracious reception from the king his master; notwithstanding which he could not help envying the credit of the count of Ledesma both with the king and queen^h. The war with the Moors was still continued, through the perfidious behaviour of the king of Granada; and as the king trusted the war

- a to his favourites, and supplied them abundantly, it was carried on in such a manner as drove the Infidels to the greatest distress, and at length excited a mutiny in the city of *Granada*ⁿ. The most glorious event, however, of the campaign, was the reduction of Gibraltar, with which the king was highly and justly pleased (G). Such, however, was the inconstancy of this prince's temper, that, notwithstanding the peace lately concluded with Arragon, he entered into new intrigues with the Catalans, who pretended to prove from an old genealogy that he was their legal master; and, upon his sending a body of troops to their assistance, they proclaimed him their sovereign on the thirteenth of November in the city of Barcelona^o; not out of affection to him, but to obtain assistance against the king of Arragon. Gibraltar reduced.
The king of Castile proclaimed sovereign of Catalonia.
A. D. 1462.
- b As the step which the king had taken, in relation to the principality of Catalonia, was altogether inconsistent with the notions of his favourites, they endeavoured to persuade him to refer all points in dispute to the arbitration of Lewis the eleventh king of France, which, by a piece of very dextrous management, they brought about^p. All things, however, had like to have been overturned again, by the arrival of fresh deputies from Catalonia, whose propositions the king would needs hear himself in council. They began with shewing, that, by several notorious breaches of the constitution, the king Don Juan had lost all right to the realms of Arragon and Valentia, to which he might form just pretensions, which most of the nobility would willingly support: and as to the principality of Catalonia, as the king, by his own consent, had been proclaimed their sovereign, they had the same claim to his protection as the rest of his subjects. In the council, however, the archbishop of Toledo
- c and the marquis of Villena alleged, that the Catalans were naturally a mutable, restless, and rebellious people, whom it was impossible to content; and that, besides, having referred all things to the decision of the king of France, nothing ought to be undertaken till that was known; in which, though against his own opinion, the king acquiesced^q. It was afterwards agreed, that the two monarchs of France and Spain should have an interview on the frontiers, and that, in the mean time, hostilities should cease between the crowns of Arragon and Castile. It was not long after that the French monarch, as umpire of the disputes between the two crowns, made his award to this effect; That the king of Castile should quit all pretensions to the sovereignty of Catalonia, and withdraw his troops immediately out of Arragon and Navarre; and, on the other hand, that the king Don Juan should yield to his cousin
- d of Castile the town of Estella, with all its dependencies, and pay him likewise the sum of fifty thousand florins in gold, for the expences of the war: it was also settled that the queen of Arragon should remain as a hostage in the hands of the archbishop of Toledo, till this sentence should be complied with in all points^r. The king of Castile had afterwards an interview with Lewis the eleventh on the river of Bidassoa, which was very short, but they

(G) The recovery of this important fortress was so much the more acceptable, as it was altogether singular and unexpected, since these were times in which it was infinitely more probable that the Christians should lose than that they should gain any thing from the Mohammedans (1). It happened in this manner: there dwelt in the town of Gibraltar a Moor, whose name was Ali el Zurro, who was desirous of becoming a Christian. With this view he retired to Tarifa, and disclosed his sentiments in that respect to Alonso de Arcos, who was then alcaide, and who, approving his design, caused him to be baptized by the name of Diego Zurro. He then told him that it would be no difficult matter for the Christians to recover the place from which he came, since, upon the breaking out of a civil war at Granada, the whole garrison was marched thither to support one of the competitors to the crown. Don Alonso was too well acquainted with the Moors to give hasty credit to such a piece of intelligence; he sent therefore a detachment of eighty horse and one hundred and fifty foot, with orders to seize some of the inhabitants, which they executed, and from them he understood, that Diego had told him no more than the truth: upon this he assembled some troops belonging to the count d'Arcos, the duke of Medina Sidonia, and of the governors of the adjacent places, with which he invested Gibraltar very unexpectedly.

The inhabitants, however, made a very gallant defence; insomuch, that many were inclined to raise the siege; but Diego Zurro exerted himself in such a manner, and solicited with such vehemency, that they remained before the place. They were daily joined by fresh troops; and Don Rodrigo, the son of the count d'Arcos, actually possessed himself of a great part of the town, and might have had the rest by capitulation, if the duke of Medina Sidonia had not sent to desire that he might have a share in the glory. He arrived accordingly with his forces, and the very same night entered into a private treaty with the Moors, who delivered up the place to him the next day. This sinister behaviour produced a feud between the families of Medina Sidonia and Arcos, which lasted many years, and cost a great deal of blood (2). The king was no sooner acquainted with this unexpected piece of good fortune, than he named Don Pedro de Porras governor of the place, and ordered the duke of Medina Sidonia to put it into his hands under the severest penalties, which he immediately obeyed. As a farther proof of his satisfaction, he ordered the title of king of Gibraltar to be added to his titles; following therein the example of Abu Malic, a Moorish monarch, who had done the same thing long before (3).

parted with a thorough hatred and contempt of each other; the king of Castile having about a him a great number of his favourites, but particularly the count of Ledesma, most richly dressed, and, in a manner, covered with jewels: whereas the duke of Burgundy, the marshal (there was then but one) and the admiral of France, in compliance with the king's humour, were very modestly dressed, and Lewis himself so plain, that it was impossible, by any exterior mark, to know the king¹. Don Henry of Castile and Don Juan of Arragon were equally dissatisfied with his sentence. The former had lost much, the latter was to lose something, and the humour of kings is to part with nothing. The king of Arragon hoped to effect this by chicane; for, instead of delivering up Estella, he put a strong garrison into it, and, on the complaint of the marquis of Villena, threw the fault upon the states of Navarre, declaring that he would take no umbrage at seeing the place reduced by force. In a little time b a new negotiation was set on foot; and the marquis, after having brought the king his master into Navarre, with so poor an army that he was able to do nothing, accepted a few inconsiderable places as an equivalent for Estella; upon notice of which the archbishop of Toledo released the queen of Arragon, as if the treaty had been fully executed². By this the king of Castile's eyes were opened, and he not only refused to approve of this convention, but dismissed the prelate from his councils, and threatened the marquis with his resentment. In the autumn the king marched with a numerous army against the Moors; but, being on the frontiers of the kingdom of Granada, that monarch sent his tribute, and very rich presents besides; upon which the king dismissed his troops, and went to pass his Christmas at *Seville*³.

A. D. 1463.

Another powerful league formed against the king of Castile, by the archbishop of Toledo and divers noblemen.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the king, for his amusement, made a tour to Gibraltar, the recovery of which he considered as the great glory of his reign. On his arrival there, he heard that the king of Portugal was at Ceuta, upon which he sent him a civil invitation to come to Gibraltar, which was accepted: but while he was employed in concerting some schemes with that prince, to whom he promised his sister Isabella, and renewing the truce with the Moors, things had taken a very wrong turn in *Castile*⁴. The archbishop of Toledo and the marquis of Villena, finding that they were totally shut out of the government, resolved once more to put themselves at the head of a confederacy, in which the amirante, the counts of Placentia, Benavente, Paredes, Mirande, and Offorne, the archbishop of Compostella, the grand masters of Calatrava and Alcantara, very readily entered; so that this league became more formidable than any that had been hitherto made⁵. The king being d informed of this by the queen, resolved to return, without delay, into Castile, where he found the great affair of the peace of Arragon set upon an equitable foundation, through the fear that the archbishop, the marquis, and even the king of Arragon himself, were under, that their contrivances should reach the ear of Lewis the eleventh, who, in that case, would not fail to enter Arragon: the king, therefore, seeing no reason to refuse it, ratified the peace, not without hopes that this might pacify the malecontents: he carried the queen also to an interview with the Portuguese monarch at Guadaloupe, where he again promised him his sister Donna Isabella, and really meant to keep his word; but, when he mentioned it to the Infanta, she shewed no inclination to become queen of Portugal, but pretended that a princess of Castile could not marry without leave of the states, to whom, therefore, the king e engaged to propose it⁶. As he persuaded himself that he had still a great influence over the marquis of Villena, he had a mind to confer with him, in hopes of dissipating the league; to which, after hostages given, the marquis consented, as having an inclination to detach the archbishop of Seville, the most able man the king had about him, and to bring him over to the malecontents. At this conference, therefore, he told the king, that the archbishop was the principal object of his own apprehensions, and of those of his associates; and that, if he would arrest and keep him confined, he made no question of bringing all the lords back to his service. The king very readily consented; and the marquis no sooner left him, than he sent a domestic to inform the archbishop of the danger he was in; upon which that prelate, knowing no other way to be safe, went immediately to the count of Placentia, one of the f league, and to whom he had been the greatest enemy, to demand his protection⁷. The count received him with open arms; the detachment of the king's guard, sent to secure him, returned without their prisoner; and thus the marquis of Villena, not satisfied with betraying the king, contrived to make him an instrument in betraying himself⁸. The success attending this enterprize, encouraged him to form one still more extraordinary; and this was to surprize

a the king at Madrid, to deliver the Infant and Infanta out of his custody, and to bring away the count of Ledesma; but, though it was well laid and well conducted, this scheme miscarried, and the king threatened him with the utmost weight of his resentment^b. This did not deter him from a bolder enterprize than the last: he prevailed upon Donna Maria de Padilla, the wife of Ferdinand Carillo, who lay in the room contiguous to their majesties bed-chamber, to admit his adherents in the night; and, by this means, he hoped to secure the persons both of the king and queen; in which, also, he very narrowly failed^c. After all this, he engaged the king to promise an interview with some of the malecontents, to which, as he was on the road, he had intelligence of their having assembled a great force in order to seize him and those who were about him, upon which he thought proper to retire; b which, if he had not done with great precipitation, would have been to no purpose^d. To shew in a particular manner how much he was piqued at the marquis, he with great solemnity invested Don Bertrand de la Cueva grand master of the order of St. James, which he knew was the principal object of the other's ambition^e. The king of Aragon and Navarre having entered into the league, the confederates held a general assembly at Burgos, where, upon the twenty-ninth of September, they subscribed an instrument, comprehending the reasons of their revolt, and their plan of regulating public affairs, to which they not only subscribed, but solemnly swore to adhere inviolably to each other, till every point of it was accomplished; and this league they caused to be transmitted to Rome, to prevent the king's obtaining any bulls from pope Paul the second against them^f. In the mean time, the king c being informed that one of the principal points of the confederacy turned upon his impotency, and compelling the nobility to swear to a supposititious child, he pretended to establish his capacity by judicial proofs, and the testimony of his physician, which served only to lessen and debase his character. Yet, before the end of the year, without the participation of his council, he ventured upon another private interview with the marquis of Villena, at which he concluded an agreement with the malecontents, upon the following terms; that he should deliver the Infant Don Alonso to the marquis, and acknowledge him for his heir and successor; that Don Bertrand de la Cueva should renounce the grand mastership of St. James, and the pope he desired to confer it, by a bull, upon the Infant Don Alonso, agreeable to his father's will; that the regulation of public affairs in general should be left to four lords, d two of which should be named by the king, and two by the league, and, if they could not agree, the judgment of Alonso de Oropeza, prior of the order of St. Jerom, was to be decisive: for the due performance of all which Don Bertrand de la Cueva was to constitute himself prisoner in the fortress of Portillo, under the care of Gonsalez de Sabavedra, and the count de Benavente was to do the like in the fortress of Mucientes, in the hands of count of St. Martha, by which the king hoped to secure his own quiet and that of his subjects^g. A. D. 1464.

WHEN the contents of this convention were known, several of the king's faithful subjects laboured to shew him how much he had been deceived, and that the sole aim of the confederates was to get the Infant Don Alonso into their hands, with a design to place him at their head, and perhaps to make him king. This alarmed Don Henry extremely; but his e secretary Don Alvaro Gomez, who was the creature of the marquis de Villena, terrified him so much with the thoughts of reviving all past disturbances, if he did not execute punctually every article of his treaty, that he no sooner understood the marquis of Villena was come to Sepulveda to receive the Infant, than he carried him thither, and put him into his hands^h. He afterwards repaired to Cabazon, where he gave audience to all the confederates in a body, and after each of them had kissed his hand, Don Alonso was declared his successor to his dominions, and promised to espouse Donna *Joanna*ⁱ. Don Bertrand count of Ledesma, being present, they summoned him to resign the grand mastership of St. James, the most honourable and most beneficial office in the kingdom. I will do it, answered Don Bertrand de la Cueva, with much greater pleasure than I received it, because it is to render a service to that most gracious monarch, to whose favour I owe that and all that I have, and am glad of affording a f testimony to his subjects, that he has raised at least one man of fidelity and merit. This answer astonished the whole league, and made the marquis of Villena blush^k. The king rewarded him bountifully, gave him the town of Albuquerque, with the title of duke, four other lordships, with a pension of three million and a half of marvadies^l. They proceeded next to name commissioners; the king chose Don Pedro de Velasco, eldest son to the count de Haro, and Gonzalez de Sabavedra; and the league appointed the count of Placentia and the marquis de Villena. The marquis in a little time corrupted the king's commissioners, so that he carried every thing at his pleasure, and without being obliged to consult Alonso de Oropesa, a person of incorruptible integrity, whom the confederates named for umpire, merely to give a lustre to their cause^m. The king having discovered the defection of his commissioners, and the treachery of his secretary, the marquis de Villena had recourse to a new artifice; he prevailed upon the archbishop of Toledo, and the amirante, to make shew of quitting the confederacy, and going over to the king. Don Henry received them so graciously, and trusted them so entirely, that they began to be in earnest on his side, when the marchioness of Villena came to Madrid, and, by her arts, recovered them to the league; and, which was more extraordinary, persuaded the king that her husband was still loyal in his heart, and would take an opportunity of doing his majesty good serviceⁿ. By the advice of the archbishop of Toledo and the amirante, the king annulled all that had been done by the commissioners, summoned the confederates to restore to him his brother, and threatened to declare them traitors if they did not. Upon this they called a general assembly at Placentia, and soon after another at Seville, where it was publicly debated, whether they should depose the king, and advance the Infant Don Alonso to the throne? The agent of the archbishop of Toledo argued warmly for the affirmative, which was as warmly opposed by the marquis de Villena; but at length, after taking the opinion of some lawyers, they agreed that the king should be deposed^o. The king was at this time preparing to reduce Salamanca, and the count of Alba de Tormes was the first nobleman in Spain who declared for him. The archbishop of Toledo and the amirante attended him upon this occasion; and, by their advice, he resolved next to besiege Arevalo, upon which they took their leaves, and promised to repair thither with their forces, receiving each of them money from the king for that purpose. The king waited for them long, and sent to them often; at length the prelate sent him word not to tire him with any more messages, for that he would quickly let him see who was the true king of Castile; and, at the same time, the amirante seized Valladolid, and declared for the Infant Don Alonso^p. The king, amazed at this behaviour, retired sorrowfully to Salamanca, and had sunk under his misfortunes, but for the prudent counsels of his sister Donna Isabella. As for the confederates they went roundly to work, and having deposed the king Don Henry, with great solemnity (H), they declared the Infant Don Alonso king, and raised an army to make him so^q. The archbishop of Toledo, who had the best head and the worst heart in the whole assembly, proposed marching, without loss of time, to crush the king at Salamanca, which he shewed them plainly might be done both safely and speedily. The marquis de Villena raised many difficulties, and in the end diverted that motion. At the same time he gave notice to the king to be upon his guard^r. His sole view was to keep

(H) There is not any event in the Spanish, or to say the truth, in any other history, the record of any transaction more extraordinary or more extravagant than this; the malecontents caused a theatre of vast extent, in the great plain that lies on one side of the town of Avila, to be erected, so that all the multitudes resorting thither might see and hear every thing that was said or done (4); upon this a magnificent throne was placed, upon which was seated the figure of the king Don Henry, with the crown upon his head, the sceptre in his hand, the sword by his side, the royal robe on his shoulders; and, in a word, with every other ensign of majesty then in use. A herald then mounted the theatre, and read with a loud voice, a declaration, containing the motives which appeared to them sufficient for deposing and depriving him of the royal dignity. At the same time that he began to read, the archbishop of Toledo, the marquis of Villena, the count de Placentia, the grand master of Alcantara, the counts of Benavente and Paredas, went up to the figure, and as he read, the archbishop took off the crown, the marquis de Villena took away the sceptre, the grand master pulled off the sword, and the other three stripped away the rest of the ornaments; after which they kicked the figure away from the throne with their feet, adding the most abusive and insulting language to these actions, which the populace beheld in profound silence, except that here and there some burst into tears (5). Then the Infant Alonso mounted the theatre, and being carried on the shoulders of those who were present, was at length seated on the throne; after which, all the prelates, noblemen, and persons of rank and property, who were present, did homage to him, and the trumpets sounding, the standards were displayed in his name; those who assisted in this strange scene crying, according to the custom of those times, "Castile! Castile! Long live the king Don Alonso of Castile, Leon, &c." (6). Besides those who were actually concerned in this act of deposition, the amirante, the grand master of Calatrava, the counts of Luna, Castro, Castaneda, Ossorno, St. Martha, and many others, concurred in approving and applauding this subversion of the constitution, and pretended to own for their king a child hurried about by a faction, who assumed a power of deposing their king for those acts of prodigality, to which they were indebted for their titles and splendour (7).

- a the world in storm, as not knowing how to steer in calm weather. The confederates marched with their forces, and besieged Simencas. The king was, for once, the better for marquis's advice, and wrote to the nobility in pressing terms to come to his assistance. The count Alba de Tormes was again the first, the duke de Albuquerque, the count de Trastamara, the marquis de Santillan, the count de Medina Cæli, soon after joined him. By this time, the archbishop of Toledo began to grow jealous of the marquis de Villena; but that subtle politician had the address to deceive him again into a better opinion of him than ever. He feigned himself indisposed, grew in a few days dangerously ill, and having received those spiritual comforts that are only given at the point of death, he made a will, by which he recommended his widow and children to the care, and left all his estates to the direction, of the
- b archbishop, who, being thoroughly convinced by this of his friendship, rejoiced very sincerely at his recovery*. This prelate having taken several places in person, repaired with all his forces to Simencas, to the relief of which the king advanced, with an army so much superior to the malecontents, that they retired with some precipitation, and if the king had pursued them, and prosecuted the war with vigour, he might have reduced them and reigned the rest of his days in peace; but, by a most unaccountable fit of credulity, he consented to an interview with the marquis de Villena, who engaged him to consent to a suspension of arms, and to dismiss his forces, which he accordingly did, after paying them punctually, and assuring them that he would reward them for their services, as he afterwards did very liberally, bestowing Carpio and some other places on the count of Alba; Astorga, with the
- c title of marquis, on the count of Trastamara; Agreda and its territory he gave to the count of Medina Cæli; and the county of Gijon, with the title of duke to the count of Valentia: neither was he unmindful or ungrateful with regard to persons of less distinction. This year died Ishmael, king of Granada, and was succeeded by his son Albohacen, a prince of a generous and martial spirit".
- d In the beginning of the year, the archbishop of Toledo sent some of the clergy, who were his creatures, to Rome, in order to persuade the pope, that himself and his partizans had done nothing amiss in solemnly deposing their king; but, on the other side, the king sent the dean of Salamanca thither, to espouse his cause; which he did so effectually, that the pope would give no countenance to the rebels in Spain". The city of Valladolid declared for the king, who, though he had been so often betrayed by him, would have gone from thence to meet the marquis of Villena, if he had not been withheld by the nobility about him". The king, however, received the archbishop of Seville, who came from him, and listened to one of the strangest projects that was ever devised. He proposed that Don Pedro Giron, grand master of Calatrava, and brother to the marquis de Villena, should marry the Infanta Donna Isabella; upon which the archbishop of Toledo, the grand master, the marquis, and all their dependants, would become once more good subjects, give the king a large sum in ready money, and sacrifice the Infant Don Alonso; but all this the king was desired to keep a profound secret, and in the mean time to dismiss from the court the bishop of Calaborra, and the duke of Albuquerque, who they knew were men not to be imposed upon by such artifices. The king consented to all this, the bishop and the duke retired, the grand master resigned his dignity to his third son, and the most pompous preparations were made for the wedding, though the Infanta declared from the beginning that she would never give her consent. But when all things were ready, and the king disposed to force his sister, Don Pedro fell sick upon the road of a fever, and died in a few days". The archbishop and the marquis returned immediately to the party of the Infant Don Alonso, who received them very graciously, because he was afraid of them. The rest of the year was spent in war, without any other effect than that of ruining and destroying the people, and in treaties that came to nothing, through the artifices of the marquis de Villena, notwithstanding all the pains the pope's legate could take, which rendered the marquis as odious to the malecontents, as he ought to have been to the king, who, notwithstanding, could never divest himself of that affection for him, which he so little deserved".

THE weakness of this prince was such, that even his best as well as his worst subjects, were driven into rebellion. The archbishop of Seville, in the beginning of this year, had prevailed upon him to go and confer with the malecontents at Bejar, where a scheme was laid to seize his person. All representations to prevent this false step were to no purpose; so that the inhabitants of Madrid were forced to take up arms to keep the king in his palace, from whence, when he had laid aside all thoughts of going to Bejar, he proceeded to Segovia". Battle of Medina del Campo.

mean while, the infant Don Alonso went to Toledo, where some commotions had happened in favour of the king, where he was joyfully received, publicly proclaimed, and treated with all royal honours^b. The king, perceiving that the rebels were reducing one place after another, and that many of the nobility grew cold in their affections for his service, resolved, while he had yet sufficient strength, to put the issue of things to a battle, and accordingly advanced for the relief of Medina del Campo. The rebels resolved to wait for him there: when the two armies were very near, the archbishop of Toledo sent to give the duke of Albuquerque notice that forty persons had sworn not to suffer him to return alive, if he appeared in the field; and therefore advised him to take care of himself. The duke, suspecting the truth of this intelligence, invited a soldier of the enemy's advanced guard to come and speak with him, and sent him a passport; the man came accordingly, and being asked if this intelligence was true, he assured him it was, and that every body knew it in the camp: why then, says the duke, tell those forty men that I shall be in the field to-morrow, armed in such a manner, and with a scarf of such a colour, and dismissed him with a reward^c. This action happened on the 20th of August; the Infant Don Alonso was there, in person, having the archbishop of Toledo by his side, who wore over his robe a crimson scarf, embroidered with white crosses. The king, at the instance of the constable of Navarre, retired, with thirty horse, to a place at some distance; his army consisted of eight hundred lances, seven hundred light horse, and two thousand foot; that of the rebels was of much the same strength; the engagement began in the afternoon, and did not end but with the light. It was far from being decisive, though there might be about five hundred men slain on both sides, the king ordered his standard to remain in his camp, being unwilling to display it against his people, and by that accident it was taken. Both sides claimed and made rejoicings for their victory, which belonged to neither^d. The town of Segovia was shortly after betrayed to the Infant, who by that means got his sister, the Infanta Isabella, into his custody, but the Alcazar, in which were the king's treasures, was preserved^e. The king, notwithstanding this, was prevailed upon to go thither, to confer with the malecontents, to whom he spoke better than his friends expected. He told them he would say little either of or for himself; he could not govern so great a country, but by his ministers and magistrates; that these he had often changed; and notwithstanding, had been generally abused; if they knew where to find him better, he was willing to employ them. But what he had chiefly at heart, and what he wished at theirs, was the misery and distress of the poor people, the innocent victims of their passions and follies. He said it was plain that he was not accountable for this, either to God or man, as they had left him no power to protect them; but, forgetting what was passed, if they would yet take measures to make his subjects happy, and restore him to his authority, he would exert it for that purpose. They promised to consider of the matter, and the king delivered his queen into the hands of the archbishop of Seville, as a hostage for his making good his promises. The true design of this conference, was to cheat the king out of the Alcazar, which they could not so easily reduce, and to engage him to confirm to the marquis of Villena the grand mastership of St. James, which he had obliged the Infant Don Alonso to resign in his favour. This he very willingly did; and in return, the marquis hindered any peace from being made, to which most of the lords of his party were inclined, and for which the bishop of Leon, the pope's legate, after severe reproaches, excommunicated them all^f.

Death of the Infant Don Alonso.

As the rebels found themselves not a little hurt by these ecclesiastical censures, they sent two of their party to Rome, to make an apology to the pope, from whom they received a very bad reception, who told them they were rebels to their king, and tyrants to their fellow subjects, bidding them go home, and pacify these troubles; and, as the Spanish historians say, telling them, if they did not, God would speedily call the Infant, whose name they abused, and who was no more than an image in their hands, to another life, and leave them to answer for their own offences^g. While they were thus employed, the king Don Henry went in person to assist in the execution of an enterprize for the recovery of Toledo, in which he narrowly escaped with his life; for tho' his party received him privately into the city, yet the populace no sooner understood that he was in the cathedral church, than they attacked it with the utmost fury, and it was with great hazard that he escaped. A few days after, the populace changed their minds, and, by the help of a little persuasion, drove out the partizans of the royal Infant, and invited the king back, who went thither, and was received with the loudest acclamations by those who, but a little before, had thrust him out of the same place^h. The Infant Don

- a Alonso was then at Arevalo; and his party being astonished at the news, thought it proper that he should go to Avila. On the road he dined with his sister at Cardenosa, and retiring afterwards to sleep, was, in the space of an hour, found dead upon his bed, or at least senseless and dying¹. This happened on the 5th of July, when that prince was about fifteen (I). The archbishop of Toledo, and the grand master of St. James, conducted the Infanta Donna Isabella to Avila, where, at the desire of the party, the archbishop began to dispose her to take the title of queen, to which she answered very modestly, that she was much obliged to them for their good affections, but that the crown of Castile did not belong to them to bestow, but was held from God by the laws. Yet, if they would interpose with the king, her brother, that she might be declared the presumptive heir of the crown, which she took to be her right, she would be thankful; neither was she moved from this resolution, when she heard that at Seville and several other places they had proclaimed her². The archbishop acquiesced, and in a short time the accommodation was made. On the 19th of September, the king, and his sister the Infanta, met the pope's legate, released the lords from the oaths they had taken to the princess Joanna; after which they swore to the succession of the Infanta Isabella; and the king, at the same time, undertook to send the queen and her daughter into *Portugal*³. The marquis de Castellan, who had served the king with great fidelity, thinking those services less considered than they ought to have been, and having Donna Joanna confided to his care, solicited the queen to come to him; also promising at all times, and at all events, to defend her, and to support her daughter's title; the queen joyfully accepted this offer, and, at the hazard of her life, made her escape from the archbishop of Seville. Being let down by cords out of the window of her apartment in the castle of Alaejos, she mounted behind Don Lewis Huriado, and retired to the marquis⁴. Yet some writers say, that she found a gallant there, and that this gallant was the archbishop's nephew, which others treat as a calumny. The states were ordered to assemble at Ocana, but there were very few of the deputies came thither; and the king believing his affairs to be in a better situation than they had been, did not treat with much complaisance those that did come; so that the assembly was quickly prorogued to the next year⁵. The marriage of the presumptive successor was now the great point in view, upon which it was very evident that the security of the crown and the happiness of the people must, in a great measure, depend; the old king of Arragon, Don Juan, never lost sight of his first purpose of procuring that princess for his son the Infant Don Ferdinand; and, the better to qualify him for so great a match, he gave him the title of king of Sicily, which island was then a part of his dominions⁶. In order to bring this important design to bear, he sent his agents into Castile, with instructions to apply themselves to his old friend the archbishop of Toledo, to his father-in-law the amirante, to the counts of Medina Celi, Triveno, and other great lords. At the head of these agents was the constable of Navarre; and, besides

(I) Amongst all the obscure passages in the history of these distracted times, there is none darker than the death of the Infant Don Alonso: an author, indeed, who wrote expressly the history of his reign, as he was pleased to call it, does not hesitate in the least in declaring that he was poisoned by eating a trout, that made part of his dinner; and with the like freedom he tells us, that the author of this execrable action was the marquis of Villena (1). Mariana seems to doubt the truth of this, but he assigns no better reason than this, that it is hard to conceive how a nobleman, like him, could be guilty of so base an action (2); and, perhaps, the reader will wonder how he could conceive this objection, after having enumerated so many base actions that this unworthy nobleman had done. Other writers incline to think he died of poison, without fixing the blame any where (3). Some have ascribed his death to a stroke of the apoplexy; and others allege that he died of the plague (4). In what manner or by whose hands he received his death, must therefore remain, in some measure, undecided. In two points the Spanish historians agree, though no inference can be drawn from it; the first is, that his death was predicted by pope Paul the second; the other that he expired within a few miles of the place where the theatre had been erected for his brother's deposition, and for his own election (5). He was a youth of very pregnant parts, and had given some instances of firmness, and a love for justice, which could not be very acceptable to some about him, who might possibly apprehend that the time was approaching, when, from being treated and called, he might think and act like a king (6). The setting up therefore of the Infanta Donna Isabella would have answered their purposes as well; without exposing them for the present to the like fears (7). But she very prudently declined it; and, as some writers say, alleged the death of her brother; as the reasons of her declining it; intimating, that Providence did not seem to favour these kind of counsels, and that, though she wished to preserve her own rights, she was by no means inclined to invade those of her brother, but would repose herself on Providence, and contentedly wait the disposition of things, without creating any discord or disturbance.

excellent instructions how to manage the affair, they had blanks filled with promises, with the king's signature and seal, to be addressed to such persons as they should find it necessary to gain, and what was like, perhaps, to go farther than all their instructions and credentials, they had a very large sum in ready money, with full powers to dispose of it as they thought fit^p. The constable of Navarre found, on his arrival at the court of Castile, the archbishop of Toledo perfectly well inclined to the business; and, by his and the amirante's assistance, many of the chief nobility were gained; and the gold, and the king's letters, being properly distributed amongst the Infanta's domestics, brought them to prefer the king of Sicily to all the princes upon earth^q. The grand master, now in more favour with the king than ever, was exceedingly disturbed at this, and engaged many of the old malecontents, more especially such as had been enriched by the forfeitures of the house of Arragon, to concur with him in opposing a marriage so prejudicial to their interest. To augment the strength of this party he devised a new intrigue, which indeed was his great talent; for he struck in with the marquis de Santillan, and proposed to the king, with his consent, that Donna Isabella, his sister, should be given in marriage to the king of Portugal, and Donna Joanna, whom he owned for his daughter, to the Infant of Portugal. With this scheme the poor king was highly pleased, and assured them of his concurrence^r. The grand master founded next the archbishop of Toledo; but that prelate gave him a very round answer; he said, his ambition and his artifices had already cost his country too dear; that for himself he was confident that he was now on the right side, from which nothing should ever move him to depart. The monarch of Portugal, at the request of Don Henry and his ministers, sent the archbishop of Lisbon to demand the Infanta Isabella, who very decently, but at the same time very peremptorily, refused her consent^s. The grand master, who foresaw this, had provided another match, and procured a French ambassador soon afterwards to make the like demand, in favour of the duke of Berry, the king's brother; but he also met with a refusal, which, though very civilly expressed, he bore but very impatiently^t. The grand master directed his bosom friend, the archbishop of Seville, to post several bodies of troops in such a manner about Madrigal, where the Infanta Isabella then was, that she found herself in a manner imprisoned; but the archbishop of Toledo and the amirante quickly delivered her, and carried her to Valladolid. She had not been long there before the archbishop of Toledo and the lords of his party determined, that it was fittest for her safety and theirs to conclude and solemnize this marriage without delay. Don Ferdinand had notice of this, having first signed such articles of marriage as that prelate had drawn (K), set out pri-

(K) These articles, to the punctual performance of which the king Don Ferdinand was sworn, in the presence of Don Gomez Manrique, who was sent into Arragon for that purpose, were in substance as follows: 1. He shall always acknowledge the pope for head of the church, and maintain all the ecclesiastical immunities. 2. He shall have all possible respect for the king Don Henry, his brother-in-law, and shall permit him to reign in perfect tranquillity, conforming himself in all things to the accommodation that was made when he acknowledged that princess for his heir. 3. He shall administer justice impartially, and shall not infringe, in any respect, the laws, usages, prerogatives, and privileges, of any of the cities, towns, places, or persons, in his dominions, agreeable to the oath taken by the kings of Castile at their accession. 4. He shall not alienate any town, place, or fortress, without the consent of the princess. 5. That all the royal orders shall be signed by them jointly, and that he shall not put into the council, government, or any other offices of state, any but natives of Castile. 6. That all dignities, ecclesiastical and civil, shall be at the nomination of the princess. 7. That he shall grant a general amnesty, with respect to all things that may have happened in the former civil wars, and shall never set up any claim or pretensions to those lands and estates, which his father possessed in Castile, and which have been given away by the crown, and are in the hands of several of the nobility. 8. That the archbishops of Toledo and Seville, and the grand master of St. James, shall ever enjoy their ranks and pre-eminencies in the government of the monarchy, as shall also all the other lords and knights who have steadily adhered to the princess's party, and have contributed to secure to her the succession of the crown. 9. That the king Don Ferdinand shall come and reside in the dominions of Castile, and shall make war against the Moors as soon as it is in his power, but otherwise shall not take up arms against any, without the consent of his consort; in case, however, that any civil war should break out in Castile, he shall furnish, as long as it lasts, a thousand lances from Arragon, to remain, during that space, in the pay of that crown. 10. That, over and above the sum of one hundred thousand florins of gold, the princess shall have and enjoy the towns of Borja, Magalon, Elcha, and Cervellen, in the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia; and Siracuse and Catanea, in the kingdom of Sicily (1). It is true that Mariana omits some of these articles, and interprets others in a stricter sense, so as to leave the king no other share in the government than his consort should be inclined to allow him (2); but our readers will hereafter learn upon what motives we have preferred the authority of the Arragonian writers. As they stand here, they sufficiently shew the prudence and public spirit of the prelate by whom they were drawn and it must give every man of conscience and honour no small uneasiness, to reflect, that, with so great parts, and with such a perfect knowledge of the constitution of his country, this great prelate was frequently led by his passions and private views to act with the utmost violence against his principles; so that it may be truly said, there was hardly any good or any hurt done in his country in his time, of which he was not the author, or in which he was not an actor (3).

^a vately for Castile, and being safely conducted to Valladolid, secretly espoused and afterwards publicly married the Infanta, in the cathedral of that city, on the 25th of October^u. The A. D. 1469. king was extremely offended at the news; and though, upon the receiving a letter from the princess at Truxillo, he seemed to be in a better temper, yet he gave no answer to it; but pursued his secret intrigues for altering the succession in favour of Donna Joanna, according to the advice of the grand master and his adherents, who, for the present, were wonderfully attached to that princess^w.

ALL imaginable pains were taken by the archbishop of Toledo and the amirante, as well as by Don Ferdinand and the Infanta Isabella, to dispose the king in their favour, but he remained absolutely silent; and if at any time he gave an answer, it was, that he would consult the grand master of St. James, and other great lords. This favourite, in the mean time, was labouring and endeavouring to procure an embassy from the French monarch, to demand Donna Joanna for the duke of Berry, whom the Infanta Isabella had rejected, which at length he obtained; and the person sent upon this occasion was cardinal Albi, the same who had shewn himself so much piqued upon the former occasion. While the two courts were thus employed, there was a civil war carrying on in almost every province in the kingdom; in some, between such as adhered to the king, against those who were attached to the king of Sicily and the Infanta; in others between noblemen, who, setting the laws at defiance, decided the quarrels that arose between them by open force, and, in some popular factions, raised disturbances in almost every great town; so that peace was scarce any-where to be found. The king Don Henry was extremely pleased upon the arrival of the French ambassador, paid him all the honours, and laboured to give him all the satisfaction imaginable; he also issued an edict, annulling all that he had said or sworn upon the treaty of accommodation with the Infanta Isabella, declaring the right of succession to be, as it always was, in the Infanta Joanna, his and the queen's lawful daughter^x. The French cardinal, however, expected farther proofs; which the king resolved to give: accordingly on a day fixed, and which was the 20th of October, the king held a great assembly in the plain of Lozoia, to which, by his command, the marquis of Santillan brought the queen and her daughter: there the edict was publicly read in the king's presence; and all who were there took their oaths to the Infanta Donna Joanna; except the marquis de Santillan and his family, who excused themselves, by saying they had taken that oath before; the cardinal then insisted that the queen should swear, as she did, that the princess was the issue of her body by the king; the king likewise swore, that he verily believed her to be his own daughter; after which the count of Boulogne espoused her, with great solemnity, in the name of the French prince^y. The king, as soon as this ceremony was over, issued his letters to all the towns in the kingdom, to inform them of this great event; and, on the other hand, Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella emitted a manifesto, setting forth and insisting upon their rights, which they required all the people in the kingdoms of Castile, Leon, Toledo, &c. to maintain and defend, which only served to increase those disorders, by which these unhappy countries were but too much distracted and distressed^z. The king Don Henry having procured two briefs from the pope, one against the bishop of Segovia, and the other against the archbishop of Toledo, caused them to be signified to both these prelates. This had some effect upon the former, but none at all upon the latter; who, on the contrary, wrote to the king, as he had often done before, that his misfortunes were the effects of his credulity and irresolution; that he (the bishop) had nothing in view but the general good of his subjects; and that he would do well to think of his own oath, and the concessions he had made in the treaty of pacification^a. Don Henry, in the fury of his resentment, sent for four canons of the church of Toledo, pursuant to the pope's brief; and, having admitted them into his privy council, formed a process against the archbishop for high treason. The grand master of St. James, however, interposed, in behalf of his uncle the archbishop, and advised his master to have recourse to milder measures. An offer was thereupon made ^b him of an immense sum of money, large grants in favour of his church, and still greater to his two sons; but all without effect: that prelate giving for answer, that as he was at length on the right side he would remain there, and stand or fall with it, let the pope or the king do what they please^b. As a proof that he was in earnest, he seized three of the four canons in their return to Toledo; but the king making reprisals upon some of his domestics, they were at length discharged. The disturbances throughout the kingdom rather increased than diminished; and, to heighten the miseries of the people, the Moors, with impunity, made an irruption into and plundered the frontiers^c. Towards the close of the year, the king, attended by the grand master, had an interview with the king of Portugal, to whom he offered the Infanta Donna Joanna; but that monarch looked upon things to be then in so unsettled a state, that he declined the proposition; and the king Don Henry and his favourite retired exceedingly dissatisfied ^a.

A scheme set on foot for marrying the Infanta Joanna to Don Henry of Arragon.

THE grand master was seldom at a loss for expedients; and tho' his address had failed him upon this occasion, yet he quickly devised a new scheme, more plausible and more likely to be attended with success than the former. This new contrivance was to bring about a marriage between Don Henry of Arragon, son to the Infant Don Henry; who had formerly created so many and great disturbances in Castile, and the Infanta Donna Joanna, whom the king acknowledged. His master approved this expedient exceedingly, assured him of his full consent, and desired him to leave no step untaken for the speedy accomplishment of this important negotiation ^b. The grand master saw, without any sign of pity, civil war raging in all parts of the kingdom, but he could not hear, without emotion, all these mischiefs attributed to himself. He perceived that the far greater part of the nobility envied and hated him; and that, by the common people throughout his master's dominions, he was held in perfect execration; which induced or rather obliged him to labour with the utmost diligence in bringing this business to perfection, which, with very good reason, he considered as the king's business and his own. With this view he was resolved to gain, if it was possible, the marquis de Santillan, and the potent family of Mendoza, of which he was at the head. He proposed therefore an interview with that nobleman and his friends, which was accepted, and there he explained the many advantages that would result from the marriage which he had projected; he observed that it was the highest mark of gratitude they could give to the king and to his family; that Don Henry was of the royal blood of Castile; that his marriage with the Infanta would divide the house of Arragon; that it would infallibly gain the count of Benavente, who was Don Henry's uncle by the mother's side; and that it would protect them from the resentments of Don Ferdinand, and the Infanta Donna Isabella, from whom they had all things to fear. These arguments made a great impression upon the assembly; and the grand master, that he might absolutely determine them to a concurrence in this scheme, offered, as he was lately become a widower, to marry a lady of the house of Mendoza; but, as there was no such lady to give him, the confederates proposed that he should espouse Donna Maria de Velasco, the daughter of the count de Haro, which he accepted, and the marriage was soon after celebrated in the king's presence with great solemnity ^c. The prince Don Ferdinand, in the mean time, made a tour into his father's dominions; where he met with the cardinal Don Roderic de Borgia, legate from pope Sixtus the fourth, who presented him with a dispensation that was necessary to render his marriage valid; and the extraordinary honours that prince and his father rendered to the cardinal, attached him entirely to their interest, in the support of which he was afterwards very serviceable ^d. At the same time Don Ferdinand acquainted the king Don Juan with the new scheme the grand master had formed of marrying Donna Joanna to Don Henry his nephew, to prevent which, his advice was to secure the person of Don Henry, which was in his power; but the king, who had always treated him as his son, could not be prevailed upon to take so harsh a step, as he persuaded himself that he would do nothing in an affair of such consequence without his consent, of which also he received the strongest assurances from Donna Beatriz Pimentel, his mother ^e. It appeared, however, from the event, that Don Ferdinand had formed a better judgment of the young man's disposition; for his thoughts were so elevated with the prospect of a crown, that he went privately into Castile, in order to complete the marriage. He was received there with all possible respect, and treated in so magnificent a manner, that he began to consider himself as the presumptive heir to the crown, and behaved himself with so much haughtiness towards the nobility, as lessened his interest with his friends; at the same time, that, by offering to decide all differences with Don Ferdinand in a single combat, and saying, rashly, that he would give the city of Toledo if his competitor would accept the challenge, he provoked the house of Arragon to an irreconcilable enmity ^f. Before we conclude this year, it is necessary to observe, that, amongst other disturbances, there happened one at Toledo, which occasioned a great deal of blood to be spilt ^g.

THE arrival of the pope's legate in Castile was very acceptable to the king, upon account of that deference and respect which had been always expressed towards him by the court of Rome; so that, at his first audience, he treated him with much kindness and esteem. But when the king and his ministers found that this cardinal was entirely in the interest of the princes, and that he approved the conduct of the archbishop of Toledo, they were much chagrined. He was suffered, however, to hold a general assembly of the clergy at Segovia, where

- a he made many useful regulations, and obtained a subsidy for carrying on the war against the Turks, which was his principal business; and which, as soon as he had obtained, he returned into Arragon^k. The seditions and disturbances in all parts of Spain were as frequent as ever. The nobility brought armies of several thousands into the field in their private quarrels; towns were sometimes taken by them after regular sieges, but more frequently they revolted or were surprized. In some places the people fell upon the Jews upon various pretences; but in many more the new converts, or, as they are called in Spain, the new Christians, were exposed to the worst treatment imaginable, both in their persons and properties. In a sedition of this kind at Jaen, the constable Don Michael Luc was killed by a shot from a cross-bow, as he was hearing mass in the cathedral; with which, when the king was acquainted, he bestowed that high office upon the count de Haro, whose daughter the grand master had married^l. The duke de Medina Sidonia and the marquis of Cadiz had made war against each other in Andalusia for some years, as if they had been independent princes; but the former, that he might have some colour of authority, thought fit to declare, about this time, for the prince Don Ferdinand and the Infanta Donna Isabella^m. While things were in this state, Don Henry of Arragon expressed great impatience that the match was so long delayed; but the grand master, who perceived this young prince wanted a tutor more than the king, but was of a temper quite opposite to his, resolved to frustrate the match; in order to which, he told the king, that the only way to secure the crown to his daughter was to marry her to a crowned head; that the sending for Don Henry, contrary to his expectations, had strengthened the party of the princes, and that therefore the most prudent step he could take, was to delay the marriage, and, if possible, to renew the negotiation with the king of Portugal. Other kings were not more accustomed to command than Don Henry to obey; he therefore pacified Don Henry and his friends as well as he could, by promising them to propose the marriage in the next assembly of the states, which was to be held in a little time, and, during this interval, the grand master convinced the partizans that Don Henry was like to give them more trouble than Don Ferdinand, and that therefore they must find such a husband for Donna Joanna as, with their assistance, might be able to clear the kingdom of both; with which they were well enough satisfiedⁿ.
- d THE treasures of the king Don Henry, which were still very considerable, remained in the Alcazar at Segovia, of which he had given the command to Don Andres de Cabrera, a very brave man, and his faithful servant. The grand master was very desirous of having this place, which was indeed the best, if not the only, thing the king had to give; but finding him more tenacious in this respect than in any other, and not being able to obtain more than half a promise, he resolved to supply the other half by force. He had observed, that a great many of the inhabitants of Segovia were new Christians; his emissaries were employed to instigate the other inhabitants to fall upon them; and when this disturbance was at the greatest height, the grand master was to come in with a body of regular troops to the assistance of the old Christians, and so make himself master of the place. This scheme was very closely laid, and very briskly executed, but without effect; for Cabrera had taken care to arm all those new Christians, and, when the insurrection was highest, issued from the castle, with a numerous body of horse and foot; upon which the grand master retired, much disappointed, to Escalona^o. In the assembly of the states few things were regulated; and the king, having obtained a free-gift, gave himself little trouble about the marriage, notwithstanding that the count de Benavente had quarrelled with the grand master upon that head. The whole court, in the mean time, being very much alarmed at the great cities declaring gradually for the princes, this increase of danger made the favourite more and more uneasy about the fortress of Segovia; so that at length he teased the king into giving an order to Don Andres de Cabrera to put it into his hands; which being signified to that old officer, he answered, that his loyalty and affection to the king would not suffer him to comply with an order which it was not fit for the king to give^p. Under this dilemma, the grand master prevailed upon the king to go in person to Segovia, and try to persuade Don Andres de Cabrera out of the fortress. The king went, and was received with all the duty and submission possible; but when Don Andres, and his wife, Donna Beatriz de Bobadilla, who had been long about the person of the Infanta Isabella, had him by this means to themselves, they very boldly laid before him the true state of his affairs. They told him, that Don Juan de Pacheco was a very little gentleman, till the breath of his majesty's favour had swelled him into a great lord; that he had repaid this favour with ingratitude; had displayed his colours in the field against his majesty's royal standard; had assisted in the ceremony when his majesty was deposed, and had placed his sceptre in the Wars maintained by private noblemen against each other.

Reconciliation
between the
Infanta Isabella.

A. D. 1473.

hands of the royal Infant; that he had offered the crown to the Infanta Isabella, to whose a generous refusal his majesty owed the return of his favourite, and that he still wore that crown upon his head. They advised him, therefore, to disgrace a man who had so often sacrificed him to his interest, and to consent to a reconciliation with Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, which would restore a legal government to his subjects, and secure to his majesty the peaceable possession of his crown, which, otherwise, he could never expect¹. The king heard them without any token of displeasure, and at length seemed well enough pleased with the expedient. Donna Beatrix went to acquaint her mistress, in the disguise of a peasant; and the Infanta Donna Isabella, by the advice of the archbishop of Toledo, resolved to put herself upon the fidelity of Cabrera, and accordingly, on the 27th of December, she came to Segovia; b upon the first news of which the marquis of Villena, son to the grand master, fled out of the town². The king saw her at his return from hunting, and behaved towards her with great civility and respect. He made her a visit the next afternoon in the Alcazar, and was so well pleased with her company, that he stayed and supped; the third day they walked together publicly in the streets; and, on the fourth, the king, having presented most of the nobility about him to his sister, obliged her to go out of the Alcazar on horseback at the head of them, himself on foot holding the bridle³. Such was the strange temper of this monarch, and such an ascendancy over him had all who knew how to comply with his humours while they were about him.

He afterwards endeavours to apprehend her and her husband Don Ferdinand.

THIS ample and unexpected reconciliation was speedily made known by the Infanta to her husband Don Ferdinand, whom she invited to Segovia, and, by the advice of the lords who c were about him, he went thither, and was well received by the king⁴. The lords who attended that monarch thought that a more public testimony of the perfect harmony that reigned amongst the royal family was requisite; and therefore the king, the Infant, and the Infanta, went publicly to the cathedral on the feast of the Epiphany; afterwards they dined together in public: but, towards evening, the king complained of a violent pain in his side, and was carried to his palace in a very feeble condition; upon which there wanted not many who said he was poisoned⁵. The prince Don Ferdinand and the Infanta Donna Isabella visited him every day, during his illness. In that space their friends solicited Don Henry to renew the declaration he had formerly made in favour of his sister as to the succession; but, though this was very artfully and assiduously managed, the king could never be brought to give any d other than an evasive answer⁶. As soon as he began to recover, he resumed his private correspondence with the grand master, who had lately compromised all differences, and entered into a strict league with the duke of Albuquerque and the count of Benavente. The next thing he did was to contrive, as closely as possible, to send troops into the town, to hide them in the church towers, and to dispose every thing for surprising the princess, together with Don Andres Cabrera and his wife Donna Maria, in the Alcazar. But Don Andres perceiving some motions, easily guessed at the rest, and took his precautions so speedily and so effectually, that the grand master was forced to drop his project⁷. However, by the advice of the Infanta Donna Isabella, Don Ferdinand left Segovia, under pretence of paying a visit to the amirante.
As the archbishop of Toledo was the only member of the king's council who openly espoused e the cause of the princess, he took it amiss that they seemed to have a greater confidence in cardinal Mendoza, who was also of the king's council, and of their party, but secretly. The archbishop wrote his sentiments upon this to Don Juan king of Arragon, and, after expostu-lating the matter freely, desired to withdraw from their service. The king, and afterwards the princes, did all in their power to satisfy him; and Don Ferdinand, having a mind to see the Infanta, desired his opinion whether it was safe for him to come to Segovia; to which the prelate answered, he might be safe for three days, but not longer⁸. He went thither accordingly, retired at the time prescribed, and afterwards assisted the marquis de Santillan in taking Carrion from the count of Benavente, which, upon the interposition of the king, was done by treaty. About this time the ambassadors of the duke of Burgundy came to pay their f respects to Don Ferdinand, and to invest him, by their master's command, with the order of the Golden Fleece: after receiving which he went to pay the Infanta another visit, but made a very short stay⁹. He not long after surprized Tordesillas, which was in the hands of one of the king's favourites, who used the people most cruelly: but tho' he took care to represent this to that monarch in the fullest light possible, Don Henry could not help shewing that he was extremely offended with that action, the news of which he received at Madrid, having a left the Infanta at Segovia, to which place Don Ferdinand went for a little time, and then, the affairs of that kingdom requiring his presence, he set out for Arragon^a.

It was the great object of the grand master's politics, and consequently of the king's, to keep the princes from the succession, from a very strong apprehension that the lofty structure of his greatness would quickly be demolished, if they were once seated on the throne. To prevent this, he judged two things absolutely necessary; first a great and well-conducted strength at home, and next a powerful foreign support. The shortest way to obtain the former appeared to be uniting in his own hands the three grand masterships: as that of Alcantara was then in dispute, he ordered his bastard son Don Alonso Pacheco to reduce, with a good body of troops, most of the places belonging to the order, and to take himself the title of grand master; not doubting that his favour with the king, and his money at Rome, would bear him out. To bring about the latter, he engaged the king in a hunting party towards the frontiers of Portugal, and, being now reconciled to the duke of Albuquerque, whose large estate, as well as his own, was derived from the prodigality of the king, he confided him to his care, while he went to press the Portuguese monarch to marry the Infanta Donna Joanna, which would have rendered his system complete. He managed this, as he did every thing of the same kind, with great dexterity and address, and at length brought the king of Portugal to promise, that he would take the matter into his serious consideration, and accept the proposition, if he could dispose things so as to afford them a probability of success. When he made a report of this, at his return, to the king Don Henry, it did not afford him that satisfaction which he expected; for, finding his health daily decaying, he foresaw that he should not live to receive any benefit from the expedient. He resolved, however, to go to Madrid, the air of which was more favourable to him than that of any other place, and, at the pressing instance of his favourite, gave orders to the governor Truxillo to surrender that place into his hands. This order was no sooner received, than the grand master marched with a body of forces to Santa Cruz, at a small distance from Truxillo, to enforce it; but, finding this method would be equally tedious and uncertain, he laboured to corrupt the governor, in which, at length, he succeeded. Yet, before the bargain was completed, he was suddenly attacked with a sharp pain in the throat, occasioned by an abscess, which quickly brought him, and all his great designs, to an end, on the 4th of October. Those who were about his person, and in his secrets, concealed his death till such time as Truxillo was surrendered, and then his body was transferred to Segovia, and buried there, pursuant to the directions he had given in his illness^b. Death of the grand master.

THE news of the grand master's death gave infinitely more disquiet to the king than to any of his subjects: to shew that he not only lived but died in the full possession of his favour, he replaced him immediately by Don Diego Lopez Pacheco, marquis de Villena, his eldest son, whom he confirmed in the possession of all his father's estates; and requested of the pope a bull that might invest him likewise with the dignity of grand master of St. James^c. But as there were other noblemen who were ambitious of that high dignity, they pressed the knights to hold a chapter immediately, in order to secure to themselves a free election. This, however, was attended with an unexpected inconveniency; the knights of the province of Castile met at Tarancon, and chose Don Roderic Manrique, count of Paredes; while those of the province of Leon assembled likewise, and chose Don Alonso de Cardenas^d. The marquis de Villena applied himself to the count de Osorno, brother to Don Roderic Manrique, in hopes of bringing him to a treaty; and, going to make him a visit, the count took care to be out of the way; but having given proper instructions to the countess, she caused the marquis to be arrested. This outrage was highly resented by the king, who, by the advice of the archbishop of Toledo, caused the fortress in which he was detained to be immediately invested, and, in a short time, the marquis was released upon a treaty, by which he obliged himself to deliver a place which his father had formerly promised to the count de Osorno, but which, notwithstanding, he could never be brought to surrender^e. The recovery of his favourite's liberty was the last considerable action of the king's life; for, very soon after his return to Madrid, the physicians who attended the king declared, that, from the rigour of the season, the gradual diminution of the king's strength, and the return of his vomitings and pain in the side, he could not last long; and that therefore they would do well to put him in mind of departing this world in a manner suitable to his rank as a king, and his hopes as a Christian. Cardinal Mendoza, the count de Benavente, and the marquis de Villena, went accordingly to carry this melancholy piece of news; and the king, having called for the prayer of St. Jerom, confessed, and received the sacrament, the prior then asked him whom he declared heir to the crown, who were the executors of his testament, and where he desired to be interred. The king answered, that the Infanta Donna Joanna was his sole heir; that the executors named in his will were cardinal Mendoza, the counts of Placentia and Benavente, and the marquis de Villena; and that he desired his remains should be deposited near those of his mother, in the convent of Guadalupe. He fell soon after into an agony, and expired in the middle of the night of the twelfth of December. His body was deposited in the convent of St. Jerom, at Madrid, where his obsequies were celebrated with great pomp, and afterwards cardinal Mendoza caused his body to be transported to Guadalupe, where, in gratitude for the favours he had received from him, he caused a magnificent monument to be raised, on the right hand of the high altar, to the memory of that prince, at his own expence ^f.

Thus died Henry the fourth, king of Castile and Leon, with all the dependencies on those crowns, after sitting many years on the throne, without having ever ruled. The Spanish writers say, that he was pious and religious, which must be understood of exterior acts of devotion; for his behaviour towards his father, and that indolence and want of application which rendered him contemptible while he wore the crown, were surely no testimonies either of piety or religion. He made the fortunes of a few of his minions, while he ruined those of his subjects: he was not, perhaps, cruel in his nature, and yet he caused rivers of blood to be shed through his indiscretion. It may be, he wished to make a better king; but history has recorded no proofs of his having endeavoured it. He wanted firmness in opposing his brother's usurpation; he wanted gratitude to his sister, who refused a crown, that he might wear it; he wanted spirit, justice, and common sense, in preferring Donna Joanna to the Infanta Isabella, if he was conscious of his own impotence, as the Spanish writers affirm. But in this we agree with Ferreras, that if, in the reigns of his predecessors, kings may discover what qualities they ought to acquire, and what methods they must take, to render their subjects happy, and themselves beloved, this reign alone will be a sufficient mirror for them to contemplate whatever they ought to decline or despise. These reflections are due to justice and to truth, and with these we shall conclude a period, fertile in great and glorious events, though, from the errors of this weak and unhappy prince, it ended meanly; for which, however, the splendour of the ensuing reign made full amends.

A general description of the kingdom of Arragon, its situation, extent, produce, and inhabitants, &c.

The great power and extensive dominions of the crown of Arragon at the time of its
Castile.

THE method we have hitherto pursued of treating the kingdoms erected in Spain, after the expulsion of the Moors, separately, obliges us, in this section, to give the reader as clear and as concise an account as it is possible of the kingdom of Arragon, which, in consequence of the marriage of Don Ferdinand, king of Sicily, heir, and afterwards king, of Arragon, became united to the crowns of Castile and Leon, and the great dominions annexed to them, by the courage and conduct of the monarchs who had governed those realms. At the time this union was made, Arragon was one of the most potent sovereignties in Europe, and little, if at all, inferior to Castile; for, besides the principality of Catalonia, and the kingdom of Valentia, which had been long united to this crown, the kingdom of Navarre belonged to it likewise (in what manner will be hereafter explained), together with the kingdom of Majorca, including that island and Minorca, and those dependent upon them, as also the kingdom of Sicily^a. So that, in point of territory, of commerce, and maritime power, it was, as we have said, very considerable. Some have carried this so far as to assert, that, till this union, the monarchy of Spain was hardly known beyond the limits of the mountains and seas by which it was bounded^b; which, however, is carrying things much too far; since, as we have already seen, the monarchies both of Castile and Arragon had a very apparent influence on the affairs of Europe; and therefore those who say this, seem rather to reflect on the ignorance of their own nations, than on the crowns for which they express so unjust a contempt^c.

- ^a THE kingdom of Arragon, properly so called, is bounded on the north by the Pyrenean mountains, on the west by the kingdoms of Navarre, Old and part of New Castile, on the south by the kingdom of Valentia, and on the east by part of the same kingdom, and the principality of Catalonia. In antient times it was inhabited by the Celtiberians, the Jaacetans, and the Sedetans^d. In length, from north to south, it contains about fourscore leagues, and its greatest breadth is about fifty. The common opinion is, that it derives its name from the river Arragon; but whoever considers the smallness of that river, in comparison of several others, but more especially with the Ebro, or, as the ancients called it, Iberus, will scarce be satisfied with that account, and perhaps will think it more probable, that the denomination of Arragon arose from the corruption of Tarraconensis, the name of the Roman province, by striking off the first letter^e. Besides the great river, that is, the Ebro, which runs from north-west to south-east, and divides this country almost into two equal parts, it is watered by some other streams that are pretty considerable; such as, on the north of the Ebro, the Cinca, antiently Cinga, the Gallego, antiently Gallicus, and the Isuela; on the south side of that great river, the Xalon, antiently Salo, and the Xiloca. We may add to these some that are still less, such as the Arragon, Riguelo, Guerva, Rio de Aguas, Rio Martin, Guadalupe, Guadalaviar, and Albambra^f. But, after all, this country, if we take it in general, is but dry and barren, the soil generally sandy, and, where it is not mountainous and stony, in some parts it is very nitrous, and every where naturally hard and dry. In the vallies, however, where they have the advantage of rivers or rivulets, and in the plains, where the want of these can be supplied by canals, it is very pleasant, and tolerably fertile, producing corn, wine, oil, flax, fruits of different sorts, and in some places saffron^g. The mountainous country is at present as wild and desert as can be imagined, and consequently useless and poor. It was not, however, always in this condition; for, in antient times, these mountains, that are now so despicable, were rich in gold and silver mines, and, it is more than probable, may be so still; but here, as in other parts of Spain, industry is extinct.

- WE have already observed, that the principal inhabitants of this country, in antient times, were the Celtiberians: but, concerning the origin of this nation, the most learned authors are very much divided^h. Some say that the Celtes from Gaul, having settled on the other side of the Iberus, joined the name of that river to their own, and called themselves, or were called by others, *Celtiberians*ⁱ. But it is at least equally probable, that the Celtes were seated on the north, and the Iberians on the south side; and we are told that, after they had for many years wasted each other by obstinate and bloody wars, they at length concluded a peace, and very wisely contrived, in order to render it more lasting, to blend both nations into one by continual intermarriages; and from thence the Celtes and Iberians, being both lost, this new nation was stiled Celtiberians^k. This seems to be the account hinted at by the poet Lucan, who might be well supposed to be thoroughly acquainted with its antiquity, being himself a native of this country. We have been the more particular with respect to this nation, because they were always famous for a kind of supercilious haughtiness, that made them look upon their neighbours with an eye of contempt, which, whatever disadvantages it might be attended with, kept them pure and unmixed; so that their characters answered, for many ages, very exactly, to what was recorded of them by the Latin writers^l. They were active, hardy, enterprising, enthusiastically fond of liberty, very magnificent, but withal very industrious. Marcellus, after a short war, taxed them at six hundred talents of gold^m. These dispositions were little, if at all, altered by their falling under the dominion of the Goths, from whom they sometimes revolted, and with whom they had continual struggles for the preservation of their liberties, which never any nation better deserved, since they were never by any nation either longer or better defendedⁿ.

- WE may, therefore, justly presume, that when the rest of Spain was overborne by that dreadful inundation of Moors, these generous people retired in great numbers into their mountains and other inaccessible places, where they might enjoy that freedom which was to them felicity^o. It is also not at all improbable, that the districts which are still distinguished by the name of the county of Arragon, the principality of Sobrarve, and the county of Ribagorça, of which we shall take occasion to speak more particularly, were the countries to which these brave men retired, and in which, for their own security, they, by common consent, erected such a form of government, as least diminished their freedom^p. But to enter into the long and intricate dispute, which has embarrassed the most judicious Spanish antiquaries, a whether the kings of Sobrarve were more antient than those of Navarre, would be fatiguing our readers and ourselves to very little purpose; and, if it is to be discussed at all, it belongs more properly to the history of Navarre, where we shall take occasion to resume it^a. At present it shall suffice to say, that, however this controversy may be determined, it is generally allowed, that Don Sancho the Great, king of Navarre, was also count or earl of Arragon, in his own right, and master also of the other two little countries, now esteemed but provinces of this kingdom, as he became afterwards earl of Castile by succession, and consequently was the sole sovereign of what the Christians possessed in Spain, the kingdom of Leon and the earldom of Barcelona only excepted^b. He it was who, by dividing his dominions amongst his four sons, erected three new kingdoms; of one of which, that is, Castile, we have already given the reader a long history: our present business is to gratify his curiosity in the like manner with respect to the other two, and this as succinctly as perspicuity will allow.

Arragon erected into a kingdom in favour of his son Don Ramiro, by Don Sancho the Great, king of Navarre.

WE have elsewhere shewn that this potent prince died in the month of February 1035; and we have likewise mentioned the fable of his eldest son's charging the queen his mother with adultery, and of the spirit with which his natural son vindicated her innocence^c. Without recapitulating, therefore, these tales, which have been so fully refuted^d, let us proceed to facts that admit of no dispute. The kingdom of Navarre, with the principality of Biscay, and the province of Rioja, he left to his eldest son Don Garcia; to Don Ferdinand he gave the county of Castile, which he erected into a kingdom; to Don Gonfales he gave the counties of Sobrarve and Ribacorga, with a regal title also^e. These three were his children by Donna Munia Major, daughter to the count of Castile: but, besides these, he had another son by a mistress of his, as most writers say, though a learned writer of the history of Navarre has, with great warmth, vindicated his legitimacy. The name of this son was Don Ramiro, and upon him he bestowed Arragon, of which country, if he was not the first independent prince, he was, undoubtedly, the first king^f. But, before we proceed to the history of him and his successors, it will be necessary to shew precisely, or at least as exactly as we can, what the territories were, which he and his brother Don Gonfales possessed, in virtue of their father's will^g.

WHAT now assumed the name of the kingdom^h, must have been, in fact, a country very little, if at all, more extensive, than that which now bears the title of the county of *Arragon*ⁱ, d having the Pyrenean mountains on the north, the kingdom of Navarre on the west, the territories of the little Moorish prince of Huesca on the south, and the country of Sobrarva on the east^j. In this little tract there are several fruitful and pleasant vallies, which were, in those days, thoroughly peopled, and exceedingly well cultivated. The city of Jacca was its capital, seated very pleasantly on the river Arragon, in the midst of a small plain, at the foot of the Pyrenees, abounding with corn and fruits, famous for its sheep pastures, and plentifully stocked with wild fowl^k; a place of great antiquity, and celebrated in those earlier ages for being the capital of the Jaccitani^l. It is for want of this distinction between the bounds of the kingdom of Arragon, at the time of its first erection, and those under which it is now comprehended, that many, indeed most, of the histories of that crown are, in a manner, e unintelligible, more especially to strangers. But when we remember that the kingdom given to Don Ramiro was not above an eighth part of what we now call Arragon, the subsequent narration will be, in all respects, consistent and conspicuous.

THE country of Sobrarva lies east from the kingdom of Arragon, as we have just now defined it, having the Pyrenees on the north, the country of Ribagorça on the east, and the territories of some Moorish princes to the south^m. The capital is the town of Anisa, upon the river Ara, not far from the angle which it makes in falling into the *Cinca*ⁿ. The country of Ribagorça has the Pyrenees on the north, Sobrarva on the west, the territory of the Moorish prince of Huesca on the south, and Catalonia on the east, from which it is divided by a river called Noguera Ribagorzana: the whole territory is about fifteen leagues in length, and six f in breadth, composed of many rugged mountains, and some few pleasant vallies^o. These countries taken together, and which were not either much bigger or less than the kingdom of Arragon, formed the new kingdom that was now erected in favour of Don Gonfales^p.

Don Ramiro, the year after he was settled in the kingdom of Arragon, espoused Gifberga, or Ermisenda, for we find her called by both names by cotemporary writers, the daughter of

- a Bernardo Rogerio, count of Vigorra; a princess much celebrated for her beauty. About two years after Don Gonfales passing over the bridge of Monclus, as he was hunting, was assassinated by a domestic of his, whose name was Ramonet, who struck him to the heart with his javelin, but for what cause we no-where find¹. As he died without issue, the people thought fit to proclaim Don Ramiro, who, by this means, added the countries of Sobrarva and Ribagorca to his own; so that now he was master of half that part of the kingdom of Arragon which lies on the north of the Ebro. By this accession of territory he was become so formidable, that, for fear of a rupture with him, the Moorish princes of Saragossa, Huesca, and Tudela, paid him each of them an annual pension, by way of tribute; and the first of these princes consented, at his request, to the establishment of a bishop in his capital, to superintend the ecclesiastical affairs of his Christian subjects². This success had, as it too often happens, a bad effect on the mind of this prince; who, forgetting the ties of blood, and the respect due to justice, made, in conjunction with the Infidel monarchs before-mentioned, an irruption into the territories of his brother, Don Garcia king of Navarre, and laid siege to the town of Tafalla. The inhabitants of that place making a gallant defence, gave the king Don Garcia time to assemble his troops, with whom, in the midst of a dark night, he fell upon his enemies so unexpectedly, and with such vigour, that the best part of their forces were cut in pieces, Don Ramiro himself narrowly escaping upon a horse without bridle or saddle³. Don Garcia, pursuing his blow, entered the kingdom of Arragon with an army, and reducing a great part of the country, forced his brother to retire into the mountains of Sobrarva. On his submission, however, and the interposition of some of the clergy, Don Garcia consented to a peace, and restored the places he had taken⁴. This harmony subsisted between them during the remainder of their lives; and the great power of Don Ferdinand king of Leon, being equally formidable to Don Ramiro of Arragon and to Don Sancho the son and successor of Don Garcia, in the kingdom of Navarre, they concluded a defensive alliance, for their mutual security⁵. About two years after, the king of Arragon, being advanced in years, having first settled the affairs of his kingdom and family by his will, made war upon the Infidels, from a principle of devotion, and took from them the town of Lobarria, which lies about four leagues from *Huesca*⁶. The very next year he held the famous assembly of Jacca, at which assisted several prelates from the Christian states in this neighbourhood, in which assembly Jacca was made a bishop's see, and endowed with very considerable revenues. The king established very strict ecclesiastical discipline throughout his dominions, and, as far as he was able, bound his successors to maintain and support what at this time was established⁷. Three years after, finding the king of Castile engaged in a war with the Moors, he judged it a favourable opportunity to fall upon them likewise; upon which, with a formidable army, he laid siege to Grao, which belonged to the king of Saragossa. This obliged the Moorish prince to demand the protection of the king of Castile, to whom he had been for some time tributary. Don Ferdinand was at that time in the southern parts of his dominions; but his son Don Sancho, at the head of a small body of chosen troops, having the famous Cid for his lieutenant, came to the assistance of the Moors; and having surprised the army of Arragon, defeated it entirely, made a great number of prisoners, and a dreadful slaughter, the king himself being among the number of the slain⁸. This was the end of Don Ramiro, on whom, some say, pope Gregory the seventh conferred the title of *Most Christian*⁹, when he had governed his realm twenty-eight years. His body was interred in the monastery of St. Juan de la Pena; and he left behind him two sons, Don Sancho and Don Garcia, and two daughters, Donna Sancha and Donna Theresa. He had also a natural son Don Sancho, to whom he gave the county of Ribagorca, but he died without issue¹⁰.
- Don Sancho Ramirez* succeeded his father, with the general acclamations of his subjects¹¹. We are told by Mariana, that he was eighteen years old at the time of his accession, which he places near five years too late, and consequently he could have been but thirteen at the time of his father's demise: but, as he married that very year, this must appear improbable; and, if what a learned historian asserts be true, it is utterly impossible. He says that this was not his first marriage; but that the name of the lady, whose death made way for the princess he now espoused, was Donna Beatrix, whereas she to whom he was married in the first year of his reign was Donna Felicia, daughter to Hilduin count of Robey, though many of the Spanish historians say she was the daughter of the count of Urgel, which very possibly may arise from his first wife's being the daughter of that count; for of this marriage they take no notice¹². is also said, that he abrogated the old Gothic code of laws, and introduced those of the empire, which, however, is not very certain. He was a prince of great parts, as well as of a martial disposition; and, therefore, having provided for the domestic security of his kingdom, in conjunction with the count of Urgel, he undertook an expedition against the Moors; in which that count, having gained two victories, was slain *. The king Don Sancho was, at that time, before the town of Balbastro, a place of importance, situated on the little river Vero, not far from its confluence with the Cinca, the territory of which, being well watered, is very fruitful, in olive trees especially, of which they make very good oil, and in pretty large quantities. The Moors made a long and brave defence, but at length the place surrendered, and the king caused it to be strongly fortified, making it also a bishop's see, by transferring the episcopal chair from Rhoda *. Some years after he would have turned his arms against the Moorish prince of Saragossa; but, when he was ready to take the field, that prince very wisely put himself under the protection of Don Sancho king of Navarre, in respect to whom the king of Arragon dropped his design for that time. Upon the assassination of this good prince, his brother Don Raymond, about three years after, at the intercession of the greatest part of his subjects, called Don Sancho of Arragon to the throne of Navarre, though, at the same time, there was a strong party formed, as hath been already shewn in another place, in favour of the king of Castile and Leon, which, it was feared, would have produced a war between the two crowns; but, by the great prudence and moderation of Don Sancho of Arragon, it was prevented, and he was left in the quiet possession of that part of Navarre that lay on the same side of the river Ebro with his own hereditary dominions *. At this juncture pope Gregory was extremely pressing upon both monarchs to acknowledge themselves feudatories of the holy see; to which end he employed a person of great capacity as his legate, but with no effect: for, being born kings, they could not be brought to become subjects *. His power being now much augmented, it was not long before he took several places from the Moors of Saragossa and Huesca, who applied themselves thereupon to all their neighbours, representing it as a religious war, by which they were soon enabled to assemble a numerous army, and to offer Don Sancho battle, which he did not decline; and, having gained a complete victory, contented himself with securing the places he had taken, by which he extended and strengthened his frontier *. The next year he took the field again, besieged the town of Bobea, and took it by assault. In the summer following he took Grao, and repeopled and fortified several places on the confines; to prevent which, the Moors ventured another battle at Piedro Pisida, in which they were again defeated, and the king Don Sancho left at liberty to accomplish all he had undertaken b.

As soon as he had perfected his barrier in such a manner as to cover his country from the insults of the Infidels, he began to think of acting again offensively. While he meditated this irruption, the queen Donna Felicia died, on the 24th of April, which, however, did not hinder the king's taking the field and investing Moncon, a place very strong both by art and nature, situated on the slope of a hill, and commanding a considerable district round it c. The enterprize was difficult: but, being conducted with courage and caution, the king at length became master of it, and rendered it one of the principal fortresses in his territories. These facts, however, shew us plainly, that those authors are probably in the wrong who affirm that he was present this year at the taking of Toledo. After allowing his subjects some years of repose, and causing several places to be repaired in Navarre, he once more assembled a puissant army, with a design to make a complete conquest of the little principality of Huesca; but the Moors, discerning his superiority, offered to become his vassals, and to pay him a large annual tribute, which he accepted, resolving to turn his arms against Saragossa e. It was with this view that he caused a strong place, to which he gave the name of Castellar, to be erected on the frontier, as near as possible to that city, by which it was, in a manner, always blocked up, and which might at any time be converted into a place of arms, as soon as he found himself strong enough to besiege that important place. As this had a very good effect, he proceeded soon after to take the same method in regard to Huesca, which quickly created some disturbances, and these furnished the occasion which he sought of declaring war f. His mind being extremely set upon this conquest, it is said that he sent his son Don Ramiro into France, to take the habit of St. Benedict, in hopes this might procure him the Divine assistance in this great and hazardous enterprize *. The prince of Huesca, being thoroughly apprized of his design, had put the place into an excellent state of defence, raised very large magazines, and drawn numbers of brave men from different parts of Spain, to augment his garrison, and had besides a considerable body of auxiliaries from his neighbour of Saragossa.

- a. This did not hinder Don Sancho from executing his design; and sitting down before the city, with a very numerous and well appointed army, he carried on the siege with such vigour, that the place had stood more than one assault, when, in bringing up a body of troops that had been repulsed, the king was, as he extended his arm in giving orders, mortally wounded ^{Is mortally} by an arrow from the wall. Being carried to his tent, he expired, as some say, on the first ^{wounded at the} of June^h, or, as others assert, on the fourth of that month¹, in the year of our Lord one ^{siege of Hu-} thousand and ninety-four, and in the thirty-second year of his reign, leaving behind him three ^{esca.} sons, Don Pedro, Don Alonso, and Don Ramiro. The two eldest were with him in the camp; and, before he died, he caused them to be sworn in his presence, never to abandon the design of reducing Huesca, which he looked upon as the first step towards driving the Moors out of that part of Spain^k.

- THE Infant Don Pedro was immediately proclaimed king by the army; and, having A. D. 1094. caused his father's body to be removed to the monastery of Jesus of Nazareth, at Mont Arra- Don Pedro pro-gon, he turned the siege into a blockade, posting a strong body of troops in the castle of ^{claimed king.} Luna, which the king his father had built in a very proper situation for that purpose^l. We are told by some writers, that Don Pedro bore the title of king of Sobrarva before his father's death; and that, having espoused a lady whose name was Bearta, he had by her a son of his own name, and a daughter Donna Isabella^m. He was in the prime of his life, and not at all inferior to his father either in conduct or in courage; and therefore he laboured assiduously, though with as little stir as possible, to draw together an army numerous enough to return to the siege. Abdaramen, the Moorish chief of Huesca, suspecting this, repaired his fortifications, and sent to all his neighbours and allies to demand assistance; assuring them that he was but the first sacrifice, and that all the little princes of the Moors were in danger of being gradually destroyed; he likewise sent to the king of Castile, putting him in mind that, as he paid him an annual tribute, it was but just that he should protect him in the day of his distress. That monarch did not refuse him, but sent a considerable corps, under the command of Don Garcia count de Najera, and Albocamen king of Saragossa marched with almost all the troops he had to his reliefⁿ. Don Pedro of Arragon, perceiving the enemy in full march towards him, resolved to leave but a small body before the place, and to advance with the rest of his army into the plain of Alcaraz, that the Moors might see he had no inclination to decline fighting. Both sides, therefore, being much in earnest, they came to a decisive engagement ^{Defeats the} on the 28th of November, in which, though the Moors and their auxiliaries did all that could ^{Moors in the} be expected from men of determined courage, yet, after a very obstinate dispute, which ^{plain of Alca-} lasted many hours, they were totally defeated, with the loss of forty thousand men killed, ^{raz.} and the count Don Garcia, and most of the forces he commanded, were made prisoners. This was, certainly, one of the most important and most signal victories obtained over the Infidels, and, according to the humour of those times, it was ascribed to St. George, the patron of Arragon, who was reported to have fought in the first ranks, mounted on a white horse, having on his left arm a broad shield with a bloody cross; whence, though it is not very clear when they were assumed, the arms of Arragon are said to have been taken; viz. On a field, argent, a cross of St. George, gules, with four Moors heads proper^o. As the price of this victory Huesca was surrendered on the 15th, and the great mosque, being ^{1096.} cleansed and purified, was consecrated the 17th of December, when the bishop of Jacca took ^{He takes Hu-} possession of it^p. This city, which stands on the bank of the river Isuela, at the distance of ^{esca.} thirty leagues north-east from Saragossa, is, after that, the fairest and finest in Arragon, situate in a fertile plain, well cultivated; and producing the best wine that is made in this country; and the remains of its old fortifications, which are still preserved, shew, that, at the time it fell into the hands of the Christians, its walls were flanked with ninety-nine towers. After this happy success, the king caused his father's body to be carried to the royal monastery of St. Juan de la Pena, and to be interred near the body of his consort Donna Felicia, under a stately tomb^q.

- THE settling things in the territory of such an important conquest took up some time. This once accomplished, we find the active and victorious prince in the field again, sweeping several places of less consequence from the Moors, and at length depriving them of the castle of Calefans, after a very stubborn defence, which gave him an opportunity of extending his dominions, and securing his frontiers^r. He also applied himself to pope Paschal the second, in order to obtain a bull for transferring the see of Rhoda to Balbastro, which was his father's conquest, though most of the historians of this kingdom ascribe it also to him; in which, if there be any truth, the Moors must have surprized it again, of which there is not the least hint to be found^a. After this the king Don Pedro seems to have applied himself chiefly to the arts of peace, and to the establishing and improving that extent of country, which, by the blessing of Providence on his own and his predecessor's arms, had been recovered from the Infidels: but the satisfaction he enjoyed from those princely labours was sadly interrupted by the loss of both of his children, in the month of August, which, partly through grief, and partly through disease, brought himself to the grave, on the 28th of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand one hundred and four, in the eleventh year of his reign. His body was interred near those of his father and mother, in the monastery of St. Juan de la Pena^b.

He was succeeded in the kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon by his brother Don Alonso^c, who, by the active display of his martial virtues, obtained the surname of il Guerrero; that is, the warrior. He was esteemed, at the time of his accession, one of the handsomest and bravest princes of his time, which induced Don Alonso the sixth of Castile, who had caused himself to be solemnly crowned emperor of the Spains, to cast his eyes upon him, for the second husband of his daughter and heiress Donna Urraca, which took place in the second year of his reign^d; and, considering himself as the successor of that prince, in right of his wife, he stiled himself Alonso the seventh, king of Castile and Leon, and sometimes also emperor^e: the conclusion of this marriage seemed to promise as great advantages, as, in its consequences, it produced miseries and mischiefs to the Christians in Spain. The present possessor of Castile, and all the extensive territories lately annexed to it, was a woman, and her heir apparent a child; by which they were grievously exposed to the impressions of the Infidels, more vigilant then than in former times, through the losses they had sustained, the revolutions that had happened in their governments, and several other causes. The marriage of Donna Urraca to Don Alonso not only repaired the loss of the deceased emperor, and furnished the young heir of Castile of the same name with a powerful protector, but created, at the same time, a new and unexperienced authority, which threatened the Moors with immediate expulsion; since, except the two counties of Barcelona and Portugal, this Don Alonso was master, in his own and his wife's right, of all the states that the Christians possessed in Spain, and so able to bring into the field of battle more numerous and potent armies than hitherto had been ever employed against the common enemy. Besides, it seemed a most happy and effectual provision against those factions that commonly arise in all monarchies, when the throne is occupied either by women or children. But so uncertain are all events in this sublunary state, and so short-sighted is human policy, that the hopes of the Christians and the apprehensions of the Moors were equally disappointed; and this, almost as soon as they were excited: for, in a few months after the marriage was concluded, those differences broke out between the king and queen, which could never afterwards be reconciled; and which, almost as soon as they broke out, threw every thing into confusion; so that through their intestine discords, or rather through the appointment of divine Providence, if the Infidels had not been wanting to themselves, they might have had a fair opportunity of restoring their power, and of recovering a great part, at least, of those countries that the Christians had lately taken from them. But as we have given a full account of those matters in another place, we shall content ourselves with observing here, that, after a great deal of confusion and bloodshed, the marriage between Don Alonso and Donna Urraca was declared null, in the council of Palencia; and the king, thereupon, turned his thoughts entirely to the care of his own hereditary dominions^f.

THE glory his father had acquired by his victories over the Moors, and the reputation raised by his brother by the conquest of Huesca, joined to some insults and provocations which himself had received from the Moors of Saragossa, inflamed the king Don Alonso with the desire of adding that noble city to his dominions. He foresaw that this would be a difficult and hazardous enterprize, and, by a policy peculiar to a prince of his disposition, he contrived to obtain the means of carrying it into execution by divulging his project, which had all the effect he proposed, since it brought many of the French nobility, eager to obtain honour in a religious war, to his assistance, particularly Gaston lord of Bearn, Rotrou count of Perche, the count of Comminges, the viscount of Gavardan, and the bishop of Lescar^g. He had quickly a specimen of their great military skill, as well as of their bold and enterprising dispositions; for his troops being continually harrassed, and their convoys cut off by

- a excursions from Tudela, which the Moors were likewise in possession of, he detached Rotrou count of Perche, with a considerable body of troops, to restrain those people. The count made a sudden and silent march into the neighbourhood of that city, and having posted his forces in such a manner, as that they could not be discerned, he ordered a small party of horse to advance within sight of the place; upon which the Moors, supposing them to be the rear guard of a convoy, issued out with their whole force, and upon their retiring according to their instructions, pursued them beyond the place where the count lay with his forces, who thereupon attacked them in flank, and having gained an easy victory, pursued them with such vigour, that part of his troops entered with them into the town, and having seized an advantageous post, supported themselves, while he
- b arrived with the rest of his infantry, and carried the place by assault, to the no small astonishment both of the Moors and the Christians^a. But the king, notwithstanding this unexpected success, being informed that the Moors in Saragossa had received numerous succours, thought fit to suspend his expedition, in order to make the necessary preparations for rendering it effectual, which took up the remaining part of this and all the succeeding year.

- THE measure upon which the king principally relied, was disturbing and distressing the inhabitants of that city, from the fortress of Castellar, which stood upon the Ebro, and gave the Christians an opportunity of disturbing all communication between that city, either by land or water. After many months wearying and harrassing them in this manner, which served only to keep his own troops in breath, and gave him leisure to repair and fortify all the places he had taken, he brought a numerous army into the field, and besieged the strong fortress of Almadobar, which, as it in some measure covered Saragossa, the Moors had provided with a stout garrison, and with all things necessary for a good defence^b. This he took after a brave resistance, and then turned his arms against Salici, Robles, Gurrea, and Zucra, all of which he obliged to surrender. Having thus cleared that side of the river, and established a free communication between his own camp and the kingdoms of Arragon and Navarre, he at length invested Saragossa^c. The siege was very tedious, the besieged made frequent sallies, and the besiegers were repulsed in more than one assault. This disgusted the French lords, who loved to be upon the wing; and, except the lord of Bearn and the count of Perche, they quitted the camp. The king, Don Alonso, upon this, drew
- d his forces nearer the place, and prosecuted the siege with greater vigour than before; however, the inhabitants found means to press the Moors of Tortosa, Merida, and Valentia, to come to their assistance, assuring them that the Christian army was much inferior to what it had been. Accordingly they assembled a very numerous army, under the command of Temin, and marched speedily to their relief. The king Don Alonso was no sooner informed of this, than foreseeing the disadvantages that must attend his being attacked in his lines, left a small body of troops before the place, and marched with the rest of his forces to give the enemy battle, whom he entirely defeated, killed a great number upon the spot, and made a multitude prisoners, amongst whom was their general. This had the consequence that was expected from it; the place began immediately to capitulate, and on the 18th of December A. D. 1118.
- e the king took possession of it with great solemnity^d. As this was beyond comparison the finest place in his possession, and indeed one of the best built cities in Spain, he not only restored it to its ancient honour of being an episcopal see, but made it also the capital of his dominions. Having rewarded generously those strangers who had assisted in reducing it, he caused it to be repopled with Christians, and then demolished the fortifications, declaring that the seat of his monarchy should have no other defence than the force and courage of its inhabitants^e. While he was thus employed, he had intelligence that numbers of people began to retire out of Tarragona, and other places; upon which, resolving to make a right use of the consternation the Moors were in, he marched thither with his army: though a place of strength and consequence, he reduced it with a very little trouble, and concluded
- f this glorious campaign with the taking of Boja, Alagon, and other places on the banks of the river Galego^f. The next year, while the places he had reduced were repairing, he made another expedition, in which he swept the river Xalon, made himself master of the ancient town of Calatayud, and took several places of less importance from the Infidels. He found it convenient after this, to remain for some time quiet in his own dominions, in order to provide effectually for their security, notwithstanding the many thousands of Moors that were now become his subjects^g.

THESE precautions taken, he again assembled his forces; and having signified to the nobility of France, how well pleased he should be to have them again for his companions in arms, they very readily accepted the summons, and joined his troops by that time they were in a state of action. The king Don Alonso first ravaged the territory of Lerida, afterwards invaded Valentia, and at length penetrated as far as Murcia, acquiring vast reputation to himself, and immense riches to those who served under him^a. The Moors had been hitherto so much astonished at the boldness of this enterprize, that they made little or no resistance; but, perceiving that his army was not very numerous, that he was at a great distance from his own dominions, in the very centre of theirs, and that it was impossible for any of his forces to escape, in case of a defeat, they began to recover their spirits, and eleven of their alcaides, having joined the strength of their respective governments, advanced to give him battle near the city of Alcaraz. Don Alonso, according to his usual custom, placed all hopes of safety in a frank declaration to his people, that if they were beat they were undone; the sense of which operated so powerfully, that, notwithstanding the inequality of the contest, they gained a very decisive and glorious victory; after which he took winter quarters in the enemy's country, and kept his Christmas at Alcaraz^b.

In the spring of the ensuing year, when the Moors expected that he would have begun his retreat, he made a fresh irruption into the plains of Cordova, and having ravaged all the open country, threw himself next into the territories of Jaen and Granada, where he committed the like devastation. But after all this success, it is very doubtful how this campaign might have ended, if he had not received an unexpected and almost miraculous succour, which enabled him to return in triumph to Saragossa^c. While his army continued in the field, ten thousand Christian families came down from the Alpujarros, and the mountains of Alcaraz, where they had maintained themselves from the days of Don Rodrigo; and having demanded and obtained his protection, returned with him into Arragon, where, having reduced Molina, Ariza, and some other places, he settled them to their satisfaction, and having dismissed his army, began to apply himself to the arts of peace^d.

At the close of the last war, some difference had arisen between the king and the French lords, who had served in his army, whom he had rewarded less liberally than formerly, on account of the number of Mozarabic Christians, for whom he was obliged to provide; and in this discontented humour the French returned home^e. The Moors having intelligence of this, and having received prodigious succours from Morocco, eager to revenge their past losses, resolved to invade his dominions, and assembled a very powerful army for that purpose. The king, on the first intelligence of their design, compromised all matters in dispute with his old friends, and engaged the count of Perebe, the viscount of Bearn, and other lords, to join him with their forces, which, with his own troops, enabled him to secure his frontiers in such a manner as totally disappointed the views of the Infidels^f. The next spring he made an irruption into the kingdom of Valentia, which not only added to the reputation of his arms, but furnished an immense booty to his troops. Amorga the Moorish general, endeavoured to give some check to his progress; but the attempt was only fatal to his own troops. However, Albamin, at the head of a numerous army, having joined Amorga, and having seized the passages in the mountains, the king Don Alonso found it impossible to recover his own territories, being in a manner besieged in the midst of a wild and uncouth country, where it was impossible to subsist, and from which it was equally impossible to remove. In this critical situation he ordered three days of solemn humiliation, to implore the favour of heaven; and on the fourth, which was the sixteenth of August, he caused his provisions to be equally distributed, and when his army were thoroughly refreshed, he attacked the Moors with great fury. The action lasted many hours, was very obstinately fought, and the victory gained by the king, at last, was esteemed one of the most considerable that the Christians ever obtained, and, in consequence of which, he marched without any molestation home^g. He was engaged the next year in a war with Don Alonso, king of Castile, which was quickly compromised, as we have shewn in another place; as another rupture of the same kind was, about two years after, in which the king of Arragon was the aggressor; but being persuaded by his prelates that a war must be unprosperous that was unjust, he retired in time.

THE close connections which the king of Arragon had entered into with the French lords, his neighbours, engaged him in a war on that side, the particular cause of which is no where explained: all we know of the matter is, that he made a descent, with a well appointed army, into Gascony, where he invested and besieged Bayonne. While he was thus employed, the Moors of Lerida, Tortosa, and Valentia, taking advantage of his absence, made incursions into his dominions, against whom the bishop of Huesca and the viscount of Bearn marched

- a with a small body of troops; but engaging with a superior force, were defeated and killed^d. The king Don Alonso, notwithstanding this, continued the siege of Bayonne with that vigour and obstinacy which were natural to him; and, having at last taken it, returned with his forces into his own dominions^e. The disturbances his subjects received from the Moorish A. D. 1133. pirates, who came in small vessels up the Ebro, and the mischiefs that were done by a numerous garrison they had in the old town of Mequinenca, at the confluence of the Segro and the Ebro, determined him to besiege that place, though covered by a fortress that hitherto had been esteemed impregnable. He attacked it with great vigour; and, though the Moors made a gallant defence, he at length carried it by assault, and put the whole garrison to the sword^f. This success encouraged him to invest Fraga, which derives its name from the corruption of Flavia Gallica, by which it was known in the time of the Romans. It stands upon an eminence on the left side of the Cinca, three leagues from Lerida, on the frontiers of Catalonia, strong by its situation in the midst of mountains, having the river before-mentioned in front, the banks of which are inaccessible, and covered behind by a craggy mountain, on which there was a good fortress. It was at this time the capital of a Moorish government, full of a hardy and martial race of people, well fortified for those days, and, though seated in the most sterile parts of Arragon, plentifully supplied with provisions. The king continued before it all the remainder of this year, and the beginning of the next; and, as he was not accustomed to desist from his enterprizes, the French lords, his confederates, and several of his own prelates, brought him great reinforcements early in the spring. On the other hand; Aben Gama, governor of Valentia, assembled all the forces of that province, and made two attempts to raise the siege, but without effect, being as often repulsed by Don Alonso with great loss.

- THE people of Fraga, finding themselves extremely pressed, much diminished in their numbers, and without hopes of relief, offered to surrender the place, provided he would suffer them to march out, and retire where they thought proper, which he refused, insisting upon their submitting at discretion. In the mean time, the forces of Seville, Cordova, and Granada, were advanced into Valentia, where Aben-Gama had likewise received a reinforcement of ten thousand men from Texefin Ben Hall, king of Morocco, and with this numerous and potent army he advanced a third time to the succour of Fraga. It happened unfortunately, that, at this juncture, the king Don Alonso had detached a corps of his best troops, to secure a great convoy of provisions, so that the dispute was extremely unequal. However, upon the approach of the Infidels, the king quitted his camp, and, having made the best disposition he was able, advanced to give them battle. His forces behaved with great intrepidity; and himself, and the nobility about him, exerted all the skill and courage that could be expected from persons grown old in arms, and entured to victory. But at length, being absolutely overpowered by numbers, the army was defeated, the greatest part slain upon the spot, and amongst them the bishops of Huesca and Roda, most of the French nobility who served as auxiliaries, and many also of the lords of Navarre and Arragon^g. The king Don Alonso seeing all lost, made a great effort with seven hundred men, and having penetrated through the Moorish army, continued his route, having passed by Saragossa, to the monastery of St. Juan de la Pena, where he arrived with ten of his great lords, amongst whom was Don Garcia Ramirez; and, falling there into a deep melancholy, he died eight days after of pure grief^h. His body was interred with those of his ancestors, but without any tomb erected to his memory; which, with the concealing of this melancholy event for some days, gave occasion to many strange reports, which, on no better foundation than vulgar tradition, have found a place in some otherwise esteemed histories.

- THIS monarch is justly and universally acknowledged to have been; in all respects, one of the greatest princes of this age. He was, though most conspicuous for his military exploits; one of the mildest and most courteous princes that ever sat on a throne; and it was this that gained him, almost at first sight, the esteem and affection of all the Castilian nobility, who had the prosperity of their country at heart, and were not bent upon raising fortunes by scandalous intrigues, or base complacencies at the court of queen Urraca. He was very religious, according to the notions of that age in which he lived, and very liberal to the clergy, which renders very improbable what the Castilian writers say of his plundering the churches during the war in that country. He added to his hereditary kingdom of Arragon, Saragossa, Tudela, Tarrazona, Calatayud, Daroca, and a great extent of country on the south side of the Ebro; so that he may, with propriety, be stiled the founder of the modern kingdom of Arragon, since he rendered it by his victories, and left it at his death, two thirds larger than when it descended to him. Some ancient writers say, that the battle of Fraga was the twenty-ninth he had fought against the Moors, to whom he was an implacable and terrible enemy^a. It is certain that this monarch left his dominions in very great confusion; but, though it is generally reported, Mariana makes no scruple of recording it as a fact out of dispute, that, by a will made at the siege of Bayonne, he disposed of all his territories to the knights templars, the knights of St. John, and the guardians of the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem^w. Yet the story has such an air of fable, that it has been justly rejected by the best judges of history, as being to the full as improbable as the tale of his going privately to Jerusalem, after the battle of Fraga, and performing great exploits against the Infidels in the Holy Land.^b

It is however certain, that, whatever will he made, or was made for him (since forgery was not unknown in those times) his subjects took not the least notice of it; but as soon as they were recovered a little from that consternation into which they were thrown by the irruption of the Infidels after their late victory, they began to consider how to repair this loss, by setting a new prince upon the throne. It is generally agreed, that a meeting for this purpose was held at Borja, on the frontiers of both kingdoms, for the electing a king of Arragon and Navarre; where disagreeing, the former adjourned to Huesca, and the latter to Pampeluna. But, all circumstances strictly weighed, it seems at least as probable, that Don Ramiro, brother to the two last kings, and who was a monk in the monastery of St. Pons de Tomiers, in the diocese of Narbonne, was proclaimed king at Huesca; and that the people of Navarre took this opportunity of shaking off a yoke which they had born but very impatiently, and setting up Don Garcia Ramirez, who was a direct descendant from their ancient kings. By this means these monarchies were again separated; and this with circumstances which excited great heart-burning and jealousy between the two nations.

At the time of his accession to the throne, it is very clear that Don Ramiro the second had been forty-one years a monk^x: some writers assert, that he had been abbot of Sahagun, afterwards bishop of Burgos, then of Pampeluna, and at this time of Balbastro; but of this there are no clear proofs^y. He was no sooner seated on the throne, than it was judged expedient that he should have a wife, and application for this purpose was likewise made to Anacletus, who then assumed the title of pope at Avignon; and, in virtue of a dispensation from him, the king espoused Donna Ines, or Agnes, sister to William, duke of Aquitaine,^d who, it appears, from the French historians, was a widow^z. It is somewhat doubtful, whether, before or after the celebration of this marriage, Don Alonso, king of Castile, entered the frontiers of Arragon, and advanced towards Saragossa. Some authors say, that Don Ramiro was so much amazed at the approach of a force which it was not at all in his power to resist, that he retired immediately into the impenetrable mountains and forests of Sobrarva; but the historians of Castile, who lived nearest these times, affirm quite the contrary; and their account deserves the more credit, as it is perfectly natural and probable. They say, that Don Alonso declared, that he did not enter Arragon as an enemy, or as forming any pretensions to the crown; but that, on the contrary, respecting the memory of their late king, whom he had been formerly accustomed to stile father, he came to protect them against the Moors, and to prevent their making any lasting advantage of their late good fortune; which act of friendship was very kindly taken, and his offer, so generously made, very thankfully accepted^a. Upon which Don Alonso put a strong garrison into the city of Saragossa, and then retired. At first sight, this may seem to have been no more than a political feint to get possession of so considerable a place; but, if we consider the situation things were in, the danger to which the kingdom was exposed from the consequences of domestic troubles, and the efforts of a foreign enemy, and that, as soon as the people of Arragon were in a condition to keep and defend it, Saragossa was again put into their hands, we shall see plainly that Don Alonso of Castile acted like a wise and great prince, and upon motives much more noble than those of a conqueror. It did him great honour to have succoured and protected a neighbouring prince, which was also his interest, for the sake of his own dominions; and it reflected no discredit on Don Ramiro, that he was very grateful for so high a favour, and received his benefactor with all possible marks of deference and esteem. This was certainly a more prudent and a more royal manner of proceeding than hiding himself in woods and caverns, and abandoning his country and his subjects to the mercy of a stranger, who, if this had been his conduct, would probably not have treated him so well^b.

- a THE distaste which had arisen between the two nations, rose in a short time so high, that it was very near producing a rupture between the crowns of Arragon and Navarre, though against all the rules of policy, and without any just cause on either side; but, by the interposition of the prelates, this difference was compromised, the kings were each of them to hold their respective dominions, to which Don Ramiro consented, because he knew himself unable to conquer Navarre; and, on the other hand, Don Garcia was willing to do homage to Don Ramiro, as well on account of his being the brother of his late sovereign, and much his superior in age, as because he was in hopes, on his demise without children, he might succeed him in the throne^c. They were both disappointed in their views, for this was far from producing a settled peace; and, towards the end of this year, or the beginning of the
- b next, the queen of Arragon was delivered of a daughter, who was styled the Infanta Petronilla^d. We have seen that, notwithstanding his claim of right, the accession of Don Ramiro to the crown of Arragon was, in a great measure, owing to the affection of his people; but, as there is nothing more common than for them to grow quickly sick of their own choice, so it seems Don Ramiro very speedily experienced the truth of this observation. Some very ancient chronicles report, with circumstances that render it probable this report was not without some foundation, that he took a very singular method of recovering the respect due to his authority. In order to this, he directed an assembly of the states at Huesca, where he suddenly seized and put to death the most turbulent of the nobility^e. It is added, according to the custom of this age, that, having sent to the abbot of St. Pons de Tomiers for his advice, he carried his messengers into the garden of the convent, and with a scymitar cut off the tops of the highest plants, bidding them report to the king what they had seen him do, from whence Don Ramiro took the hint, as indeed it might be easily taken, of this rigorous proceeding. As this circumstance seems to have been invented, or rather copied, for the amusement of the great vulgar, so there was another continued for the amusement of grosser understandings: the king is said to have given out before this assembly, that he would cause a bell to be made, the sound of which should be heard throughout his dominions: in order to keep his word, he caused the heads of fifteen of the most seditious to be nailed round the bottom of a wooden bell frame, and, having shewn this shocking sight to their nearest relations, told them this was the bell he meant, and that he would toll it at their expence, if they had not wit enough to change their conduct from this example. As this tradition of the bell of Huesca subsists to this hour, and as some very ancient writers report, not only the fact of the king's putting the chief of the nobility to death, but mention also their names, and assure us, that there were five of the noble family of Luna, though it is easy to conceive the circumstances fabulous, it is very hard to believe the whole a fiction^f.
- c It is, however, a glaring mistake that some have committed, who have reported that this bold action had its effect; and that, as before no prince could be more contemned, so afterwards none was ever better obeyed. The truth, however, is directly the reverse; for either this or some other act of that unfortunate prince, or the whole strain of his administration, lost him the affections of his people to such a degree, that he took a sudden, and, in his situation, a wise resolution of resigning the government, which, in all probability, he heartily repented he had ever undertaken. The method he took in doing this was so proper and prudent, that we may reasonably conclude it was the effects of mature deliberation. When he had digested his design in his own mind, he called an assembly of the states at Balbastro, where, on the 11th of August, he acquainted them with the resolution he had taken of giving his daughter and heiress Petronilla in marriage to Don Raymond, count of Barcelona, in case she should live to an age fit to become his wife; that in case of her decease before that time, it was his desire that he should enjoy the kingdom; and that, for the present, as he was desirous of leading a life of repose, he would put the administration into his hands, with the title of count or prince, which, with the consent of that assembly, he did, and then retired to Huesca, where he lived privately with the clergy belonging to the church of St. Peter, for the space of ten years (within five days), without ever shewing the least inclination to recover that diadem which he had so willingly quitted^g. Those therefore who have described this prince as a weak or wicked man, seem not to have considered his history attentively. He was a king but three years, and could not in that short space do much to the prejudice of his subjects. - He found that a palace was no fit habitation for one who had spent forty years in a convent; a weak man would hardly have found this out. He executed his purpose, which required no small degree of fortitude; and he knew how to set a just value on that quiet, for the sake of which he resigned a crown. If from these circumstances, which is all that we know of his conduct, they can collect that he was either wicked or weak, they must have more penetration than we pretend to. However, leaving this to the reader's reflection, we shall proceed with our history.

Rapture between Don Raymond and the king of Navarre.

Don Raymond, upon whom the king devolved his whole authority, with the consent of his people, assumed the title of prince of Arragon^b, preserving also that of count of Barcelona, which was his own title. As the emperor, Don Alonso of Castile, had married his sister, and as, in his own right, he possessed dominions little if at all inferior to those of Arragon, it does not appear, that, either with regard to himself or his subjects, the old king could have made a better choice. But, from the moment he assumed the government, he had Don Garcia Ramirez, king of Navarre, for his determined enemy; it may be on account of his having promised himself the good fortune at which Don Raymond was arrived. However that may be, their disputes quickly produced a rupture, in consequence of which, the king of Arragon entered into a league with Don Alonso of Castile, and the king of Navarre with Don Alonso of *Portugal*ⁱ. The emperor, to shew his affection for his brother-in-law, and to bring the war to as speedy an issue as possible, made an irruption into Navarre, and penetrated as far as Pampeluna, which he invested. This might possibly have had its intended effect, if in the mean time Don Garcia of Navarre had not defeated the prince of Arragon on the frontiers, with considerable loss, which constrained the emperor to raise the siege, in order to march to Don Raymond's assistance^k. Before the close of the year, these two princes concluded a treaty, and Don Raymond was left to take what care he could of himself; he had already a war with Navarre, and another with the Moors, upon his hands, when another cross accident happened, which gave him a good deal of trouble. Certain agents from the knights templars came into Arragon to claim the benefit of the late Don Alonso's testament, which the prince of Arragon, by his prudence and dexterity, converted to his own advantage. He told them that such of the knights templars as were willing to repair thither should be amply provided for; and, as a proof that he intended to make good his promise, he gave them the town of Calatayud, where they erected the church of the holy sepulchre. This agreement was ratified by the pope and the patriarch of Jerusalem^l. Some time after, he held an assembly of the states at Giron, where, with the consent of the nobles and prelates, he made a cession to those knights of six strong castles, with large revenues, upon condition that they should defend his frontier against the Infidels in his wars, with whom he was very successful; but while he was thus employed, the king of Navarre took from him Tarrazona and some other places of less importance^m.

At the request of the prince Don Raymond, the emperor once more interposed with the king of Navarre; and finding that monarch more stubborn than he expected, had recourse to arms; but he being a widower, and proposing to marry the emperor's natural daughter, that offer was accepted, and a truce only concluded between the crowns of Arragon and *Navarre*ⁿ. This was indeed a measure absolutely requisite, since Don Raymond Berenger, count of Provence, brother to the prince of Arragon, had been traiterously killed in his own dominions, it was requisite for the prince Don Raymond to go thither to preserve the succession to his nephew, which he happily performed^o. The truce was prolonged to another year, on account of the prince of Arragon's assisting the emperor in the famous siege of Almeria, at which he was present, and likewise furnished a considerable naval force^p. On the 6th of August, this year, died Don Ramiro the second^q, by which his daughter, who was yet a child, became queen in her own right. In the next, the prince Don Raymond executed the scheme he had formed at the siege of Almeria, for depriving the Mohammedans of the strong city and convenient port of Tortosa, in order to which he had demanded the assistance of the count of Montpellier, the republic of Genoa, and other maritime powers; which great design he so happily conducted, that on the last day of the year he became master of the place, and very honourably fulfilled the promises he had made to all his allies, giving the Genoese and the count of Montpellier each a third part of the revenues of the place, and reserving no more to himself^r. The next year he pushed the war against the Moors with such success, that he made himself master of Fraga and of Lerida, to which last city he restored the episcopal see that had been placed at Roda, then in Balbastro, while this place remained in the hands of the Infidels; and soon after, by a pragmatic sanction, secured the sees in his dominions from being impoverished by himself or successors^s.

- a As Donna Petronilla, heiress of Arragon, was now in her fifteenth year, Don Raymond, Esposes Donna Petronilla; daughter to the late king. pursuant to the will of her father, married her with great solemnity at *Lerida*¹, in the presence of the principal nobility and prelates of Arragon and Catalonia: at the same time he re-settled the episcopal see at Tortosa, and marked out the ancient boundaries of its diocese². On occasion of the emperor's nuptials; and those of Don Sancho, king of Navarre, the prince of Arragon went to Soria, and concluded a truce with that monarch upon his marriage with his niece³. This gave him an opportunity of making an irruption into the territory of the Moors, where he took several places, and amongst the rest the castle of Mirabet, by assault, which he afterwards put into the hands of the knights templars⁴. He also took the Moorish king of Valentia and Murcia under his protection. When the truce was expired, which he had made with the king of Navarre, he attacked that kingdom with some degree of success; and having concluded an alliance with the emperor, in virtue of which his young son Don Alonso, who was yet in his cradle, was to marry the Infanta Donna Sancho of Castile, he prevailed upon that prince to join with him once more against Navarre; the hopes, however, which he had from thence, were speedily dissipated by the death of that monarch⁵. This event produced another; which the prince of Arragon did not at all expect. Don Sancho, king of Navarre, had a numerous army in the field, with which he had already recovered the valley of Rancal, which Don Raymond had taken from him; but, on a sudden changing his measures, he represented to the prince of Arragon the folly of their proceedings, offered to bury in oblivion all former grudges, and to restore the city of Tarazona, in order to obtain a solid and lasting peace, to which, as it was all he ever sought, Don Raymond readily agreed: and thus this war, which, with little intermission, had lasted from the separation of the two crowns, was happily concluded to their mutual satisfaction⁶. Concludes a solid peace with the king of Navarre. 1157.
- In a short time after the death of the emperor, his son Don Sancho, king of Castile, entered into a close alliance with the prince of Arragon, his uncle, in which, however, the homage was reserved to the crown of Castile, which it is fit we should explain⁷. It is certain that it did not regard the ancient kingdom of Arragon, which never had any dependance upon Castile, but arose from that transaction which we have before mentioned of the emperor's taking the city of Saragossa, and the country on the south side of the Ebro, into his protection; for which, according to the custom of that age, he thought fit to exact homage. We shall hereafter have occasion to shew when and how this homage was remitted. As Don Raymond had considerable dominions in France, which made it requisite for him to be on good terms with Henry the second of England, who, in right of his wife, was become duke of Aquitaine, he accepted an invitation given him by that monarch, which produced an interview at the castle of Blaye; and, in consequence of that, a strict alliance between the two princes: amongst other things, it was agreed, that the king's younger son Richard, who, by the death of his elder brother Henry, became afterwards his successor, should espouse Donna Berengara, daughter to count Raymond, and should be declared duke of *Aquitaine*⁸. A war breaking out the next year between the king of England, as duke of Aquitaine, and Raymond, count of Toulouse, the prince of Arragon went, in person, at the head of a considerable body of troops to the assistance of his allies. The year following he made another campaign in support of his nephew Raymond, count of Provence; and, upon this occasion, he had an interview with the emperor Frederic, with whom he entered into a close alliance⁹. That monarch having formed a design of deposing pope Alexander the third, passed into Italy for that purpose, and held a kind of congress at Turin, to which repaired all the princes of his party. Amongst the rest, Don Raymond, prince of Arragon, intending to be present, made a journey into Italy, but falling sick upon the road, he was carried to a place called Dalmace, not far from Turin, where he breathed his last, August the fifteenth, one thousand one hundred and sixty-two. His body was carried back into Spain, and buried with his ancestors, in the convent of the Benedictines, at *Ripol*¹⁰. Interview between the kings of Arragon and England, at the castle of Blaye. 1159.
- f As soon as the funeral honours to her husband were over, the queen Donna Petronilla assembled the states at Huesca, and there, agreeable to the declaration of the prince Don Raymond upon his death bed, she assigned to their eldest son the kingdom of Arragon, and the county of Barcelona; to their second son Don Pedro she gave the county of Cerdagna, and all that he possessed besides in France, substituting his younger brother Don Sancho to that succession, in case he should die without heirs male¹¹. She reserved to herself the tutelage of Don Alonso who died after the battle of Fraga.

her eldest son, and the government of the kingdom of Arragon: she committed the administration of Catalonia to Don Raymond Berenger, count of Provente; and recommended her two younger sons to the protection of Henry the second of England: at the same time she renewed the treaty with Don Sancho king of Navarre^f. The peace of Arragon, notwithstanding all these precautions, was quickly interrupted, by the appearance of an impostor, who took upon him the name of the king Don Alonso, pretending, that, after the battle of Fraga, he had passed over to Syria, had served in the Holy Land against the Infidels, and was now returned to govern his own dominions. Some resemblance of person, a steady assurance, and other circumstances, enabled him to gain some credit with the vulgar; but the queen, causing him to be apprehended at Saragossa, put him publicly to death; and thereby restored the peace of the kingdom^g. One sees nothing of weakness or folly in the conduct of this princess, whom it is certain that the historians of Arragon treat with great respect and esteem; notwithstanding which, Mariana will have it, that, through her want of capacity to administer the government, a resolution was taken to place her son on the throne. It is certain that such a resolution was taken; but other writers affirm, that it was through the queen's free choice, who was desirous of seeing her son acknowledged and fixed on the throne of Arragon in her life-time^h.

It was with this view that she caused an assembly of the states to be held at Barcelona, where, on the fourteenth of June, she made a free resignation in favour of the prince her son, whom she carried afterwards, for the same purpose, to Saragossa; upon which occasion public proclamation was made by the states, that such lords as held either castles or fortresses from the crown should immediately resign their governments into the hands of the king, on pain of being deprived of their dignities, having their estates confiscated, and their persons banished; and all persons were forbid to violate the treaties subsisting with neighbouring princes, under pain of death, and the confiscation of their estatesⁱ. It may not be amiss to observe here, that, according to most historians, this young prince was baptized by, and during his father's life-time bore, the name of Raymond, which he now changed for that of Alonso, as more acceptable to the people of Arragon^k. It is likewise probable, that his sister, whom most of the historians call Donna Dulcia, was likewise called Berengara; and, besides her, it will appear that he had another sister, whose name was Donna Leonora^l. We may see, from their want of accuracy in matters of this nature, that the ancient memoirs of Arragon were very short and imperfect; so that much of those ample histories that are now extant, must have been supplied from conjecture, and from comparison with other Spanish histories.

Subject of the next section.

We have now completed this section, and have therein traced those accessions, by which, from a very slender beginning, the realm of Arragon grew to be what it now is. The reader likewise sees how, in virtue of the marriage between the count of Barcelona and the heiress of this monarchy, the noble country of Catalonia was annexed to this crown; and, from the accession of power arising from thence, Abenlope, the Moorish prince of Valentia, came to seek the protection, and to own himself the vassal, of the prince of Arragon, which afforded the monarchs of Arragon the first pretensions to that fruitful kingdom. The making these matters plain, so that the original, the augmentation, and the conjunction of states, may be truly known, and clearly understood, is one principal point of Universal History. It is therefore, in the present case, to render that as complete as possible, that we propose, in the next section, to give a succinct history of the principality of Catalonia; or, which will be found to amount to the same thing, to trace out the succession of the counts of Barcelona, and their gradual acquisitions of power and territory, by which it will be rendered evident what a vast advantage ensued to the crown of Arragon, from the annexing of this maritime province to its dominions; which, in process of time, led to far greater things, and enabled these monarchs to make the figure they did; whereas if they had continued to be circumscribed within the bounds of their inland territories, they could have been very little known to the rest of Europe.

S E C T. IX.

The history of the county of Barcelona, and the county of Catalonia, from the time of the erecting of that county, at the beginning of the ninth century, to its conjunction with the realm of Arragon, by the marriage of the count Don Raymond the fifth with the Infanta Donna Petronilla, heiress of that kingdom, the children of which marriage enjoyed both sovereignties.

- ^a THE descriptions in this part of our work are suited to the history, and are only inserted to render it intelligible. As for example: The country of Catalonia, of which we are going to speak, is precisely that which the count Don Raymond the fifth annexed to the kingdom of Arragon; which was not only far greater than the antient county of Barcelona, the original patrimony of his ancestors, but also considerably more extensive than the principality of Catalonia, as it now stands; comprehending in it, besides Catalonia, or, as the Spaniards always write it, Cataluna, the countries of Roussillon and Cerdana, or Cerdagna, best part of which are now in the hands of the French^a. This country, as it then stood, had Languedoc on the north, the Pyrenees, the country of Ribagorça, and the kingdom of Arragon, on the west, a corner of the same kingdom, and a part of that of Valentia, to the south, with the Mediterranean on the east; stretching about seventy leagues from south to north, and, where broadest, not much less from west to east: the air is, generally speaking, pure and wholesome; the climate perfectly pleasant, and not so very hot in the middle of summer as in most other provinces in Spain. The greatest part of this country is mountainous; but there are several large and beautiful plains, and more especially those of Urgel, Cerdagna, Vic Gironne, Tarragona, and Panades. The mountains themselves are far from being barren, since they are every-where covered with forests of excellent timber, are not destitute of fruit trees, and abound with odoriferous shrubs and medicinal herbs. There are few countries better watered, though none of its rivers are very large. It is plentifully furnished with edible roots, wine, fruit, and corn, as also flax and hemp. There are in it many inexhaustible quarries of marble of all sorts, such as alabaster, &c. and as to stones of higher value, jasper, amethysts, lapis lazuli, and the hematites, or blood stone, are found here in considerable quantities^b. Here-
^b tofore, it is said, there were mines of gold and silver; and of the former of these precious metals, there are still some grains found in the sand of the Segro, and some other rivers; but there are still mines of tin, lead, iron, allom, vitriol, and salt; and on the coast, which is near ninety leagues in extent, there is a very valuable coral fishery^c.

- As to the antient inhabitants of this province, they were the Castellani, Auxitani, Indigites, Cositani, with part of the Ibercones and Jaccitani^d. Some have conceived that it derived its name from the first of these people^e; others again think it more probable^f, that it derived its name from the Catelauni, an antient people in Gaul; but the most probable account of the matter is this: upon the decline of the Roman empire, the Alani seized the best part of this province, of which they were, in some measure, dispossessed by the Goths; and at length mixing together and becoming one people, they came to be called Gothalani, and their country Gothalonia, which, by degrees, was softened into Catalonia^g. The Moors pushed their conquests hither in the beginning of the eighth century, but they had at best but an unquiet possession; and the potent emperor Charlemagne attacked them frequently, and with so much vigour, that the Moorish governors in most of the considerable places were content to acknowledge themselves his vassals^h. This, however, as it arose from constraint, seldom lasted longer than there was a force at hand to keep them within bounds; and in their repeated revolts they were guilty of such excesses, that at length Lewis the Mild determined to make an absolute conquest, and to leave therein such a competent force as might effectually secure this frontier against the *Infidels*ⁱ.

At the opening of the ninth century, the Moors, who were in possession of Barcelona, were under the government of Zade, who had more than once abused the clemency of Charlemagne, and at length so irritated, by his perfidious behaviour, Lewis king of Aquitaine, son of that conqueror, that he gave orders to his generals to invest Barcelona, and not to rise from before it till they had put Zade into his hands. The Moor, comprehending his danger, made a most obstinate resistance, so that the siege lasted many months; at length, finding it impossible to preserve the city any longer, and that it was in vain to expect any relief, he determined, or rather was compelled by the inhabitants, to go to the Christian camp, and implore the emperor's mercy; where he no sooner arrived, than he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Charlemagne, who condemned him to perpetual exile*. The people of Barcelona gaining nothing by this expedient, continued to hold out for six weeks longer, when the king of Aquitaine, having joined his army, took the command of the siege, to whom they made a proposal, that, if he would permit them to march out, and retire whither they pleased, they would surrender the place: to this proposal having given his consent, he made his public entry into Barcelona, where he formed a project of extending the bounds of his father's empire as far as the Ebro; but, being recalled before he could put this design in execution, he appointed Bera count of Barcelona, and instructed him in the measures necessary to be taken for the perfecting his plan¹. b

This count Bera held his government about eighteen years, and in the beginning acted with great vigour and success against the Moors, which encouraged the governors of Huesca and Saragossa to throw off the yoke of Albacan king of Cordova, and to put themselves under the protection of Charlemagne, which, however, did not screen them from the resentment of their old master². After the death of Charlemagne, the emperor Lewis committed his conquests in Spain to the care of his son Lothaire; and finding that a peace with the Moors was more prejudicial than war, broke it; soon after which count Bera was recalled, upon a discovery that, in imitation of the Moorish governors, he was carrying on secret intrigues to render him- c self independent³. Sanila, a considerable officer under him, who brought this charge against him, offered, according to the custom of those times, to make it good by combat. They fought accordingly on horseback; and Bera, being overcome, forfeited his life, according to the laws then in force: but the emperor, naturally compassionate, commuted his punishment, and banished him to Roan during his life⁴.

He was succeeded in his government by count Bernard, son to William duke of Thoulouse, who carried on the war against the Infidels with great vigour, which raised him so high in his master's favour, that he made him his lord high chamberlain, and, as some say, his prime minister⁵. This had a bad effect; for he began, immediately after, to oppress the clergy in his government, and had a great hand in the disturbances which broke out in the emperor's d family, who thereupon deprived him of his dignities⁶. In resentment of this he induced the people of Burgundy to revolt in favour of Pepin, and soon after seized Thoulouse, depending on the protection of Pepin, who, by his advice, declared himself soon after king of *Aquitaine*⁷. On the death, however, of the emperor Lewis, he reconciled himself to his successor Charles the Bald; but, as he still continued his intrigues, that monarch became jealous of him, and summoned him to repair to an assembly of the states, which was held in the neighbourhood of Thoulouse. The count, finding he had not strength enough to execute his design, went boldly thither, in hopes of pacifying that monarch by a feigned submission. But, when he came into his presence, and fell upon his knees to do him homage, the emperor, as he attempted to rise, caught hold of him with his left hand, and, with his right, drawing a dag- c ger out of his bosom, stabbed him to the heart⁸. His son William attempted to make some disturbances, and entered, according to his father's example, into a close correspondence with the *Moors*⁹.

*ALEDRA*N was declared count of Barcelona by the emperor, and kept possession of it for four years¹⁰; at the end of which space William, by the help of his intrigues, formed a strong party there; and, by the assistance of Abderaman, king of Cordova, made himself master of the place, and of a great part of Catalonia, his competitor making his escape with some difficulty¹¹. As for count William, having procured a strong reinforcement of Moors, he undertook the conquest of all that the French possessed in those parts, and was at first so fortunate as to seize the counts Ademare and Issembard, whom he carried prisoners to Barcelona, and f afterwards, with a potent army, besieged Gironne; but miscarrying in this enterprize, and, returning to Barcelona, the two counts his prisoners found means to excite a tumult, in which count William was killed, and the place thereupon returned to the obedience of the emperor¹². Things, however, were so ill managed, and so little care was taken of so important a place, that, two years after, it was taken and plundered by the famous Moorish general Musa, governor of Saragossa, who might have kept it, if he had not, at that time, meditated a a revolt, which induced him to return into his own government^r. After this we find one Sunifred there, with the title of viscount, which implies that he was the deputy of another lord, to whom the government was committed, and who, very probably, was the person we find next mentioned in history with the title of count of Barcelona^z.

THIS person was Hunfrid, or Wifrid, who, it is said, had also the title of marquis of Gothia, and duke of Septimania; which implies, that, besides Barcelona, he was intrusted with the administration of all that belonged to the empire in these parts; so that a considerable district in the southern provinces of France, with part of Navarre, Arragon, and Catalonia, were under his jurisdiction^a: yet, it seems, he was not satisfied, because king Charles, surnamed the Bald, had bestowed Thoulouse, and the places adjacent, upon count Raymond, and of which, notwithstanding, he despoiled him, upon pretence that they belonged to his government. This so provoked the king, that he removed Wifrid from his employment, in the succeeding year, or at least divided this large government into two, restraining him to the countries on the other side of the Alps; which, it seems, he considered as a great injustice^b. At this time one count Solomon was intrusted with Cerdagna, but under the orders of Wifrid. This count, whether prompted by duty or resentment is not very clear, accused him of Barcelona of certain crimes, which occasioned his being summoned to Narbonne; where, being insulted in a tumult, and a man having had the boldness to pull him by the beard, he, in the first transport of his choler, killed him upon the spot; and endeavouring afterwards to force a passage for his escape, was cut to pieces by those who seized him for the murder^c. His son, who was of the same name, was conducted prisoner to king Charles, who expressed great concern for his father's misfortune; and, promising him his protection, sent him into Flanders, to be brought up under the care of that monarch's own sister, who had a great respect for him^d.

THE county of Barcelona was, for the present, bestowed upon Solomon, the informer; of whose administration there is not the smallest circumstance to be found; nor does it appear whether he died, or was removed to make way for count Wifrid the second, son of Wifrid the first; who proving a person of great virtue and piety, as well as of singular charity, was very soon restored to his father's employment, and is considered as the first count of Barcelona who had any share of sovereign authority; inasmuch, as he did homage for this city and country, and was to hold it as a fief from the kings of France, for himself and his heirs^e.

WIFRID II. surnamed Velloso, that is, the Hairy, and also the Warlike, taking advantage of the dissensions amongst the Moors, began to extend his dominions, making himself master of Solsona and Cordona, both of which he fortified, and established his affairs on so solid a foundation, that he had little to fear from the Infidels; who, though they attempted to invade his territories with a great army, were constrained to retire with a considerable loss, and soon after they sued to him for peace^f. He was the founder of the Benedictine monastery of Ripol: himself, and his countess Vinilda, were present at the consecration, on the twenty-fifth of July, and one of his sons became a monk in that house, which was ever after much favoured by the princes of his family^g. He ruled in Catalonia thirty-seven years with great reputation, and had by his countess before-mentioned four sons, Ranulpho, who became a monk, Wifrid, who died in the life-time of his father, Miron, who succeeded him, and Seniofredo, upon whom he bestowed the county of Urgel. His countess dying before him, he espoused a second time a lady who survived him, and whose name was Garfinda, and, by his own direction, was interred in the monastery of Ripol, which became thenceforward the burying place of the counts of Barcelona^h.

MIRON, count of Barcelona, appears to have been an inactive prince, since we find little or nothing recorded of him in history, though he enjoyed this principality seventeen years; neither do we know whom he married; but at his demise he left behind him three sons, Seniofredo, who succeeded him, Oliva, to whom he gave the county of Cerdagna, and Mira, upon whom he bestowed that of Gironne, though, in his catalogue, Mariana makes him bishop of that place: as these children were in their nonage, at the time of his decease, their uncle, the count of Urgel, took the administration during their minorityⁱ.

SENIOFRED, count of Barcelona, was put in possession of his dominions by his uncle, who governed them with great prudence and fidelity, and took the same care of his brethren^k. This young count married the daughter of Don Sanchez Abarca, king of Navarre^l, by whom he had no issue, and, after a long reign, in which he did little, deceased, and was buried in the monastery of Ripol^m. Both his brothers were living at the time of his death, and yet he ^a was succeeded by

BORELO, his cousin, son to Seniofredo, count of *Urgel*ⁿ; but by what colour of right, or whether by force, as Mariana suggests^o, or by procuring the investiture from the crown of France, as Ferreras^p conjectures, is not very clear. This prince made a journey to Rome, in order to settle the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in his dominions; for the city of Taragona being in the hands of the Moors, all the bishops in his territories were under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Narbonne, which was attended with such inconveniencies, that the pope, at his request, declared the bishop of Ossona metropolitan of Catalonia, till such time as Tarragona should be recovered out of the hands of the Infidels^q. But as the count had not taken the precaution to apply first to his lord paramount, the king of France, this regulation did not ^b take effect^r. He was very assiduous in improving, fortifying, and adorning, the chief towns in his territories, and very fortunate in the defence of them against the Moors, till Mohammed Almanzar, who conceived some particular dislike to this prince, made an irruption into Catalonia, with a prodigious army, in which he committed most horrid depredations. Count Borelo, who could not bear to see the miseries of his subjects, advanced, with such an army as he was able to raise, to Moncada, where he gave the enemy battle, and where he had the misfortune to be so totally defeated, that, in all probability, no part of his army would have been preserved, if the adjacent mountains and forests had not secured them from the pursuit of a barbarous and implacable enemy^s. Mohammed Almanzar proceeded directly to Barcelona, and finding but a small garrison, attacked and carried it by assault. A great part of ^c the inhabitants was put to the sword; he carried away most of the rest; and, having left a body of troops in the fortress, set fire to the city, in which all the archives, records, and titles, public and private, were consumed, which is the true reason that the history of this principality is so imperfect^t. Count Borelo, in this distress, applied for assistance to Lewis the fourth of France; to whom he represented, that what the Infidels aimed at was to make a road through Catalonia into his dominions: upon which suggestion a great corps of troops was immediately sent to his assistance; with whom, having joined the remains of his own army, he returned immediately to Barcelona, which he attacked and carried sword in hand; and, having destroyed all the Mohammedans he found therein, applied himself, with the utmost diligence, to repair and re-people the place^u. The rest of his reign was spent in culti- ^d vating the arts of peace, and in fortifying his frontier in such a manner, as to prevent his subjects from suffering any misfortune of the like kind in time to come. He deceased in the month of October, in the year of our Lord nine hundred and ninety-three^w, and left several children, but of these we have no distinct account.

DON RAYMOND his son succeeded at the age of twenty-one, and proved a prince of great virtue and valour^x. The Moors, with a prodigious army, attempted to invade his country; but Don Raymond, assisted by his brother-in-law, Don Ermengild, count of Urgel, gave them such a reception, that they were glad to retire: upon which the two counts fell upon their frontiers, and returned with a great booty^y. Things were now so well settled in Catalonia, that the count held an assembly of the states, which is mentioned here, because it seems to be ^e the first which had been held at Barcelona, since it was recovered by the Christians^z; and the fame of Don Raymond was so great, that both by the Christians and Moors he was equally respected. Mohammed Almahadi, being dispossessed of the kingdom of Cordova by Zulima, applied himself, by the advice of his prime minister Alhamer, to the count of Barcelona, for his assistance, promising to give him some places that lay very conveniently, in case he would enable him to remount the throne. The count Don Raymond, having consulted his nobility and prelates, accepted this proposition; and, having assembled the whole force of his dominions, he joined the Moorish army, and directed their march towards Cordova^a. On the road they were surprized by Zulima, who attacked them so vigorously, while they were in disorder, that he killed great numbers, and amongst them Ermengild count of Urgel, Aetius bishop ^f of Barcelona, Arnulph bishop of Vich, and Otho bishop of Gironne^b. Don Raymond himself was in the rear, with a good number of his own forces, behind whom he rallied, and formed the flying remains of the broken army; and, when Zulima thought there was nothing left but a pursuit, charged him so roughly, that, after a short dispute, he deprived him of that victory which he thought secure, and pushed his success so briskly, that he conducted Mohammed Almahadi in triumph to Cordova, and seated him again upon the throne^c. After this he a governed his dominions in splendour and peace, till at length he departed this life, in the year A. Don Berenger, count of Barcelona, being arrived at full age, and, having assumed the government ^{as Moret} ^{and Salazar} assure us, the daughter of Don Sancho count of Gascony. He seems to have been a prince of a very pacific spirit, for which reason none of the Spanish historians have given themselves the trouble of recording his actions; all we know of them is, that he deceased in the year of our Lord one thousand and thirty-five, and that he was interred in the monastery of Ripol ¹. He left behind him three sons, Raymond his successor, Guillormo count of Manreso, and Sancho, who, in process of time, enjoyed the same county.

Don Raymond the second was a prince of great parts and piety ², and not at all inclined to pass his days in the same obscurity that his father had done: he espoused at first Donna Beatrice, and afterwards Donna Almari, the daughter of the count of Limoges; held various assemblies of his states at Barcelona, in which he regulated the civil and ecclesiastical dominions; in one of which he amicably compromised some differences that had arisen between him and his grandmother the countess Ermisenda, and gave her, in lieu of the places she held, one thousand ounces of gold ³. He took from the Moorish king of Saragossa, Manresa, and several other places ⁴. The cathedral church of Barcelona being old and decayed, the count Don Raymond rebuilt it entirely, and caused it to be consecrated with great solemnity on the eighth of November, at which time the Moor Ali, king of Denia, Majorca, Minorca, and Ivica, confirmed to the bishop of Barcelona his spiritual jurisdiction over the Christians in his dominions ⁵. Ten years after this he held a famous council at Gironne, in which were present the pope's legate, the archbishop of Narbonne, in quality of metropolitan, and all the bishops in his dominions, and in which various canons were made. It was this prince who introduced into his dominions the titles of viscount, baron, and vavasor; and, by several other wife regulations, rendered himself rich and potent, and his people secure and happy: he was by much the most eminent of the princes of this family; and, dying full of years and glory, ⁶ ⁷ ⁸ ⁹ ¹⁰ ¹¹ ¹² ¹³ ¹⁴ ¹⁵ ¹⁶ ¹⁷ ¹⁸ ¹⁹ ²⁰ ²¹ ²² ²³ ²⁴ ²⁵ ²⁶ ²⁷ ²⁸ ²⁹ ³⁰ ³¹ ³² ³³ ³⁴ ³⁵ ³⁶ ³⁷ ³⁸ DON Raymond Arnaldo, or Don Raymond the fourth, became the heir of Don Bernard a count of Besalu, in virtue of an agreement made between them, during their life-times, which added to his dominions and his territories ^z. He espoused Donna Aldonca, or Dulce, the daughter of Gilbert count of Provence, and the heirs of that noble country ^a. Two years after this he entered into a league with Aymer viscount of Narbonne, William count of Montpellier, and other neighbouring princes, against the Moors in Majorca, who were continually pillaging their coasts, and more especially those of Catalonia. When they came to execute their scheme, they found that nothing could be done without a naval force, and they could not altogether muster up so much as a small squadron. By the interposition of pope Paschal the second, they prevailed upon the Pisans to furnish them with a fleet, on board of which they put as many troops as the vessels of which it was composed could transport, and, being debarked in Majorca, took and destroyed that nest of pirates; and it is highly probable that this first put those princes upon aiming at a naval force, which they afterwards accomplished ^b. Don Bernard count of Cordagna, dying without issue, left his dominions to the count Don Raymond ^c; and Mariana says, that, after some disputes, and even a war, with the count of Thoulouse, all differences were terminated, by the two counts reciprocally adopting each other, which, in its issue, brought that county into this family. At length, having lived long, acquired great reputation, and many fair seignories, he deceased, having first taken the habit of a knight templar: his remains, according to his own order, were interred in the monastery of Ripol ^d. He had two sons, Don Raymond who succeeded him, and Don Raymond who inherited the county of Provence; and two daughters, Donna Berengara, who married the emperor Don Alonso of Castile ^e, and Donna Cecilia, who married the count de Foix ^f.

DON Raymond the fifth, count of Barcelona, entered on the government of this principality with great reputation ^g. His alliance to the emperor Don Alonso made him extremely considerable; and it was upon his doing homage to that prince that Don Alonso count of Thoulouse was prevailed upon to take the same step ^h. He incorporated the county of Cerdagna, to which there were some pretenders. into his own dominions ⁱ; and was very useful to many of his neighbours, particularly in negotiating that alliance between the crowns of Castile and Arragon, which saved the latter from the Moors, after the unfortunate battle of Fraga, of which Don Ramiro the Monk was so sensible, that he immediately cast his eyes upon him for his son-in-law and successor ^k. Don Raymond no sooner found himself presumptive heir to the crown of Arragon, than he judged it a convenient season to throw off all marks of dependency in Catalonia; in pursuance of which he forbade his subjects to date any longer, as hitherto they had done, by the years of the reigns of the French monarchs ^l: which was in plain terms avowing he would be their vassal no longer; though in reason and in law this could have no force without the consent of the lord, that is, of the crown of France, to whom these countries belonged, in right of conquest: and, as we shall see hereafter, this, at another favourable opportunity, was procured by his marriage with Donna Petronilla, heirs of Arragon, when that kingdom and the county of Barcelona came to be united in the person of the same sovereign, but without any incorporation of territories; the Catalans and the Arragonians being equally inflexible in that particular; and looking upon their respective privileges as invaluable in themselves, and not to be communicated on any consideration ^m; so that it may be truly said the princes of this family reigned over two of the proudest nations upon the earth; and the reader therefore need not wonder, that they did not always reign in quiet.

The history of Arragon continued, from the reign of Don Alonso II. to its conjunction with the kingdom of Majorca, including also the conquest of the kingdom of Valencia.

- a THE young king of Arragon, Don Alonso the second, was, at the time his mother put him in possession of his dominions, entering into the twelfth year of his age; and, therefore, without doubt, there was a kind of regency appointed to manage public affairs, till he attained a proper age to take the reins of government into his own hands. He was a young prince of pregnant parts, one of whom great hopes were conceived by his subjects in his earlier years, and who lived not barely to accomplish their hopes, but to exceed them. He had very strong abilities, much industry and activity, a sincere zeal for religion, with less of bigotry than any prince of his time; active and enterprising in war, prudent in peace, modest and grave in his deportment, and so free from all suspicion of lewdness, that he obtained the surname of, the Chaste. The first action of his life distinguished plainly his spirit and capacity; for Raymond, count of Provence, to whose care he was chiefly committed by the queen, his mother, repairing into that country, projected a marriage for his only daughter, Donna Dulce, with the son of the count of Tholouse, and, falling out soon after with the count de Forcolquier, marched with a considerable body of troops, in order to make himself master of Nice; at the siege of which he received a wound in his head, of which he died^a. Raymond count of Tholouse thought to avail himself of that alliance, which is before mentioned, and meant to have taken possession of that country; but Don Alonso of Arragon, who was scarce entered into his fifteenth year, prevented him: for, being at Gironne, when the news came of Don Raymond Berenger's death, he immediately took the title of marquis of Provence, and sent a body of troops to secure the possession of it^b. But, before he would go thither in person, he called an assembly of the states at Saragossa, where, in the most solemn manner, he confirmed the liberties of the clergy and nobility. Having obtained all the assistance he could desire, he went and put himself at the head of his troops in Provence, gave battle to the count of Tholouse, and obtained the victory. To strengthen his party, he had repudiated his wife Constance, who was the daughter of Lewis the younger, king of France, that married the widow of count Raymond Berenger, yet the king carried his point, brought over the clergy, nobility, and people to his interests, and, some time after, placed his brother Don Pedro there, to whom he gave the title of count, and who, to render himself popular, assumed the name of Raymond Berenger, though he held it only in the name, and during the pleasure, of the king his brother^c.
- d AFTER his return into his own dominions, perceiving that the rest of the Christian princes in Spain were enlarging their dominions at the expence of the Infidels, he thought it a convenient season for him to do the same: and, having assembled a numerous army, he employed it in sweeping the towns which the Moors still held on the south-east side of the Ebro, which were equally troublesome to the kingdom of Arragon and the principality of Catalonia. Accordingly, he took Tavera, Moella, Pena, Rubia, and Monroy. From thence advancing to Caspe, which was a place of strength, the inhabitants were so intimidated that they opened their gates, on the first appearance of his troops; and Alcanex, which was a place of still greater strength, surrendered in like manner; so that, without meeting much resistance, the king pushed his conquests, this campaign, as far as Canta vieja^d. To prevent their being lost, as easily as they were obtained, he gave Caspe to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and, some years after, Alcanex to the knights of Calatrava, by whom they were well fortified, so as to cover all the conquered country^e. The king, Don Alonso of Castile, conceiving a high opinion of this young monarch, they entered into a close alliance offensive and defensive; and, according to the custom of those times, put into each other's hands a certain number of fortresses, by way of security, for the due performance of the treaty^f. About the same time, the Mohanniedans, in the mountains of Prades, took up arms, in hopes of throwing off the yoke of Arragon, but the king, causing them to be attacked on all sides, forced them to return to their obedience, not without effusion of blood.
- Enters into a war with the Moors, and drives them out of all the places they yet held in what is now styled the kingdom of Arragon. 1168.

His irruption into Valentia, where he reduces the cities of Tervel and Xativa. THE city of Tervel, standing on the confluence of the rivers Alkambra and Guadalaviar,^a which some have represented as a terrestrial paradise, nature having favoured the plain, in which it stands, with a perpetual spring, had been long the object of his wishes, and he took this opportunity to invest it, when the Moors had so many irons in the fire, that he obtained it without any great loss: and, besides annexing so fine a city, in so valuable a territory, to the crown of Arragon, it gave him an open passage into the kingdom of Valentia^b. Don Alonso quickly improved this advantage by surprising the town of Xativa, a place of great importance, but which would, in all probability, have been only the beginning of his conquests, if he had not been interrupted by the news of an unexpected invasion of his dominions, by Don Sanchez the sixth of Navarre. This obliged him to turn his arms on that side; previous to which he had an interview with the king of Castile, who had also broke with the king of Navarre, in which a new convention was made; for the due performance of which the Castilian put into his hands the castle of Bordejo, and Ariza was consigned to him by the king of Arragon. In pursuance of their agreement, they both invaded Navarre, but Don Sanchez was so well provided, that they gained very little except blows. On the eighteenth of October died the queen Donna Petronilla, who, from the time of her resigning the crown, had employed her revenues in charity, and her time in acts of piety and devotion^c. The people of Arragon have still an high regard for her memory.

THE king of Navarre, to revenge the insult of the preceding year, when Don Alonso had wasted his country with fire and sword, made an irruption into Arragon, and made himself master, after a long siege, of Cajuelos, while Don Alonso, on his side, entered Navarre, and took Milagro, which he demolished. Towards the close of the year, a dispute arose between the kings of Castile and Arragon, an officer belonging to the former having surprized the castle of Ariza, which, as we have shewn, had been put into the hands of the king of Arragon as a cautionary place; which act of injustice he resented so highly, that he sent ambassadors to Constantinople to demand in marriage the princess Eudocia, daughter of the Greek emperor Manuel, notwithstanding he had been contracted, in his father's life-time to Donna Sancha, daughter to the emperor Alonso, aunt to the king of Castile, and sister to the king of Leon^d. This was certainly a very rash, and indeed the most imprudent and blameable action of his whole life; of which being soon made sensible by the pope's legate cardinal Hyacinth, he departed from the project he had formed, and, as we have shewn in another place, made his peace with those powerful monarchs, by marrying Donna Sancha^e. Soon after he gave his sister Donna Dulce in marriage to the infant Don Sancho of Portugal^f. The war with Navarre, having been attended with the most pernicious consequences to the Christian interests in Spain, all the three kings were, at length, prevailed on to submit their differences to the judgment of the king of England. This prudent resolution gave Don Alonso an opportunity of making a tour into Provence, where his dispute with the count of Tbolouse remained still undetermined, but was, at length, amicably composed, after an interview between the two princes, by a treaty, in which the pretensions of both parties were finally adjusted; and yet the calm lasted not long.

AT his return into his own dominions, he found the king of Castile engaged in a very unequal war with the Moors, who had brought a prodigious army together, in order to oblige him to raise the siege of Cuenca. At the request of that monarch, he marched, with a great body of troops, to his assistance, and had a large share in that glorious victory obtained over the Infidels, near that city: upon which, the king of Castile, as a mark of his gratitude and respect, released him from that homage which had been exacted from the crown of Arragon by his grandfather, for the territories he held on the south side of the Ebro^g. The king of Arragon made after this an incursion into Valentia, and obliged the Moors in that country to become his vassals. Upon some fresh provocation, he entered that country again with his forces, and had penetrated as far as Morviedro, which place while he besieged he had news of some troubles that had arisen in the county of Roussillon, which had devolved to him in virtue of a family contract with Guinard, the last hereditary prince of that country. This obliged him to raise the siege, and to march thither with an army, where, having settled things to his satisfaction, and fortified the important town of Perpignan, he returned into Arragon, and held an assembly of the states at Huesca, where he received the ambassadors of Ferdinand, king of Leon, who came to demand his assistance against his nephew, the king of Castile. Don Alonso gave them good words, but talked in so high a stile to his brother-in-law, that he obliged him to conclude a peace with the king of Leon, and, at the same time, they agreed a between themselves, that the conquest of Valentia should be left to Arragon; and that of Murcia to Castile ⁿ.

SOME new disputes having arisen with the count of Tboluse, the king of Arragon went again into France, where the viscount of Niemes, and the viscount of Carcasson, voluntarily did homage to him; and entered into a close alliance against the count of Tboluse ^o. About this time, the archbishop of Tarragona, metropolitan of Catalonia, abolished, in all the dioceses under his jurisdiction, the practice of computing by the æra of Spain, and introduced that of our Lord. This regulation was made in the year one thousand two hundred and eighteen of the old æra ^p. The war with the count of Tboluse still continued, and what gave inexpressible grief to the king of Arragon, his brother count Raymond Berenger was most barbarously assassinated upon Easter-day, and his remains buried in the cathedral of Maguelonne. To punish this cruel act as it deserved, the king marched thither with a formidable army, and, understanding that the murderers were retired into the fortress of Meruele, he caused it to be suddenly invested, and, refusing to hear of any capitulation, it was taken by assault, and all who were in it put without mercy to the sword ^q. After this act of exemplary justice, he made an irruption into the territory of Tboluse; and, the campaign being over, he made a tour to Bordeaux, where he had an interview with Henry the second of England, with whom he concluded an alliance. The war with the count of Tboluse continued two years longer: at the end of which, both parties being weary, they had another interview, in which they renewed the treaty that had been concluded eight years before ^r. At his return into his own dominions, he held an assembly of the states at Huesca, where he regulated several disorders that had happened during his absence, and applied himself with great diligence to the improvement of his territories; in order to which, he granted large privileges to the places lately conquered ^s. Two years after, he had an interview with the king of Navarre, in the month of September, at Boreja, where they made a solid peace, and gave reciprocal securities for the strict performance of it; by putting into the hands of a neutral power certain fortresses of importance ^t.

THE power of the king of Castile was so great at this time, that, as some writers say, the king of Arragon found it necessary to negotiate a defensive alliance with the crowns of Navarre and Leon; which is so much the more probable, because, upon the king of Castile's making an inroad upon the country last mentioned, Don Alonso immediately declared war against him, and made an irruption into Castile; of which that monarch had no sooner intelligence than he entered Arragon, on the side of Agrede; but, in his retreat, Don Alonso met and fought him with some advantage: however, by the interposition of the pope's legate they were thoroughly reconciled. The count of Tboluse having committed hostilities in Gascony, during the absence of Richard, king of England, in the Holy Land, Don Alonso not only sent the succours stipulated by treaty, but went in person into Provence, to prevent that monarch's affairs from suffering by his absence. While he was thus employed, queen Berengera, consort to king Richard, arrived at Marseilles; and, after having been splendidly entertained for some time by Don Alonso, was safely conducted into Aquitaine ^u. While he remained in these parts, the king founded a noble monastery, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, not far from the city of Arles; and, having settled every thing in the best manner he was able, he committed the care of his dominions in France to his brother Don Sancho, and then returned into Arragon ^v. The king of Castile having embroiled himself again with the monarchs of Navarre and Leon, the king of Arragon resumed his old character of a mediator, and prevailed upon all these princes to consent to an interview with him, between Agrede and Terracona, where a suspension of arms was concluded ^w. This was the last great act of his life; for his affairs obliging him to make a journey into Roussillon, he was seized with a fever at Perpignan, where he ended his life, April the twenty-sixth, one thousand one hundred and ninety-six, when he had lived forty-four, and reigned thirty-four years complete ^x. He was without question one of the wisest, bravest, and most fortunate princes that ever sat upon the throne of Arragon. His body was interred, by his express command, in the monastery of Toblet, which was of his own foundation. He left by his queen Donna Sancha three sons, Don Pedro, to whom he left the kingdom of Arragon, the principality of Catalonia, and the county of Roussillon; Don Alonso, to whom he gave the county of Provence; and Don Ferdinand, who was abbot of Montarragon: and also three daughters, Donna Constantia, who espoused the king of Hungary; Donna Leonora, and Donna Sancha ^y.

THE young king Don Pedro had a high spirit, strong passions, was less firm in his resolutions, less correct in his manners, and, consequently, less happy and fortunate than his father. He began his reign with holding an assembly of the states; in which he did some popular things, in order to conciliate the affections of his people. The year following he made some severe laws against heretics, that he might ingratiate himself with the clergy, and very cheerfully assisted the king of Castile against the Infidels. The counts of Urgel and of Foix, having been long at variance, broke out into an open war; which proving detrimental to his subjects in Catalonia, the king went into that principality, called an assembly of the states, dictated therein the terms of peace, and took the proper measures for enforcing them^b.
The next year, some disputes arose between this monarch and the queen-dowager his mother, to whom several places on the frontiers were assigned by his father's will; by which Don Pedro thought his dominions too much exposed; but, by the interposition of the king of Castile, this difference was compromised, the queen consenting to restore these fortresses, and the king giving her an equivalent for them in the heart of his dominions^c. The king of Navarre going at this time to the court of Morocco, it so much alarmed his neighbours, that both the king of Castile and the king of Arragon invaded his dominions, and made themselves masters of such places as were most for their respective conveniencies^d. The king Don Pedro observing, that some inconveniencies had arisen, and others increased of late, in his dominions, called an assembly of the states; in which the necessary measures were taken for repressing them, and all who were present sworn to the strict observance of them. At the same time he contracted his sister Donna Leonora to the count of Tholouse; which marriage was consummated about three years after: at which time, as some writers say, his other sister married the heir of that count^e.

THE king of Arragon, having amicably regulated the limits of their respective dominions with the king of Castile, and being frustrated in his view of marrying the infanta of Navarre, took a sudden resolution of espousing Donna Maria, the only daughter of William, count of Montpellier, by the Greek princess Eudocia, whom his father should have married: and this notwithstanding that lady had been married to the count de Gomminges; from whom, under pretence of his having another wife, she was divorced, after having had two daughters by him. While the king was at Montpellier, in order to the conclusion of this marriage, he engaged his brother Don Alonso, count of Provence, to submit the disputes that had arisen between him and his wife's grandfather, the count de Forcolquier, to an arbitration, under which all things were settled, for the present, by the king's interposition^f. After this, Don Pedro formed and executed a very extraordinary project, which was that of going to Rome, to make a visit to the pope, embarking with his uncle Don Sancho, and a numerous train of prelates and lords on board his own galleys. He was received by the pontiff with all possible marks of kindness and respect, anointed by the bishop of Porto, crowned by the pope's own hands; for which, departing from the maxims of his predecessors, he acknowledged himself a vassal to the holy see, and consented to an annual tribute of two hundred and fifty double pistoles; and, having received some papal favours and exemptions, he then returned into Provence^g. At his arrival there, he found the quarrel between his brother and the count de Forcolquier broke out afresh, and that the former, surprized by the latter, was held close prisoner in a castle, till he should comply with what was demanded from him. The king, incensed at this behaviour, raised a considerable army, besieged and took the castle in which his brother was confined; and, having set him at liberty, ravaged the territories of his antagonist, till, by the interposition of neighbouring princes, things were once more amicably composed^h. The king, about this time, had some differences with the people of Montpellier, whom he looked upon as his subjects, in right of his wife. In Arragon, also, there were great discontents on the score of the king's submitting himself to the pope; against which the states protested, being unwilling to owe allegiance to more than one sovereignⁱ.

ABOUT this time, the king, who had no issue, began to be displeased with the queen, and aimed at procuring a divorce from Rome; which, he flattered himself, would be no difficult thing to obtain from a pope, who had honoured him with the title of Catholic; in which, however, he found himself much mistaken, and his interest far weaker than he had imagined.
He was also not a little embarrassed in his domestic affairs, which induced him to call an assembly of the states, and to make some edicts in favour of the clergy; and also to make an irruption into the territories of the Moors, where he made himself master of the town of Montalban^k. He consented, at the request of the king of Castile, who had lately concluded a a peace with the king of Navarre, to an interview with the last-mentioned monarch: at which, through the interposition of the former, he compromised all disputes with the latter¹. All this time his suit for a divorce went on, but, as some say, he was prevailed on by one of his favourites to make the queen a visit, and to remain some time with her; and that, soon after his departure, she declared herself with child. Others, amongst whom we may reckon Mariana, give another and less honourable turn to this story: they assure us, that the queen, taking the advantage of the king's disposition to gallantry, prevailed upon a servant of his to conduct her privately to his bed; which he did: but, in the morning, she took care to make herself known, that, in case of her being with child, there might be no doubt of its legitimacy². However this business was conducted, certain it is, that the queen was delivered of b a son, on the first of *February*³, whom she christened Don Jayme, from another strange incident. She caused twelve wax tapers to be lighted at a time, and having given the name of an apostle to each of them, bestowed that of St. James on her new-born son, because his taper burnt the longest. Such were the foolish superstitions of this age, with the repetition of which the reader will more easily bear, if he considers, that it is some comfort to find we live in an age more enlightened.

It does not at all appear, that the king Don Pedro had the least scruple or suspicion of imposture in this affair, but from his birth acknowledged the infant for his son; and, as we shall see hereafter, directed all necessary care to be taken of his education. Don Armingol, count of Urgel, dying without male issue, his sister's son Don Gerard de Cabrera took possession of his dominions, without demanding the consent of the king of Arragon; from whom they were held as dependents on his principality of Catalonia. Don Pedro was not a prince to be treated in this manner with impunity; he, therefore, presently vindicated his right by attacking the new count; and having, after a long siege, reduced the castle, in which he took shelter with his family, he sent them all prisoners to that of *Lobarra*⁴. His sister Donna Constantia, queen-dowager of Hungary, who returned home into his dominions on the death of her husband, having contracted a second marriage with Frederic, king of Sicily, was conducted by the king of Arragon to Barcelona; where she embarked for that island, accompanied by her brother Don Alonso, count of Provence; who died very soon after their arrival at *Palermo*⁵. In the month of November, the same year, deceased the queen-dowager Donna Sancha, the king's mother, who had passed the latter part of her life in a convent, and in exercises of charity and devotion⁶; all the disputes she had with her son being buried in oblivion.

Owens him, and gives direction for his being educated in a manner suitable to his dignity.

THE king of Castile, meditating the subversion of the Moorish monarchies in Spain, proposed a fresh interview between the kings of Arragon and Navarre, at a place called Malens, where all the three kings were present; and where, as a proof of their thorough reconciliation, the king of Navarre lent Don Pedro of Arragon twenty thousand pistoles, for which he had a pressing occasion; and received from him certain fortresses to secure the repayment of it⁷. It is probable, that the original intention of this loan was to enable the king of Arragon to take the field against the Moors; from which he was prevented by being obliged to take a share in those strange transactions that were carrying on in the southern provinces of France; where the pope's general, Simon, count of Montfort, under colour of a croisade, published for that purpose, was endeavouring to extirpate the Albigensis, better known to us by their Latin name of Albigenses; who were in reality Protestants, holding, by a continued and uninterrupted tradition, the doctrines of the antient Gothic church; and for this exposed to the rage of the pope, who proclaimed a croisade for their present destruction; and established the bloody tribunal of the inquisition to prevent their sentiments from being received. These pilgrims, or crosses, as the pope's soldiers were stiled, had absolutely destroyed the town of Beziers; and this too with circumstances of inexpressible cruelty, having massacred all who were in it. The earl of Beziers, who was also viscount of Carcaffon, retired to the last mentioned city, where the pope's general besieged him: upon which he applied himself for protection to the king of Arragon, his near relation, and to whom he was vassal. The king upon this made a tour into these parts; and as this event is strictly connected with the history of Arragon, and is in itself extremely curious, and highly deserves the reader's attention, we shall hope for his pardon, at least, if we insist upon it a little more particularly⁸; as it will justify several passages in this history with regard to religion.

THE king of Arragon intended only to act as a mediator; and understanding that the earl of Beziers exclaimed loudly, that, under the specious pretence of zeal for religion, the pope really meant to strip himself and his uncle, the count of Toulouse, of all their dominions, to a extirpate their subjects, and to give them to the count de Montfort, and the crosses, or pilgrims, who were to execute his vengeance, the king desired to discourse with him, which was permitted. At this conference, the earl plainly declared, that he knew this to be the pope's design; because, when he was treating for his subjects of Beziers, he refused to receive his Catholic subjects into his favour; nay, would not so much as spare the priests, who were all cut in pieces in their sacerdotal ornaments, under the banner and the cross: that this example of cruel impiety, joined with what they exercised upon the village of Carcasson, where they had exposed all to fire and sword, without any distinction of age or sex, had fully convinced him, that there was no mercy to be looked for from the legate, or his pilgrims; b and that accordingly he would choose rather to die, with his subjects defending themselves, than to be exposed to the mercy of an inexorable enemy; such as he had found the legate to be: and though there were, in the city of Carcasson, many of his subjects of a belief contrary to that of the church of Rome, yet that they were persons that had never done any injury to any one; that they had always assisted him in time of need; and that, for this their good service, he was resolved never to abandon them, as they, on their parts, had promised to hazard life and estate in his defence; that he hoped that God, who is the reliever of those who are oppressed, would assist them against this multitude of ill-advised men, who, under the pretence of meriting heaven, had quitted their own habitations, to come and burn, pillage, ravage, and murder, in the habitations of others, without either reason, judgment, or mercy. Such was this unhappy nobleman's state of the case! c

Arragon intercedes earnestly with the pope's legate on his behalf.*

THE king of Arragon returned with this remonstrance to the legate, who assembled a great number of lords and prelates to hear what he had to say; who declared to them, that he had found the earl of Beziers, his ally, extremely scandalized at their inhuman proceedings against his subjects of Beziers, and of the village of Carcasson; and that he was fully persuaded, seeing they had neither spared the Roman Catholics, nor the priests themselves, that it was not a religious war, as was pretended, but a kind of robbery, under the colour of religion; that he hoped God would be so favourable to him, as to make his innocence, and the just occasion he had to defend himself sufficiently known; that they must not hope now to have them surrender at discretion, since they had found, that there was no other to be expected from d them, but that of killing all they met with; that it had never been found good policy to drive an enemy to despair: wherefore, if the legate would be pleased to afford any tolerable composition to the earl of Beziers and his subjects, that mildness would be a better method to reduce the Albigenses to the church of Rome than extreme severity; and that he ought also to remember, that the earl of Beziers was a young man, and a Roman Catholic, who might be very serviceable in reducing his subjects, who had so great confidence in him, to their obedience to the church. The legate told the king of Arragon, that if he would withdraw a little they would advise what were best to be done. The king being called in again, the legate told him, that, in consideration of his intercession, he would receive the earl of Beziers to mercy; and, therefore, if it seemed good to him, he might come forth, and eleven with e him, with his goods and baggage; but that, as for the people that were in the city of Car-casson, they should be delivered to his discretion: of which they ought to have a very good opinion, he being the pope's legate; and that accordingly they should come forth all stark naked, men, women, and children, without shirts, or any other covering on their bodies.
Also, that the earl of Beziers should be delivered into sure hands; and that all his estate should be surrendered up to the future lord of his territories, who should be chosen for conservation of the same.

barity, and perfidy of the legate, in the taking of Car-casson.*

THE king of Arragon having endeavoured to bring the legate to milder terms for the young earl, the legate told him, that these conditions were very favourable. What was worse, the legate employed a person of quality to endeavour to draw the earl of Beziers out of Carcasson, and to bring him to him, with assurance, upon oath, that he would permit him to return to f that city, in case he should not be satisfied with the legate's proposals. The earl, on this assurance, repairs to the legate, and represents to him, that if he would think fit to treat his subjects with more kindness, he would easily induce them to comply with his desire, and recall the Albigenses from their error to the church; that the terms, which had been mentioned to him, were shameful and indecent; that he knew his people would rather die than see themselves reduced to so scandalous an ignominy; and therefore intreated him to come to easier terms, and that he did not question but to make his subjects accept of any other more tolerable conditions. The legate's answer was, that the people of Carcasson might consider what they had to do; that he would concern himself no farther, since the earl was his prisoner, and should continue so till the city was taken, and his subjects acknowledged their duty. g
By which treacherous act, in a great measure, the city was lost, and Don Pedro returned into a his kingdom^a, not at all edified with these papal proceedings, but, at the same time, under a full persuasion of mind, that it was not at all his interest to divulge his real sentiments, for fear of pulling upon himself, and his subjects, that army of merciless barbarians, who had been spreading fire and sword through the finest provinces in France.

He was constrained, the next year, out of regard to his own safety, to publish edicts against heretics; and, in the midst of a victorious expedition against the infidels in Spain, he was called again into France, to the conferences at Narbonne: where, though he refused it at first, with the utmost indignation, he was compelled, at length, to grant the investiture of Carcasson to Simon de Montfort, which fully verified the suspicions that had been entertained, that temporal motives were the true springs of all the violent proceedings in this and the foregoing year^b. He was farther induced, to commit his only son Don Jayme to the care of this great lord, Simon de Montfort, upon a promise that he should espouse his daughter, and undertake many other things that were probably against his will, since he was no sooner returned into his Spanish dominions than he consented to the consummation of the match, formerly concluded, between his youngest sister and Don Raymond of Tholouse^c. The Moors, having made an irruption into the territories of the king of Castile, with a prodigious army, and having besieged Salvatierra, that monarch applied himself to his neighbours of Arragon and Navarre for succours; which Don Pedro would very willingly have given him; and, for that end, wrote to Simon de Montfort to send him the forces that he had left behind him in Provence. But the pope's general thought they might be better employed in cutting the throats of heretics; and so the king forfeited his word, the Moors became masters of Salvatierra, and the monarch of Castile had the mortification of seeing himself unable to keep the field against the infidels, through the ambitious intrigues and anti-christian politics of pope Innocent the third, and his confederates^d. As soon as he could do it with safety, the king of Castile came to Cuenca, in order to meet the monarchs of Navarre and Arragon, and to concert measures for the next year's campaign. The former sent one of the principal noblemen of his court, the latter repaired thither in person, and both gave the king of Castile the strongest assurances, that they would join him with their forces at Toledo time enough to make an autumn campaign^e, and to repress the numerous army of the Moors lately arrived from Barbary.

Mischief that happened in Spain, through the ill conduct of the court of Rome.

d THE miscarriage of the former year made the king Don Pedro extremely solicitous to fulfil his engagements with the utmost punctuality; with which view, he laboured incessantly to draw together a complete army in the spring; at the head of which he marched himself, accompanied by Don Garcia, bishop of Tarragona, Don Berenger, elect of Barcelona, Don Sancho, count of Roussillon, his son of the same name, Don Garcia Romero, Don Ximenes Coronel, Don Michael Luesia, Don Aznard Pardo, Don Raymond Fole, Don Guilermo de Cervera, Don Pedro Maza, Don Guilermo de Cardona, the count of Ampurias, and many more of the principal nobility of Arragon and Catalonia; with whom he arrived at Toledo on Trinity-sunday^f. He marched from thence, with the kings of Castile and Navarre, with the whole power of the Christians in Spain, against the Moors; and had his share in that decisive victory obtained over the infidels in the plains of Tolosa; in which, it is said, they lost near two hundred thousand men, and which blow, it is certain, they never could recover^g. After receiving all the acknowledgements that it was in the power of a grateful monarch to pay, Don Pedro returned, covered with glory, into his own dominions. As he was sensible this event would raise his credit at Rome, he resolved to make use of it, in order to obtain his divorce; for which purpose he sent thither a person much in his confidence. Of which the queen Donna Maria was no sooner informed, than she thought it necessary to repair thither in person, not only to solicit this cause, but another which she had against her brethren by the father's side; who, as she insisted, were adulterous bastards; and either her address was so great, or her pretensions so good, that she carried both points^h.

f THE king Don Pedro, irritated at the pope's confirmation of his marriage, and at his directing certain prelates to proceed against him by ecclesiastical censures, in case he refused to live with his wife, as he was required to do by the pope's decree, went into his French dominions. There he found the counts of Tholouse, father and son, who had married his sisters, the counts of Foix and Bearn, and several other great lords, in arms against Simon de Montfort; and with these lords he concurred, though, at the same time, he laboured to act as a mediator; and, with much difficulty, procured for them a cessation of armsⁱ. did not last long, and the king perceiving that negotiations served only to ruin the lords, agreed, from a principle of equity and justice, for as to his religion it is on all hands agreed that he was zealous for the church of Rome, to assist them in recovering their dominions by force; with this view he came at the head of the confederate army before Muret, a place not very strong, and in which there was no great garrison, but of some importance: for which reason, Simon de Montfort made a forced march, with the flower of his troops, and threw himself into the place. The confederates, who, in all probability, were not thoroughly acquainted with his strength, continued the siege; upon which, having made all the preparations necessary, he sallied with his whole force, defeated, and obliged them to retire. In this action, which happened on the twelfth of September 1213, Don Pedro of Arragon was slain, in the thirty-sixth year of his age, and in the seventeenth year of his reign^c. The pope's general, Simon de Montfort, suffered his subjects to search for and remove his body, that it might be, as it was, interred with his ancestors. His death was a great blow to the Christian interest in Spain, much greater to his subjects, who were left in confusion, but greatest of all to the confederates, who were, in a manner, undone by this fatal event^f.

Confusions excited in Arragon, by the king's sudden and unexpected death.

THE news of the king's death no sooner reached Arragon and Catalonia, than it excited great stir and tumults. Don Sancho, count of Roussillon, the king's uncle, endeavoured to form a party; Don Ferdinand, abbot of Montarragon, was not so entirely taken up with the thoughts of another world, but that he would have condescended to act the part of a king in this. However, the nobility in general, and particularly Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra, lord of Albarracin, the prelates and magistrates of all the great towns were well affected to the right heir; and dispatched immediately the bishop of Ségorba to Rome, to solicit the pope to send express orders to Simon de Montfort to set their sovereign at liberty, that his faithful subjects might place him on the throne^e. His mother, the queen Donna Maria, who was also there at this time, joined her solicitations to those of this prelate; so that, at length, such an order was obtained; but being transmitted to the cardinal legate in Arragon, he was to go with it to Montpelier, where, not without some difficulty, Simon de Montfort was engaged to comply with it: so that it was the month of May before the young king was put into the legate's hands; at which time, as his own memoirs say, he was six years and four months old. He was conducted, without loss of time, to Lerida, where the states were assembled, his title acknowledged, and the administration put into the hands of a council of regency, with the infant Don Sancho at their head^d.

THE calm that succeeded this declaration did not continue long. The infant Don Sancho had more power than he deserved, and much less than he desired. Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra perceived this, and very wisely provided for the king's safety, by putting him into the hands of the grand master of the order of knights templars, of the noble family of Montagu; who carried him to the strong castle of Monçon, where he lived with tolerable splendor, and was so happy as to have great care taken of his education^e. Don Sancho continued his intrigues; of which, as much a child as he was, the king took notice; and, by the advice of the grand master, sent for Don Pedro Fernandez to Monçon, where it was judged the safest method to call an assembly of the states, in the month of September; which was accordingly done: and in that assembly, the king was not only again proclaimed, but the prelates, nobility, and deputies from cities, of their own accord, swore fidelity to him^f. At first sight, the reader will perhaps judge this a thing of course; it became so afterwards: but, in the present case, it was new and extraordinary. Before this time, the kings of Arragon took a very strict oath, to govern their subjects according to the laws, and to protect them in the full enjoyment of their liberties; but the people did not swear in their turns: so that what they did, upon this occasion, was purely voluntary, and a tacit intimation to Don Sancho, to lay aside his sinister practices, and imitate their loyalty. But the example of a whole nation could not teach him his duty; he began, the next year, to raise troops, under various pretences; and, as some authors say, attempted to seize his nephew. Of which, the king having given intelligence to the nobility, they suddenly took up arms, and repaired from all quarters to Monçon; from whence, having taken the king out of the fortress, they carried him to Huesca, and from thence to Saragossa; where he was received with the universal acclamations of his subjects, and, notwithstanding his tender age, seated upon the throne^m, that he might be no longer in the hands, or, in any degree, under the power, of an ambitious uncle; who, by the eagerness he expressed to seize the crown, shewed he was altogether unworthy to wear it.

a THE next year there was an assembly of the states held at Tarragona, where the people of Catalonia did homage, and swore fidelity. They did still more : the crown was in debt : those who were about the king complained of the difficulties they were under for want of money ; the people of Catalonia readily granted an extraordinary tax for two years. In the month of September, there was another assembly of the states of Arragon and Catalonia at Lerida, where, to purchase public peace, great revenues were given to Don Sancho, who there did homage to the king, and promised to be his faithful subject^a. In the mean time, A. D. 1218. there were still great distractions ; the nobility falling out with each other, deciding their Discords and wars amongst his nobility. differences by force of arms, and despising the king's authority, because of his youth ; though all writers agree in celebrating the pregnancy of his parts, and relate many extraordinary proofs of them. But as these were mostly shewn in taking a share in these kind of wars, in favour of those who were immediately in his hands, and who perhaps were not always in the right, we shall not insist upon them ; the rather, because the king himself, though a perfect child, wrote a letter to pope Honorius complaining of these disorders ; and desiring that he would take his person and kingdom more immediately into his protection : to which that pontiff wrote him a suitable answer, and sent cardinal Bernard his legate into Arragon, to render that young prince what service he was able^b.

THE year following, the king found himself obliged to expose his person, though but twelve years old, against some of his rebellious subjects. Don Lopez de Alvaro had a quarrel with Don Roderic de Cizana : they were both persons of the first rank ; but the latter had the most power, and the use he made of it was to seize the person of his adversary, whom he clapped into prison. The relations of Don Lopez, finding themselves unable to deliver him, recollected, that there was such a thing as a king in Arragon. Upon their complaint, the council sent an order to Don Roderic to release his prisoner ; who treated it with contempt. The young king, piqued at such usage, resolved to make this the first trial of his authority ; and, putting himself at the head of a few guards that were about him, marched directly towards the castle of Lizana, though there was nothing more improbable than that he should be able to reduce it. In his progress, however, he was joined by such numbers, that the place was presently invested, and, after a sharp siege, taken, and Don Lopez set at liberty. The governor, who had commanded there, being obliged to take his place, and to remain a prisoner, under the person appointed to command there by the young king^c. As for Don Roderic, he took shelter under the protection of Don Pedro Fernandez de Azagra, who had been always loyal ; notwithstanding which, the king besieged his famous fortrefs of Albaracin ; but, after continuing before it some time, was obliged to desist. It was not long before Don Pedro gave the king such satisfaction, with regard to his conduct, that he was entirely restored to his favour ; and perhaps it might be owing to his advice, that the king sent an ambassador to the court of Castile, to demand the infanta Donna Leonora, sister to queen Berengara, in marriage^d. A very wise and effectual method to establish his authority at home, by securing the support of so powerful a neighbour.

THIS important treaty was quickly concluded, as it was of evident advantage to both nations ; and the court of Castile conducted the infanta to Agreda, where the king Don Jayme met them, attended by the principal prelates and peers of his realm. After the ceremony of the espousals were over, the king and the queen went to Tarragona, and afterwards to Saragossa, where they received the nuptial benediction^e. As this marriage was celebrated on the seventh of February, Ferreras concludes, that the king was just then entered into his fourteenth year ; for, if he had been unfit for the marriage state, he thinks the marriage would have been delayed for a time^f. But the king's own account of the matter puts it out of dispute ; he says, that he was but little more than thirteen ; and that he did not consummate the marriage till a year afterwards : which is the reason we make this prince a year younger than Ferreras. There had been a very strict friendship subsisting between Don Nuno Sanchez (the son of Don Sanchez, the king's uncle) and William de Moncada, viscount of Bearn ; but, as it sometimes happens among persons of great rank, upon a sudden quarrel they became inveterate enemies, took up arms against each other, and put the whole kingdom into a flame. On the first news of this disorder, the king assembled a body of troops, commanded the two lords to dismiss theirs on pain of being considered as public enemies ; and Don Nuno Sanchez, not paying the respect that was due to his sovereign's orders, took several of his castles^f. This year died Donna Constantia, the king's sister, and the wife of the emperor^g. The infant Don Ferdinand, abbot of Montarragon, who had been long desirous of gaining the supreme administration, at least, during the king's youth, under colour of negotiating an agreement between the two lords before-mentioned, gained a them both over to his party; into which he likewise brought Don Pedro Abones, one of the most powerful and best allied lords in Arragon. Having communicated to them his project, they seized upon the person of the king and queen; and, under colour of taking them out of bad hands, and being more diligent than others in their duty, kept them in reality close prisoners, and possessed themselves of the government^{*}; which they managed, as all factions do, in such a manner as might turn most to their advantage.

THE king bore this usage very impatiently in his own mind, though his uncle behaved towards him with respect; and though the lords, his confederates, endeavoured to atone for their want of obedience, by a ceremonious submission; which could not impose upon him, though it did upon the vulgar. For, with all these exterior marks of reverence, every one, in his turn, had his demand to make; or, in plain terms, his private interest to serve, at the expence of the crown, and of the public^y. The king, seeing little hopes of deliverance, dissembled, with a very good grace, for more than a year, till hearing the people grumble, that, contrary to the treaties formerly made with Castile, that crown had received homage from Abuzite, king of Valencia, he resolved to lay hold of that circumstance, in order to recover his freedom. As soon as he had formed this project, he proposed to the lords, in whose hands he was, to go to Tortosa; to which, foreseeing no danger, they gave their consent. From thence he made his escape to Tervel, and summoned thither the nobility to attend him in an expedition against the Moors^z. As this was a very popular thing, he had soon a body of troops about him, with which he invested Peniscola; where it quickly appeared, that though he had cropped the leaves, the roots of faction still remained; for several of the lords retiring with their troops without his leave, the king found himself under the necessity of raising the siege. Abuzite laid hold of this opportunity, and, offering to become his vassal, concluded a peace^a; by which, in some measure, the honour of the crown was vindicated, and the end of the war answered.

As the king returned from this expedition, he met Don Pedro de Abones, with a very complete corps under his command, marching into the field. Upon this, he signified to Don Pedro, that the peace was concluded, and that he should forbear hostilities; which he was so far from regarding, that he wasted the country, in a manner not at all suitable to the laws of war. The king, thereupon, sent Don Sancho de Luna, with a body of troops to restrain him, who finding that was only to be done by force, engaged, beat and killed him^b. The king expressed great concern for this, and immediately sent Don Pedro's body to his relations. But his uncle Don Ferdinand applying himself to the passions of that family, and having recourse to those intrigues, which for many years had been his study, soon raised insurrections in almost all parts of the kingdom^c. The king, understanding that Don Sancho Abones, bishop of Saragossa, and brother to Don Pedro, was assembling a great body of troops, in hopes of making himself master of the capital, he sent Don Blasco de Alagon, and Don Artel de Luna, with what forces he could spare, to oppose him; and they behaved so well, that he was totally routed^d. The king marching against his uncle, thought he might prevent the city of Huesca from revolting, by an act of confidence and complaisance in going thither in person; but he had like to have paid very dear for this experiment, the populace taking up arms while he was in the town; so that with the few people that were about him he was forced to fight his way out^e. After this, having assembled such of the nobility as remained faithful, with a body of troops sufficient to defend his person, he declined prosecuting the war, in order to try what could be done by the softer method of negotiation.

THE nobility, after a little reflection, perceiving plainly, that it would be a difficult, and, at the same time, a very dishonourable thing to put the king a second time into prison, without doing which Don Ferdinand could be of no use to them, thought fit to reconcile themselves, as fast as they could, to their prince; who, instead of reproaching them with their past faults, studied excuses for their misbehaviour, that they might return with greater facility into his favour and presence^f. The great cities pursued a different conduct, particularly Saragossa, Huesca, and Jacca, entering into a kind of league, by which they erected a sort of republic within a monarchy, under pretence of defending each other from the inconveniencies that were the result of the present troubles. But, in a little time, those, who by their influence had determined them to this measure, began to assume such authority, and to levy such large sums of money, that the citizens quickly found, that, through the sound of liberty, they had been cheated out of the substance; and, therefore sent deputies to the king, to desire they might be restored to his protection. This monarch perceiving, that, after all, it would require some time to bring things into perfect order, declared of his own accord, a that he was willing the archbishop of Tarragona, the bishop of Lerida, and the grand master of the Temple should hear, determine, and redress, whatever grievances his subjects might sustain; and the reputation of these three persons was so great, that the people unanimously consented to what the king proposed; and thus, after he had worn the title about fourteen years, he became really king, and his own master, when he was something more than twenty^s.

THE great object of the king's ambition was, the conquest of the Moorish kingdom of Majorca; the inhabitants of that island, by their piracies, rendering the trade of his subjects in Catalonia altogether precarious. He assembled the states of that principality at Barcelona, where, upon the king's proposition, the conquest of that country was resolved upon, the number of troops fixed, and the necessary funds found and settled^b. While the states were sitting, the countess of Urgel put in her claim to that territory, as daughter and heiress to the deceased count, against Don Gerard Cabrera his nephew, who was in possession of it. The states decided in favour of the countess; and Don Gerard refusing to submit, the king put her into possession by force of arms; after which, he prevailed upon her to marry his cousin, the infant Don Pedro of *Portugal*ⁱ. The cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate, being informed that the king and queen were cousins, though in a remote degree, intimated, that their marriage was null. Upon which Donna Berengara, and her son Don Ferdinand of Castile, consented that the validity of this marriage should be inquired into by a council to be held for that purpose at Tarragona; where accordingly it was judged to be invalid, the pope's legate presiding. But the infant Don Alonso, who was born of this marriage, was to remain unprejudiced by this decision, and to retain his right to the crown^k. Most writers agree, that this was also a farce, and that the pope's legate acted by the king's instructions; however, she and her sons were sent back into Castile^l, and the king took the necessary measures for executing his project against Majorca. We shall not enter here into the particulars of that war, as they fall more properly within the design of the next section; and we shall, therefore, content ourselves with observing, that, by the close of the year, the capital was taken, the Moorish monarch made prisoner, and the island in a manner reduced by the Christians, though the Moors made a brave defence.

In the course of the war of Majorca, the Moors had applied themselves, in the strongest manner, to Abuzite, king of Valentia, for his assistance; but he declared, that the truce subsisting between him and the king of Arragon put it out of his power to comply with their demands: to which they imputed the loss of their liberty and country. How reasonable, or how just soever his conduct might be, it drew upon him great suspicions, insomuch that many of his subjects began to suspect he was in his heart a Christian^m. Zaen, who was governor of Denia, artfully heightened this spirit of disaffection, till it gave him an opportunity of expelling his master and his son out of the city, and the best part of the kingdom of Valentia; upon which they demanded and obtained the protection of the king of Arragon, with a suitable subsistence; and, besides Segorba and some other places remaining firm in their duty, Abuzite continued the sovereign of part of his dominions, notwithstanding the capital and the rest of them were in the hands of Zaen. This division suggested the hopes, at the same time that it furnished the king of Arragon with the means, of making himself master of the wholeⁿ; which he had ever in his view.

At this time, his reputation was so high in Spain, and he was held to be a prince who had the good of his subjects so much at heart, that the old king, Don Sancho of Navarre, desired to have an interview with him at Tudela; to which the monarch of Arragon readily consented. The motive, on the part of Don Sancho, was very extraordinary; he was offended with his nephew, Thibault, count of Champagne, who had raised some stir in his dominions; and therefore he adopted Don Jayme, and obliged his nobility, and even his nephew himself, to do him homage, and acknowledge him as his successor^o. The countess of Urgel, dying without heirs, bequeathed her territories to the infant Don Pedro of Portugal, her husband; but the king, being desirous of uniting that county to the principality of Catalonia, gave his cousin the lordship of Majorca, with which he was perfectly satisfied^p. This donation engaged the king to make another expedition for the reduction of Minorca; and having, upon this occasion, called an assembly of the states, he declared, in case any accident befel him, the kingdom belonged of right to the infant Don Alonso, who lived with his mother in Castile; but provided, in case of his accession, that he should bring no foreign troops, and reside in the castle of Monson, leaving the administration to a council of regency^q; which sufficiently destroys Mariana's notion, that, in the interview at Tudela, there was a reciprocal adoption, which, on the part of the king of Arragon, would have been very unnatural and a unjust; and, from the circumstances before-mentioned, it appears to have been false in fact^r. This expedition having ended as gloriously as he could wish, the king returned, covered with reputation, into Catalonia^s.

HE called, soon after, an assembly of the states at Monson, where he opened to them his new project for the entire conquest of the kingdom of Valentia. To facilitate this, an application was made to pope Gregory the ninth for a bull of croisade; which was accorded to him without any difficulty, and, upon the publication of it, the king found himself in a condition to prosecute the war with vigour, which he did for several years^t. The pope, in return for his bull of croisade, procured a council to be held at Tarragona, in which some canons were made that deserve notice, even in an Universal History. In this council, the reading^b of the holy scriptures, even of the Old or New Testament, in the vulgar tongue, is severely interdicted; it is forbidden to allow hereticks to be present at divine service; and by the seventh canon of this council, the holy office or inquisition was established in Arragon^u. The death of Don Sancho, king of Navarre, might have occasioned great disturbances, if this monarch had not been a hero in the severest sense of the word. The lords of that kingdom, after mature deliberation, concluded, that it would be most for the interest of the people of Navarre, to suffer the natural right of succession to take place, and consequently to raise Don Thibault to the throne. But, as his and their oaths stood in the way, it was necessary to ask the consent of the king of Arragon; who, with a magnanimity very unusual, and which it would be impossible to heighten by any praise, very readily bestowed it: by^c which the peace of both kingdoms was preserved, and the common interest of the Christians in Spain much strengthened^w. He continued all this time his incursions into Valentia, augmented his dominions every campaign, and brought that sinking state nearer and nearer to its dissolution; in which he was chearfully assisted by the nobility in his French, as well as his Spanish dominions^x, partly out of a zeal for religion, partly from a spirit of enterprize, and partly also with a view to their own interests.

By the interposition of the pope the king espouses Donna Yolande, or Violante, of Hungary.

THE pope, at that time, Gregory the ninth, desirous to attach so active and fortunate a monarch, in the strongest manner possible to himself, and to the holy see, proposed to the king of Arragon a marriage with Donna Yolande, or, as some stile her, Donna Violante, the daughter of Andrew, king of Hungary: which offer the king entertained, and the match was^d speedily concluded^y. In the mean time, a dispute had broke out between him and his cousin Don Nuno, count of Roussillon; but the king readily submitting it to reference, Don Nuno acquiesced, and attended him in his expedition into Ivica, which island when they had conquered, the king returned, and landed his forces in the territories of Valentia; but, upon the news of the queen's arrival at Barcelona, he set out immediately for that city, where their nuptials were celebrated on the eighth of September^z. The next year the king was in the field, and reduced several places of consequence; but perceiving that the war might be much shortened, if, with a little more expence, the army was rendered capable of attacking the city of Valentia; and, having summoned an assembly of the states at Monson, he made them so sensible of this, that they granted him the necessary supplies; notwithstanding which, it^e cost him another year before they were in a condition to execute that design; but, in the mean time, his troops gained a very glorious victory, under the command of Don Bernard de Enteca: in which, according to the credulity or the policy of those times, it was given out, that St. George, who is the patron of Arragon, was present^a. By this good fortune, the king was able to victual the fortresses which he had built, and to restrain the Moors, by which in effect the city of Valentia was already blockaded.

The king, to put an end to the war in Valentia besieges the capital.

ZAEN, who was the possessor, and stiled himself king of Valentia, perceiving by the great levies the king of Arragon made in the winter that he meant to besiege his capital in the spring, took all the precautions that prudence could suggest. He sent his favourite Ali Albala to Don Jayme, in order to try, if by any offers, he might be diverted from his purpose: and, at the same time, he addressed himself for succours to the king of Tunis, asserting, that this was a religious war, prosecuted with a design to drive the Moors out of Spain. In the former negotiation he had none, and in the latter but little success. The king of Arragon absolutely refused to listen to any proposals: the monarch of Tunis promised him help, as soon as an army and fleet could be assembled^b. Don Jayme was in the field in the month of January, and, having a numerous army, invested the city, though at a great distance; by this means he reduced abundance of castles and villages, or forced those by a whom they were inhabited to abandon them : and, as they all took shelter in Valentia, it produced a scarcity of provisions sooner than otherwise would have happened^c. Some, however, of the Arragonian nobility, perceiving that much time was already consumed, without any great progress, were for raising the siege ; but the king was altogether inflexible, knowing the distress that the Moors were already in, and that it would continually increase. A. D. 1238; Zaen once marched out with all his troops, as if he intended to fight ; but finding the Christian army ranged in order of battle, he retired, without attempting any thing. At length, however, the king of Tunis's fleet, containing upwards of twenty sail, appeared in the road ; for whose reception the king of Arragon had made such preparations, that though they once debarked the troops they had on board, yet the throwing in any relief was found to be a thing impracticable, and, therefore, after various attempts to little or no purpose, they returned home, and left their ally to the sole resource of the miserable borrowing courage from despair^d.

In this sad condition, Zaen sent his prime minister to Don Jayme, to know what terms he might expect, if he was disposed to surrender ; upon which the king offered him leave to depart, with such of his subjects as would follow him, with whatever they were able to carry ; provided this was done in the space of five days ; and that he also surrendered such fortresses as were in his hands on the other side of the river Xucar. Zaen very unwillingly submitted to these conditions, and sent the king word, that, provided hostilities were suspended, he would put the place into his hands on the 28th of September. To which the king replied, that, in order to gain a suspension of arms, he must cause the banner of Arragon to be hoisted in the most conspicuous part of the city ; which he accordingly did^e. At the day prefixed, Zaen evacuated the place accordingly, at the head of upwards of fifty thousand men ; but to prevent the difficulties that must have ensued, from the precipitate march of such a multitude, the king of Arragon allowed them twenty days more^f. He was no sooner master of Valentia, than he bestowed liberal rewards, as well upon the strangers as upon those of his own nobility, who had assisted in the siege ; and, at the same time, granted so many, and so great privileges to all who were willing to settle there, that it was repopled with Christians in a very short space of time ; in which the pope gave him all the assistance that could be derived from his plenitude of power^g.

d THE next year, his affairs obliged the king to make a tour to Montpelier, where the people had taken up arms against his governor, and, during his absence, his generals, not at all regarding the truce made with Zaen, took several places, and carried on the war as vigorously as before ; and what must be looked on as very extraordinary, the Spanish historians pretend, that they received miraculous assistance in these expeditions ; which the king of Arragon could not but disapprove, as equally inconsistent with his own authority, and with that public faith, which ought to be held sacred by all nations, who pretend to religion or civility^h. As this war had been chiefly conducted by his uncle Don Ferdinand, he might have thrown the blame of it upon him, and the lords who obeyed his orders ; but, during the three next years, he practised the same thing himself : and this, notwithstanding Zaen came to him himself in person, and offered to retire with his subjects into the island of Minorca, if he would suffer them to remain there in peace. But prosperity banishes all sense of shame, and ambition has no bowels. Don Jayme felt his superiority, and resolved to crush the crumbling monarchy of the Moors ; and, therefore, sweeping one place after another, he made himself master of the far greater part of Valentia, with less respect to the maxims of justice and honour than he had shewn in the former part of his life, and by the exercise of which he had obtained this greatnessⁱ. A conduct that would appear the worse in him, if it was less common among princes.

THE humour, with which he was now possessed, of directing all things at his will, induced him to divide his dominions between his two sons : to Don Alonso, whom he had by Donna Leonora of Castile, he gave the kingdom of Arragon^k ; and to Don Pedro, the son of Donna Violante, he gave the principality of Catalonia, which he would have bounded by the river Segro^l. This disobliged all parties ; Don Alonso considered himself as deprived of all that was given to his brother, and the people of Catalonia murmured at the cutting off from them the country between the rivers Cinca and Segro. To quiet the latter, he added this country to the portion of his youngest son. This so much provoked the elder, that, in conjunction with the infant Don Alonso of Castile, and Don Pedro of Arragon, he took up arms against his father, and made himself master of several places in the kingdom of Valentia ; but at length, after some acts of severity, unworthy of the king's character, matters were accommodated, and the infant Don Alonso, for a time, restored to his father's favour; who being freed from the apprehension of a civil war, went on taking or buying one place after another, till Zaen had nothing left in Valentia^m. But whether he survived these losses, or died of disease, or grief, while he had somewhat to lose, the Spanish authors do not inform us.

It was then, and not till then, that the king cast his eyes upon the few places that Abuzite had left, who, for his sake had lost all Valentia; he proposed therefore, which in effect was to command, that this poor prince should accept of an equivalent; and, having assigned him such revenues as he thought proper, seized and garrisoned those places, the inhabitants of which had been faithful to their sovereign through all his misfortunesⁿ. About this time, the king Don Jayme committed an action, which most writers have represented as the foulest and most execrable crime possible; he caused the tongue of Don Berenger, bishop of Gironne, to be cut out of his head; and then wrote to the pope to banish him out of his dominions. This bishop it seems was the king's confessor, and revealed to the pope, as it is said, what the king told him in confession. For this offence the king was excommunicated, and the pope sent two legates to absolve him publicly, after an open confession, and a severe penance^o. The king, who, though carried away sometimes by his passions, was certainly a good prince at the bottom, having called an assembly of the states at Huesca, declared to them the many inconveniencies the people sustained by the prevailing of different customs, having the force of laws, in the different parts of his dominions; he, therefore, advised them to examine these customs, to reconcile them as well as they could, and to form a body of laws that might be obeyed generally, and understood by every body^p. The Moors in Valentia, either from a strong appetite to liberty, or through the ill usage they met with since they became subjects to the Christians, grew exceedingly discontented; and, at the instigation of one Alasdrach, took up arms, seized several places, fortified them, and seemed disposed for a general revolt^q.

THE king, who was then at Calatayud, went immediately into Valentia, and took the necessary measures for suppressing this rebellion; the seeds of which, however, he found to be sown so deep, and scattered so far, that, by the advice of some of the ablest heads amongst his nobility, he came to a settled resolution of obliging the Moors in general to quit that kingdom. About the same time that he published an edict for carrying this project into execution, he made also, with great solemnity, his testament, by which he left the kingdom of Arragon only to the infant Don Alonso, gave the counties of Barcelona and Ribagorça, with the islands, to Don Pedro, his eldest son by the queen Violante; the kingdom of Valentia to his second son Don Jayme; and his dominions in France to Don Ferdinand his youngest son by that queen. By taking these strong and strange steps he found himself embarrassed, on all sides, to the last degree; for the infant Don Alonso was on the point of taking up arms again, in conjunction with the infant Don Pedro of Portugal, who was no less injured; but, by the persuasion of the infant Don Alonso of Castile, they were prevailed upon to accompany him to the siege of Seville, on his promise to interpose with the king Don Jayme^r. On the other hand, the Moors offered the king large sums of money to revoke his edict; but finding him inexorable they took up arms, which threw the whole kingdom of Valentia into confusion^s. However, being well supported by his nobility, Don Jayme executed his design by force, and compelled them to retire out of his territories, carrying with them their effects. Upon which they retired into Murcia, Granada, and some thousands transported themselves into Africa^t. By the marriage of his daughter Donna Violante with the infant Don Alonso of Castile, he procured to himself great advantages, and put it out of the power of the princes, whom he had disobliged, to disturb the tranquility of his dominions; which otherwise they had certainly done: and, in case of a civil war, the king, in all probability, must have been greatly distressed^u.

THE desire the king had of leaving his dominions and his family in peace, engaged him to offer the princes he had disobliged to leave all points in dispute between them to arbitrators, well chose by the states. The states were pleased with this moderation in the king, whose policy it was, in all critical conjunctures, to advise with his people, and to attach them to their duty by following their advice; in which he never succeeded better than on this occasion; for the arbitrators being chosen, the states by their deputies required the consent of the princes, who, seeing their hopes gone, if they differed with that assembly, were constrained to acquiesce. The commissioners met at a place called Ariza, and, after several conferences, determined, that the infant Don Alonso should have the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia,

- ^a and the infant Don Pedro the whole country of Catalonia^w. The next year, the infant Don Alonso returned into his father's dominions, and was well received; the decision of the commissioners was ratified by the state, and some good laws made in their assembly at Barcelona^x. In the month of October, the queen Donna Violante departed this life; and the king, as most historians say, espoused Donna Theresa Vidaura his mistress, by whom he had several natural children. Some writers mention certain high disputes, and even acts of hostility, between the king of Arragon and Don Alonso the wife of Castile; but the authors of those times say nothing of it, neither can we find any just or probable reasons assigned. That there were some murmurs in Arragon is more certain, and that the clergy particularly complained their privileges were not sufficiently respected; but the king Don Jayme called an assembly of the states at Lerida, in which he confirmed the liberties of his lay subjects as well as of the clergy; declared, he never had any intention to violate them; exhorted them to pay obedience to the laws, and not to oppress each other, and then endeavour to throw the blame upon him^z. By this seasonable step he opened the eyes of the common sort, who began to perceive the king's name was often abused.

- THE same conciliating disposition, which induced the king to compromise all points in dispute with the princes his neighbours, with his children, his prelates, and his subjects, led him to aim at terminating those differences and perplexed pretensions, which the crowns of France and Arragon had upon each other; and after a negotiation, which lasted near three years, he brought this point to bear, and finally adjusted every thing by one solemn and specific treaty. In this, the then king of France, St. Lewis, renounced, on his side, all rights on the counties of Barcelona, Gironne, Urgel, Ampurias, Cerdagna, and Roussillon. On the other side, the king of Arragon renounced all his claims on the counties of Carcaſſon, Rodez, Beziers, Albi, Foix, Cahors, Narbonne, Nimes, and several other places. He likewise quitted all his pretensions to Provence to queen Margaret of France, daughter to count Raymond Berenger. At the same time it was agreed, that prince Philip, the French king's son, should espouse Donna Isabella, the daughter of the king of Arragon, as soon as he was of age^a. Some fresh disputes arising between the infant Don Alonso of Arragon, and the king his father, the former, who had a little before married Donna Constantia, daughter to Don Gaston de Moncado, count of Bearn, died suddenly, which gave a new face to affairs in this kingdom^b. Don Jayme, who now considered Don Pedro as the heir of his kingdom, concluded a marriage between him and Donna Constantia, daughter to Mainfroi, prince of Tarento, who likewise claimed the title of king of Sicily, with whom he had the sum of fifty thousand ounces of gold^c. It is very remarkable, that on the fifteenth of October this year, upon a suspicion ^{A. D. 1260;} Don Pedro made privately, but with all the legal ceremonies, a protest, that in case he was brought to give any consent thereto in writing or on oath, it was by force, and against his will; and consequently null and void, and ought to be so reputed: so suddenly had this prince changed his maxims, upon his becoming heir apparent to the crown of Arragon^d.

- THE king took all imaginable pains to render his son's marriage acceptable to the pope, and to engage him to be reconciled to the prince of Tarento, but it was all in vain; at length the pope dying, the king proceeded in the match, and Don Pedro espoused Donna Constantia at Montpellier, about the same time that prince Philip married Donna Isabella at Clermont^e. The next year, the king being in the city of Valentia, he received a splendid embassy from the sultan of Egypt, whom he entertained with great kindness and magnificence, and at their departure sent with them two lords, from his own court, to compliment the sultan in his name^f. Upon certain intelligence, that Aben Joseph, king of Fez and Morocco, intended to invade Spain with a great army, the king caused Valentia to be fortified, and, in virtue of his alliance with the king of Castile, designed to invade Murcia, as thinking it infinitely more expedient to transfer the war into the enemy's country, than to suffer the Moors to enter his own. To procure the supplies necessary for putting his project into execution, he assembled the states of Catalonia at Barcelona, and obtained what he demanded, though with great difficulty^g. He went from thence to Saragossa, where the states of Arragon peremptorily refused to grant any money; upon which, some of the nobility gave him very considerable sums. The king, before the assembly rose, had recourse to his old method; he desired, that the states would name some of their own body, to consider the proposition he had made, and offered to be bound by their report. They named, accordingly, the bishops of Saragossa and Huesca, who immediately declared, that the king's demand was reasonable, and for the welfare of the state; upon which the supply was readily granted, and cheerfully paid^b. The next year, the king made an irruption into Murcia, where he took a great many places; and the year following made himself master of the capital: after which he delivered both with great honour to the king of Castile, pursuant to the treaty between the two crowns; in consequence of which, he made this war only as the ally of Don Alonso the wife^c. By this punctuality he added greatly to his reputation, and yet by putting the Castilians between him and the Moors he consulted his own interest.

THIS monarch, so prudent and so great in his public character, was the very reverse in his private life. He had entered into an amour with a lady who was related to him; and, being inclined to marry her, applied to the pope for a divorce from his third wife Donna Theresa, upon pretence that she had a contagious leprosy. But the pontiff, being well informed of the true cause, wrote him a letter, in which he not only refused his request, but exhorted him, in very strong terms, to alter a course of life so injurious to his dignity, and so unsuitable to his years^k. As this had not the desired effect, the pope wrote to him the year following, assuring him, that if he continued that scandalous conversation, he would excommunicate both him and his mistress Donna Berengara, daughter to the infant Don Alonso de Molina, and cousin to the king of Castile^l. It will appear probable, from the current of the history, that this epistle did make some impression upon the king's mind, since he took the cross, and resolved to go with a choice corps of his own troops into the Holy Land. His son, the infant Don Sancho, being elected, by the favour of the king of Castile, archbishop of Toledo, his father, at the earnest invitation of the king and queen of Castile, as well as of his son, made a journey to hear the archbishop sing his first mass, upon Christmas-day, in his church of Toledo^m, when the principal nobility of both kingdoms were present, and the whole conducted with the utmost pomp and splendour.

THE king having conferred often with his son-in-law Don Alonso, who endeavoured to persuade him to lay aside his voyage, but without effect, at length quitted the court of Castile, and went to Valentia, where he made the proper dispositions for the security of that kingdom, during his absence; he went next into Arragon for the same purpose; and having taken leave of his family, and of his principal ministers, he repaired to Barcelona in the autumn; and, on the fourth of September, embarked, with a fine body of troops, completely furnished with all things necessary, on board a squadron of thirty large ships, besides transports; but meeting with a severe storm on the coast of Sicily, they were separated, and the ship, in which the king was embarked, drove into a small port in France, from whence he returned into his own dominionsⁿ. He was scarce arrived there, before he found himself solicited to interpose in composing the disputes that had arisen between his son-in-law Don Alonso the wife, as well with his family as his subjects. The chagrin he felt, for undertaking this without effect, was very much heightened by a quarrel that broke out in his own family, between the infant Don Pedro his eldest son, and a natural son of his, Don Hernando Sanchez: which was carried to such extremities, that the former employed some to assassinate the latter, who, with great difficulty, saved his own life, and that of his wife by flight^o. Upon the invitation of pope Gregory the ninth, he resorted to the general council held at Lyons, and there had an interview with the pope; where, some say, he took it ill, that the pope refused to crown him in a solemn manner, and others, that he was received there with all the marks of respect possible. However, he returned to Montpellier in the space of three weeks, and from thence into Catalonia, where many of the nobility had taken up arms, his own bastard son Don Hernando Sanchez being at the head of the confederates^p.

THE king, as the surest way of restoring the public peace, caused an assembly of the states to be held at Lerida, where he explained the sources of this disorder; which were, that upon information that the Moor Aladrach, who had put himself under the protection of the king of Granada, had, by his intrigues, prompted a great number of his subjects in Valentia to take up arms, he directed the nobility of Catalonia to march thither with their forces, as the only method which in this exigency he could take: which order they disobeyed, and had entered into a league amongst themselves, to prevent any of them from being punished for their ill conduct^q. The states did all they could to compose these troubles, but to no purpose; they made, however, a law, to render the monarchy more strictly hereditary, swore fealty of their own accord to Don Alonso, the son of the infant Don Pedro, and desired the pope would give his sanction to this, which they would have considered as a fundamental law of the kingdom^r. The king, as soon as the states separated, marched in person against the count of Ampurias, and sent his son Don Pedro, with an army, to destroy

^a the seeds of sedition which were springing up in Arragon. He was very well pleased with this commission, pursued it vigorously, and having intelligence that his brother Don Hernando had thrown himself into the castle of Pomar, he caused it to be invested, and pushed the siege so vigorously, that Don Hernando, attempting to make his escape in disguise, was, by his brother's orders, thrown into the river Cinca, where he miserably perished^c. Don Pedro, having extinguished the rebellion, made an irruption into the kingdom of Granada, to punish the Moors for killing his brother the infant Don Sancho, archbishop of Toledo; of which we have given a full account in the history of Castile. While the royal infant was thus employed, the king had drawn upon himself another reproof from the pope, by causing the wife of a private person, to whom he had taken a fancy, to be carried away from her husband by force; which, however, served only to provoke him, and to render his vices ^{A. D. 1275.} more odious to his subjects^d.

THE next year, the Moors in Valentia, under the command of Alasdrach, and by the assistance of the king of Granada, executed the revolt they had so long projected, and seized Montesa, and some other places^e. The king, upon the first notice, having assembled a numerous army, took up his own quarters at Xativa, from whence he detached Don Pedro Fernandez de Hjar, his natural son, with a strong corps of troops, to reduce Beniopa, into which the Moors had put a great garrison, and directed, that two other lords, with another body of troops, should prevent the enemy from sending any relief. Don Pedro Fernandez was fortunate enough to execute his design, but the other lords, being drawn into an ambuscade, were totally defeated; Don Garcia de Azagra with the best part of the troops being cut to pieces, and Don Pedro de Moncado, grand master of the Templars, made prisoner with the rest^f. The news of this defeat being carried to the king at Xativa, struck him to the heart, so that he immediately fell sick. He caused himself, thereupon, to be transported to Alcira, in hopes of growing better by the change of air; but, finding himself worse, he sent for his son Don Pedro, and, recommending his brother in the most passionate terms, resigned the crown, and, having taken the habit of a Cistercian monk, and expressed in a most pathetic manner his penitence for the ill example he had given his family and subjects, he expired on the twenty-fifth of July, in the year one thousand two hundred seventy-six, in the sixty-third year of his reign, and in the sixty-ninth of his life^g. He left behind him his successor Don Pedro, his second son Don Jayme, or James, to whom he gave the kingdom of Majorca, and all that he held in France, Donna Violante, queen of Castile, Donna Isabella, queen of France, Donna Constantia, the wife of the infant Don Emanuel of Castile, Donna Sancha, who, it is said, went in a disguise to Jerusalem, and led there a life of devotion, Donna Maria, who died a nun; all these by his second queen Donna Violante. By his third wife Donna Theresa, to whom he was certainly once, if not twice married, Don Jayme, and Don Pedro: and by Donna Berengara Fernandez, a lady of the first quality, Don Pedro Fernandez de Hjar^h.

THE king Don Pedro the third caused his father's body to be deposited, for the present, in the cathedral of Valentia, and having made a truce with the Moors, went to Saragossa, where he was crowned with great solemnity, on the twenty-seventh of November; with Donna Constantia his queen; and the states, at the same time, acknowledged in the most solemn manner his eldest son the infant Don Alonso for his successorⁱ. He granted protection to Donna Blanca and her sons, the infants de la Cerda; and, having received from the pope permission to tax the clergy for the war with the Moors, he attacked them on all sides, as soon as the truce was expired, and pushed them with such vigour, that they were obliged to shut themselves up in Montesa, notwithstanding that their strength fell short of 30,000 men^j. The king invested and attacked the place with such spirit and success, that by the close of September the were obliged to capitulate; by which he put an end to the troubles of Valentia^k. The satisfaction he derived from thence was quickly troubled, by the almost total defection of Catalonia, where the nobility took up arms, under pretence that he had not assembled the states of that country, or sworn to preserve their privileges; but, in reality, because they apprehended he meant to extinguish some pernicious customs, that were equally detrimental to the authority of the sovereign, and to the welfare of the greatest part of his subjects^l. In the spring of the next year, the king assembled the states of Tarragona, where he commanded the prelates and great lords to repair to Valentia, in order to remove his father's corpse to the monastery of Toplet; which ceremony was performed with great pomp and magnificence^m. He then attacked the confederate lords, and partly by force, partly by treaty, dissolved their alliance, and obliged them to submitⁿ.

His firmness, address, and success in the conduct of his administration.

A. D. 1280.

HE managed with great dexterity in the quarrels between the crowns of France and Castile; and though he had an interview with the infant Don Sancho, of which we have a large account in Mariana, yet it does not appear, that he entered deeply into his measures, though he made him large promises^f. He compelled his brother Don Jayme to do him homage for the kingdom of Majorca, and all the dominions his father had left him, contrary to the intention of that monarch^g. The confederate lords taking up arms again in Catalonia, Don Pedro, though they had assembled a great body of troops, compelled them to quit the field, and to shut themselves up in the castle of Balaguer; where, after a short siege, he obliged them to surrender at discretion, and sent most of them prisoners to different fortresses: by which the peace of his dominions was perfectly restored^h. He went afterwards to Tholouse, where he had a conference with his brother-in-law king Philip; to whom he explained the motives of his conduct in Catalonia, that, in case of any fresh troubles, the malecontents might be able to obtain no succours from that sideⁱ. On his return into Arragon from this interview, he received ambassadors from Don Denis king of Portugal, to demand his daughter the infanta Isabella, or Elizabeth, in marriage: to which he readily consented; and that princess was so exemplary in her conduct, that, after her demise, she was considered as a saint^k.

which he was engaged to vindicate his queen's claim
Sicily.

THE reader has been before informed, that this monarch, in right of his wife, had a claim to the crown of Sicily; the nature of which will be explained in the history of that kingdom. The French, who were then masters of that island, oppressed the people to such a degree, that John de Prochira, a noble Sicilian, formed the project of setting them at liberty. He went first to the pope, who, though he approved his project, would run no hazards, Charles of Anjou, who then held Sicily, being very powerful in Italy^l. Prochira went next to Constantinople, where he represented to the Greek emperor, Michael Palaeologus, that, under pretence of an expedition to the Holy Land, Charles of Anjou was making vast preparations by land and sea, with an intention to dethrone him; adding, that the only way to prevent this blow was to engage Don Pedro of Arragon to assert his right to the kingdom of Sicily. The Greek emperor closed with his proposals, and sent him into Arragon, where he was well received by Don Pedro, who told him, he was not averse to such an expedition, but that it would require an immense sum of money, which he had not^m. Prochira went back to Constantinople, where he so alarmed the Greek emperor's fears, that he obtained at once that large sum Don Pedro demanded, and which he brought him with great fidelity, and, what was yet more extraordinary, he managed these several negotiations with so much address, and such profound secrecy, that when the king of Arragon began to assemble his fleet and army, none of his neighbours were able to penetrate his design, and he amused them with such general answers, as did not in the least explain itⁿ. When his preparations were in a manner complete, he very unexpectedly set all the lords at liberty, telling them, that men of noble minds were to be bound by obligations; and that he expected that tranquility from their gratitude, which a prince of another character would have thought better secured by continuing them in confinement^o.

great spirit and success the expedition
isle of Sicily.

WHILE the king was busy in equipping this great armament, the brother of the king of Tunis, who was lord of the town Constantine, and a little district about it, sent to implore his protection against his brother, who threatened to strip him of his small seigniorie. Don Pedro promised him all, and even more than he desired, looking upon this as the most happy incident possible, since it afforded him a plausible pretence of saying, that he armed against the infidels^p. At length, having embarked a fine army, on board a fleet of one hundred and fifty sail, he weighed anchor on the sixth of June from the port of Tangos, leaving the infant Don Alonso, and the queen his mother, regents, and steered directly for Minorca^q. He proceeded from that island to Alcael, a port in Africa, belonging to the lord of Constantine, where he landed his troops, and dispatched ambassadors to the pope to desire his assistance in carrying on the war against the Infidels^r. But affairs had quite changed their face at Rome, where, instead of Nicholas the third, who was an implacable enemy to Charles, king of Sicily, Martin the fourth now occupied the papal throne, who was the creature of that prince, and who, suspecting Don Pedro's design, treated his ambassadors but roughly^s. In the mean time, the people of Sicily having assured Don Pedro, that they were entirely devoted to his interest, he quitted Africa, and arrived in the month of August at Trapani, from whence he proceeded to Palermo, where he was received with all imaginable joy, and with universal applause proclaimed king of Sicily^t. He afterwards employed his fleet and army in delivering Messina, which was besieged by king Charles, whose fleet was beaten at sea by the infant Don Jayme of Arragon, which left him the undisturbed possession of the island to which he laid claim^u.

- a. The pope, however, on the behalf of his competitor, launched his spiritual thunder against Don Pedro, and, by a bull dated December the eighteenth, declared him excommunicated^w. The campaign ended with an agreement between the competitors, to decide their contested titles by a personal combat at Bourdeaux, on the first of June, in the ensuing year, to be attended each by one hundred knights^x. The French historians say, that Don Pedro was the challenger^y; whereas those of Arragon assert, it was king Charles^z. But the fact is out of dispute, as also, that the king of England, to whom they were both related, promised them a fair field for terminating their quarrel.

- THE king Don Pedro employed the next spring in reducing most of the places in the island, in which his competitor had garrisons; and the queen Donna Constantia, and her two sons Don Jayme and Don Frederic being arrived, in pursuance of his orders, he settled the regency in her and the infant Don Jayme with a council; and having detected a conspiracy against his life, and punished such as were concerned in it, he embarked at Trapani for Valentia, where he arrived on the seventeenth of May^a. It is asserted by the historians of Arragon, that he actually proceeded to Bourdeaux, and, early in the morning, on the first of June, presented himself to the seneschal of Edward, king of England, and demanded of him, whether he might be secured of a fair field, as had been promised; but the seneschal told him, that king Philip of France was expected there with his brother; that he had a prodigious number of troops in their neighbourhood; and that he could not answer for his security: upon which the king left his buckler and his lance, as proofs that he had personally appeared, and then withdrew privately and speedily into his dominions^b. The French historians say the direct contrary, alleging, that Charles king of Naples and Sicily appeared, traversed the ground appointed for the combat with his knights, and that the king of Arragon arriving in disguise, came in the evening, and when his competitor was withdrawn, and engaged the seneschal to enter his appearance^c. It is however certain, that the French soon after sent troops into Arragon, against whom the king, assisted by Don Sancho of Castile, defended himself without any loss either of territory or credit^d. In the month of October he assembled the states of Arragon at Saragossa, in order to pacify some disputes which had arisen with the nobility about their privileges, and soon after received advice, that Roger de Lauria, whom he had left his admiral in Sicily, had gained some advantages over the enemy, and had made himself master of the island of Malta^e. At this time, Don Juan Nugnez de Lara, in right of marriage, was become possessed of Albarracin, a place of great strength and importance on the frontiers of Arragon and Castile. This, by the family of Azagra, had been erected into a kind of sovereignty, which by a strange concurrence of accidents, but particularly by courting the favour of one crown, when that of the other was lost, and keeping up the mutual jealousy of such an acquisition, had been strangely preserved, and from the precariousness of this tenure fortified, as far as the skill of that age would go. It was now become a terror to both; for Philip the hardy, king of France, being at war with the two crowns of Castile and Arragon, and having Don Juan at his devotion, intended to make use of it as a door into the dominions of Don Sancho and Don Pedro. The former, very sensible of the consequences with which this might be attended, relinquished all his pretensions to the latter, who immediately sent the infant Don Alonso to reduce it. The siege was long and difficult, but it was at last rendered by capitulation; upon which the king gave it to his natural son Don Ferdinand, whom he had by Donna Inez or Agnes Zapata^f. He intended to have reduced Tudela also this campaign; but finding that too hazardous an enterprise, he desisted, the rather because he was informed, that king Philip intended to attack him, in the ensuing summer, with the whole power of France; for which therefore it was necessary to prepare.

- THE success of the campaign by land in Spain was nothing in comparison of the good fortune of his power by sea, under the command of Roger de Lauria, who with a squadron of forty galleys, cruising within sight of the port of Naples, brought out Charles the lame, prince of Salerno, son of Charles, king of Naples and Sicily, with his father's whole strength of seventy galleys well armed. The fight was long and obstinate, the issue of it very extraordinary; for the admiral of Arragon not only gained a complete victory, but took from the enemy one gally more than the number of his whole fleet; and, to complete his triumph, the prince of Salerno himself^g. Donna Constantia, queen of Sicily, had a sister Donna Beatrix, whom king Charles had long kept in prison; the queen sent him a message, that if he did not instantly release and restore her sister, she would put his son to death: upon which Donna Beatrice was presently sent to Sicily^b. But the people of that island, who have never ^a been very famous for humanity, discovering very strong resentments against the prisoners taken in the last fight, Don Pedro was no sooner informed of it, than he gave orders they should all be set at liberty, except prince Charles, whom he directed to be sent into Catalonia, purely to preserve his life^c. The pope renewed his censures against the king of Arragon, and to enforce them, gave away his kingdom, as a fief of the holy see, to Charles de Valois, son to king Philip the hardy; publishing at the same time a croisade against the deposed king of Arragon; by which the same indulgencies were given to those who fought against him, as if they made war against the infidels: and, which is very astonishing, the king of France accepted of this grant, in favour of his son, took the cross, and assembled one of the greatest armies that had ever been seen, in order to go and put him in possession of it^k.

The invasion of Arragon by the French, their retreat,
Pedro's death.

THIS papal fury, though it excited a foreign war, did not in the least disturb the domestic peace of the king's dominions; for not only his lay subjects, but even the bishops and clergy, treated this affair as it ought to be treated, worshipping God, and behaving with fidelity to the king, notwithstanding the pope's interdict. Don Jayme, king of Majorca, deserted his brother, and joined the king of France; upon which Don Pedro made a quick march into his country of Roussillon, and besieged Perpignan, in which city he was with his wife and children. The place was taken, after a long defence, but Don Jayme escaped; yet the queen and her son were sent prisoners into Arragon^l. When all his preparations were finished, Philip the hardy attempted to enter Arragon, with an army of eighty thousand foot, and seventy thousand horse; the king Don Pedro seized the passages of the Pyrenees; but as such ^c precautions seldom take effect, king Philip found means to bring down his whole army into Catalonia, where he quickly took Roses and Castillon^m. Don Pedro, having put a strong garrison into Gironne, under the command of Don Raymond, viscount Cardona, dismissed the greatest part of his troops, and kept the field only with a flying army. Don Raymond answered the king's expectations, and made a very gallant defence; for the siege began on the twenty eighth of June, and the place was not surrendered till the seventh of September, and then upon very honourable conditionsⁿ. In the mean time, the king's fleets at sea beat the French over and over, and, with the assistance of a corps of land troops, destroyed all their great magazines at Roses; so that king Philip, after he had made a public entry into Gironne, and placed a strong garrison there, was obliged to return; which, as the king of ^d Arragon foresaw, he made him pay exceeding dear for his passage. So that arriving with the remains of a once formidable army at Perpignan, the king was seized with a distemper which carried him off in a few days^o. Don Pedro no sooner returned from harassing the French army, than he presented himself before Gironne, and, on his proposing to the garrison leave to march out, and an assurance of conducting them safe into France, they very wisely surrendered^p. The king then sent his son Don Alonso with a strong fleet to punish his brother Don Jayme; but before he was well arrived in Majorca the king fell ill at Villa Franca de Panades, where he departed this life on the tenth of November, one thousand two hundred and eighty-five, in the tenth year of his reign, and forty-sixth of his age^q. He left the crown of Arragon to Don Alonso^r, and that of Sicily to his second son Don Jayme^s. Besides these, he left two younger sons, Don Frederic and Don Pedro, and two daughters, Donna Isabella, queen of Portugal, and Donna Constantia, who espoused Robert, king of Naples; besides a great many natural children, both sons and daughters. He was a very brave and generous prince, and really merited the title of great, which is given him by the Arragonian writers, by his actions, as well as by his fortune^t. His old enemy pope Martin died a few months before him, and he also survived his competitor Charles of Anjou, king of Naples^u.

Don Alonso
III. succeeds,

DON Alonso the third succeeded his father, though absent in the expedition against his uncle. He was a prince remarkable for discharging his duty, in all relations, with great punctuality. He was obedient to his father, kind to his brethren, and so liberal in his ^f temper, that he obtained the surname of the munificent^v. He received the news of his father's death almost as soon as he landed in the island of Majorca; but he took the capital, and reduced the rest of the islands, before he returned to Valentia^x. His brother Don Jayme caused himself, likewise, to be crowned king of Sicily^y. Don Alonso, upon his arrival at Valentia received a message from the principal nobility of Arragon, who from a league they had contracted among themselves in his father's reign, had assumed the title of the union. The purport of this message was, that they were surprized he had assumed the regal title

a before his coronation, and swearing to maintain their privileges. The king gave them a soft answer, and hastened his coronation; which solemnity was performed with great magnificence, on Easter-day, in the church of *Saragossa*². This did not intirely put an end to his disputes with the lords of the union, who pretended he had no right to choose his own ministers or servants, but ought to receive them from the states. The king saw plainly, they were encouraged to this by the perplexed situation in which his father had left his affairs; and therefore he would enter into no disputes, which he found was the only way to agree with them³.

There had been a treaty, in his father's life-time, for a marriage between him and the princess Eleanor, daughter to king Edward the first of England; that monarch, therefore, ^{Resolves to marry the daughter of Edward I. of England, and receives many favours.} interposed very kindly in his affairs, and sent over doctor Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, and doctor John Vesey, to propose to him the heads of a treaty, which might make him perfectly easy. He was easily prevailed on to consent, that Charles, prince of Salerno, should be set at liberty, upon condition that his brother remained king of Sicily, and that he should marry the princess Blanch, the daughter of Charles, and that his eldest son Robert should espouse Donna Constantia, whom some writers call Violante, the sister of the kings of Arragon and Naples; but this treaty was rejected by the pope, who, affecting to tread in the steps of his predecessor, would not acknowledge Don Alonso's title^b. A. D. 1286.

The king employed the next year in the entire conquest of the islands of Minorca and Ivica, which, when he had accomplished, he returned into Catalonia, called an assembly of the states, and therein cancelled at once all the exemptions and privileges of the nobility that were injurious to the crown and the people^c. ^{After restoring peace abroad, and the dignity of the crown at home, he dies suddenly.} The year following, he had an interview with king Edward at Conflans; wherein it was agreed, that the prince of Salerno, or, as others styled him, the king of Naples, should be set at liberty, upon his giving his two sons, Lewis and Robert, and several lords, as hostages for the performance of articles; and of these one was, that he should give his daughter in marriage to Charles de Valois, with his duchy of Anjou, upon condition that he should renounce all title to the crown of Arragon: but the pope remained still inflexible. This pope was Nicholas the fourth, who excommunicated Don Alonso, released Charles from his engagements, and crowned him king of Sicily^d. At length, king Edward prevailed upon all the princes, who were embarked in this quarrel, to send their plenipotentiaries to Perpignan; from whence soon after the congress was removed to Tarascon, where, in the month of February, all things were adjusted; but, in this treaty, the king Don Jayme of Sicily was excluded, to satisfy the pope, who thereupon annulled all that had been done against the king of Arragon, or his father^e. As soon as this affair was adjusted, Don Alonso sent the viscount of Cardona into Guienne, to receive the princess Eleanor, and caused preparations to be made for his marriage at Barcelona, with that magnificence which was natural to him. But, in the midst of them, he was suddenly taken ill on horseback; and, being carried to his palace, died on the eighteenth of June, one thousand two hundred and ninety-one, when he had reigned almost six years^f. He was a prince highly esteemed by his neighbours, and beloved by his subjects; and, in all probability, had he lived, would have equalled in reputation any of his predecessors. His temporising had delivered him from the restrictions intended by the union; for a prince, who has surmounted difficulties, is not to be controuled.

The states of Arragon assembled at Saragossa sent immediately the count of Ampurias to Don Jayme II. acquaint Don Jayme, king of Sicily, with the death of his brother, and to invite him to come and take possession of the throne. In complying with which invitation, he made such dispatch, that leaving his mother Donna Constantia, and his brother Don Frederic, regents of Sicily, he arrived at Barcelona on the twenty-sixth of August, and was crowned at Saragossa on the sixth of September following, to the great satisfaction of his new subjects^g. He thought fit to act upon different principles from those of his brother, who, in consideration of the kingdom of Murcia, yielded to him by solemn treaty, had acknowledged the Infant de la Cerda for king of Castile. This monarch, on the contrary, closed with Don Sancho, agreed to marry his daughter Donna Isabella, though but nine years of age, and afterwards consented to accept him for the mediator of the peace with the crowns of France and Naples; for, by the death of the late king, the treaty of Tarascon was dissolved^h. These negotiations lasted during the life of Don Sancho, who had such an influence over the king of Arragon, that he prevailed upon him, for the sake of restoring the peace of Christendom, to renounce his rights to the kingdom of Sicily; which, however, proved of no great consequence; for his mother and his brother Frederic absolutely refused to be bound by this cession, resolving to put themselves upon the fidelity of their subjects, and to trust the Sicilians with the defence of their title to Sicily against all opponents¹. The king Don Jayme, notwithstanding, on the death of Don Sancho, espoused the daughter of Charles, king of Naples, instead of the Infanta of Castile; pope Boniface the eighth was graciously pleased to absolve the bishops and clergy of Arragon for the great crimes of worshipping God, and obeying their kings, contrary to the commands of his predecessors; and Charles de Valois once more renounced his rights to the kingdom of Arragon, in favour of a monarch who had all the rights to it already that politicians could devise, viz. descent, his brother's will, and the choice of the states².

THE king Don Jayme, though somewhat mutable in his measures, was extremely steady to his interests; and, perceiving the weakness of the government of Castile, renewed his brother's treaty with the Infant Don Alonso de la Cerda, acknowledged his title, and assisted him³. He likewise equipped a stout fleet, and, having embarked a body of troops on board it, went in person to reduce Alicant, which he performed; and conquered afterwards the best part of the kingdom of *Murcia*⁴. Pope Boniface studied by all means to gain over the king of Arragon, in hopes of prevailing upon him to engage his brother, or to force, him to quit the kingdom of Sicily. Don Jayme, wearied with perpetual solicitations, made at length a voyage to Rome, where the pope redoubled his caresses, gave him the title of standard-bearer of the holy church, and very generously bestowed upon him the islands of Sardinia and Corfica, to be held as fiefs from the see of Rome, whenever he should be able to conquer them⁵. All this was done, in order to persuade him to employ his arms against his brother; but the king went no farther than to send for his mother and sister to Rome, where the latter was married by the pope to Robert, duke of Calabria, and then he returned into his own dominions⁶. After his return, the tears of his wife, the instances of his allies, and the fair promises of the pope, induced him to equip a numerous fleet; with which he sailed first to Naples, where he left his queen Donna Blanca with her father, and then weighed anchor, with a full resolution to dethrone his brother. The king Don Frederic, who had also a great naval force, thought it better to meet than to expect the danger; and therefore put to sea with an intent to give him battle. However, on receiving a message from him, that he had better remain in his own dominions, he retired. The king of Arragon then landed his troops in Sicily, took several places, and required by proclamation all his subjects in his brother's service to join him, which most of them did, and amongst the rest the famous Roger de Lauria. King Frederic, however, defended himself with vigour, beat several of his brother's squadrons, and took many of his galleys; upon which Don Jayme sent him word to release his subjects, and to send back his vessels, and he would give him no farther trouble; which, by the advice of his council, he absolutely refused. The king of Arragon retired in great discontent to Naples with the rest of his fleet, exhorted his father-in-law to assemble as great a force as he could in the spring, when he promised to return with a fleet superior to that which had been employed in this year's service⁷. We may discern from hence, how great the naval force of the dominions of Arragon must have been, when so great a loss was so easily and suddenly to be repaired.

Makes another expedition against his brother, and tho' victorious discontinues the war.

The king Don Jayme, who had been forced into this first expedition, being now piqued at the losses he had received, assembled, on his return into Catalonia, a fleet of fifty-five sail, with which he proceeded to Naples; and having joined the squadron of his father-in-law, commanded by Robert, duke of Calabria, and Don Raymond, prince of Tarento, steered directly for Sicily. Don Frederic, whose fleet in the harbour of Messina consisted of forty vessels, boldly weighed anchor, and, notwithstanding their great superiority, engaged the combined fleets. The fight was very obstinate and very bloody, but at length the Sicilians were totally defeated, with great loss of ships and men; and it was with some difficulty that king Frederic himself escaped with a few galleys. This success had a surprising effect on the king of Arragon's disposition; for, returning with his victorious fleet to Naples, he sent for his mother, the queen-dowager of Arragon and Sicily, and his family, and, in spite of all the persuasions of the pope's legate, his father-in-law, and his brothers, returned to *Barcelona*⁸. The next year he laboured by his ambassadors to persuade Don Frederic to think of peace, but no solicitations could induce him to renew the war, from which he was vehemently dissuaded by the queen his mother upon her death-bed⁹.

Receives the Infant de la Cerda, but finds it impracticable to establish him.

In the opinion of politicians the troubles of one kingdom are often the harvests of another. The king of Arragon had embraced the party of Don Alonso de la Cerda, and owned him as king of Castile, for the sake of obtaining the fruitful kingdom of Murcia, a great part of which was actually by conquest, but in virtue of this concession in his hands. To keep this,

- a. he was obliged to assist that prince in maintaining his title, and was in hopes, that the king of France, who was nearly related to the Infant in blood, would have taken a share in the war; or would at least have contributed towards its expence. But, finding himself wholly mistaken; he was constrained to lay a tax upon salt, which extending to all his subjects in general; created great uneasiness, and induced some of the nobility to think of reviving the union^a. Upon this the king called an assembly of the states at Saragossa, in which his conduct was approved, but the nobility disapproved theirs: however, his son Don Jayme was acknowledged presumptive heir to the crown^b. The discontented lords applied themselves to the queen-regent of Castile, as the malecontents of Castile had entered into a league with the king of Arragon. The king saw the folly of all this; he proposed to the queen a peace, if she would make a cession of what he had already acquired in Murcia, which she rejected, perhaps with more spirit than prudence; for this obliged the king to foment the troubles in Castile, whether he would or not^c. On the return of Don Alonso from the court of France, he gave him good advice, and in plain terms recommended to him compromising things in the best manner he could. The pope, tired out with the war in Sicily, consented, at length, to acknowledge king Frederic; of which that prince gave his brother notice, who was exceeding well pleased with the news. The king was now very desirous of turning the concession of the islands of Sardinia and Corfica to some account; but his schemes were interrupted by the death of pope Benedict the eleventh, and the long vacancy of the papal see. However, during this interval, the king took the best measures he could to avail himself of this donation^d.

- A PEACE with Castile was so necessary, that the king consented to the congress of Campillo, where, as we have shewn in its proper place, it was not concluded much to his advantage. The king sent an ambassador to do homage to pope Clement the fifth for the islands of Sardinia and Corfica, and the Genoese, who were already in possession of part of these countries, sent an embassy to the king, in hopes of regulating matters amicably. Don Jayme demanded from the pope a bull of concession, which was sent him, dated May the twenty-eighth; and several of the Sardinian lords came to pay their respects, offer him their service, and to acknowledge his title^e. The progress of this affair was stopped, however, by the breaking out of another of a very extraordinary nature, which was the persecution of the knights templars; who, at the request of the pope, were generally arrested, and thrown into prison, and all the large estates they held in the king's dominions were on the point of being confiscated. The kingdom of Navarre was, at this time, in the hands of France; notwithstanding which, a war broke out with the crown of Arragon, occasioned probably by some disturbances on the frontiers: in the prosecution of which Don Jayme was far from being successful, for his troops were twice beaten, and his standard taken. In France, and even in Castile, at the request of the pope, the templars were treated with the most barbarous severity. The king of Arragon was very much pressed to treat them in the same manner, but his constant answer was, We must first be convinced of their guilt, and it will be then time enough to talk of their punishment^f. At the request of Don Ferdinand, king of Castile, he had an interview with him at the monastery of Huerta; wherein two points were regulated, the first, that they should make war jointly against the Moors, the second, that the Infant of Arragon should marry Donna Leonora, the king of Castile's daughter^g. The business of the knights templars remained still in agitation, and the people in general were so provoked against them, that they were compelled to shut themselves up in the fortresses belonging to their order, to prevent being torn in pieces, which precaution was represented to the king of Arragon as an act of rebellion. He marched, therefore, with a corps of troops against one of these fortresses, and summoned it. The knight, who commanded, surrendered immediately, and told the king the truth, assuring him, that they desired nothing but a fair trial, with which the king was extremely moved; took the whole order into his protection; forbade any to abuse or insult them under the heaviest penalties. At the same time he declared, he was ready to receive any informations against them that were supported by proofs: but declared also, that if the informers failed therein, he would punish them as they deserved; which kept things in his territories quiet^h.

ALL things being in readiness for his expedition against the Moors, the king embarked at Valentia on the eighteenth of July, and soon after landed his forces in the neighbourhood of Almeria, which was the object of this expedition. The forces being landed, with the ammunition and military stores, the fleet of Arragon failed to join that of Castile, and to cruize upon the Moors.

the coast of Barbary, to prevent any succours which might enable the enemy to relieve either ^a of the sieges; Don Ferdinand having besieged Algezira, and Don Jayme having invested Almeria on the fifteenth of August ^b. Mohammed Aben Albamar, king of Granada, was exceedingly piqued at the king of Arragon's invasion, with whom he never had any war or dispute before; and therefore determined to attack him first. With this view, he began his march towards him with a numerous army; of which, as soon as Don Jayme had intelligence, he quitted his camp, leaving a small body of troops there, commanded by his cousin Don Ferdinand, son to the king of Majorca, and gave him battle on the twenty-fourth of the same month; when, after a warm contest, the Moors were defeated, with the loss of six thousand men, and the Moors, who had sallied from Almeria while the engagement lasted, were also repulsed by Don Ferdinand with great loss ^c. This, however, did not hinder the king of Granada from attempting the relief of the place a second time, on the fifteenth of October, when he received another check. Notwithstanding which, the rains coming on, Don Ferdinand of Castile being retired from before Algezira, and the king having intelligence of some troubles breaking out in Catalonia, he thought fit to make a truce with the Moors, upon condition that they set at liberty all his subjects wherever taken; and having embarked his army returned into his own dominions ^d. On the twelfth of November, in the succeeding year, died his queen Donna Blanca, exceedingly regretted by his subjects for her many virtues and amiable qualities. At an interview with Don Ferdinand of Castile, it was determined to persist in carrying on the war jointly against the Moors; and besides the alliance before contracted, it was agreed, that Don Pedro, the king of Castile's brother, should marry the Infanta Donna Maria, daughter to Don Jayme; but, with respect to the war, as the pope refused to grant the usual succours, and as the troubles in Castile hindered the king from taking the field, the king of Arragon, who had still the conquest of Sardinia and Corfica in his own mind, remained quiet in his own dominions ^e.

Treats the knights templars, on the dissolution of that order, with equity and indulgence.

THE hard measure the templars met with in other kingdoms, did not pass for any rule with Don Jayme, who caused their conduct to be examined in a council held at Tarragona; in which those who were convicted of any crimes were punished as they deserved, and the possession of their estates secured to the innocent during their lives: after which, as the order was to be suppressed, by the common consent of Christian princes, their revenues were assigned to the other military orders ^f. The king's daughter Donna Isabella espoused Frederic, duke of Austria, and though much solicited by his other son-in-law the Infant Don Pedro of Castile, Don Jayme meddled very little with the troubles in that country ^g. The year following, the pope interposed in behalf of Robert, king of Naples, to prevail upon the king to desist, or rather to oblige the Catalans his subjects to desist from their expeditions into Greece, which, as they were not made at the command, or for the advantage, of the king of Arragon, and as they are mentioned with more propriety in another place, we shall not insist upon here.

BUT while they were disturbing the peace of others, their own trade, and that of the kingdom of Valentia, was rendered precarious, indeed almost impracticable, by the pyracies of the Tunizeens ^h. The king, therefore, to put an end to this evil, caused a strong squadron to be equipped, under the command of William de Moncada, who had orders to make the Infidels feel, in a very sensible manner, the weight of his master's displeasure. Accordingly, he debarked his troops, and made himself master of several fortresses along the coast, wasting the country in so cruel a manner, that, in order to be delivered from him, the king of Tunis offered to pay an annual tribute of five thousand doubloons, which the king of Arragon accepted; but it was upon condition that the fortresses he had taken should remain in his hands for the payment of that tribute ⁱ. The very same year, the king married Donna Maria, daughter to Henry, king of Cyprus, and, on occasion of this match, he sent an embassy to the sultan of Babylon, to desire his permission to ransom such Arragonians and Catalans as were prisoners within the extent of his dominions. His younger son Don Alonso, marrying Donna Theresa, heiress of Urgel, acquired the possession of that country, which, when he came to succeed his father, was annexed to the crown, from which it was again disjoined ^k.

As the affairs of this monarch were now in a very happy condition, he turned his thoughts entirely to the improvement of his dominions, providing for the welfare of his subjects, and giving what assistance was in his power to his allies. With this view, he sent his uncle Don Ferdinand de Hizar to mediate a peace between his brother Don Frederic, king of Sicily, and his father-in-law Charles, king of Naples, and afterwards joined with the king of Portugal as a a mediator between the two crowns¹. He procured from pope John the twenty-second the approbation of the new order of Montesa, which he erected in the kingdom of Valentia, and upon which he bestowed the estates of the templars. He procured also from the same pope, the erection of Saragossa into an archbishopric, and compelled some of his nobility, who had taken up arms to decide their disputes; to lay them down, and to submit to the determination of the laws^m.

ALL the satisfaction this great king enjoyed, from a continued series of prosperous events, The very singular and extraordinary case of the Infant Don was not a little disturbed by the untoward disposition and unexampled obstinacy of his eldest son, the Infant Don Jayme, whom with great difficulty, and not without a mixture of force, the king brought to espouse Donna Eleonora of Castile, whom he quitted immediatelyⁿ.

b Upon this, his father threatened him (perhaps without intending it) with the loss of his succession; to which the Infant replied, that all the favour he asked was leave to renounce it^o. Mariana has given us a very fine speech of the king upon this occasion, and it is very certain, that he omitted nothing that could be offered to make the young man quit this resolution. He was however inflexible. He said, he despised a life of care, and thought it not at all paid for by a crown; that he loved privacy and ease, and thought them very cheaply purchased at this expence; that he knew many bad things had been done to acquire crowns, but that he thought there was no crime in declining one that was his indubitable right. Upon this the king called an assembly of the states, where, upon the fourteenth day of December, the Infant Don Jayme freely renounced all title to the crown, and the states with his consent, and in his presence, took an oath of fealty to his brother the Infant Don Alonso^p. Don Jayme of A. D. 1319. his own accord assumed the habit of Calatrava, and soon after changed it for that of Montesa. His subsequent course of life shewed, that he was not without vices and follies, but ambition was not amongst the number of the former, or unsteadiness of the latter. He passed his time in his own way, and lived and died content^q. In the same assembly of the states, Arragon, Valentia, and Catalonia were united, and declared to be inseparable in time to come^r.

THE next year was distinguished by another singularity in the king's family. His son, the Infant Don Juan, being elected archbishop of Toledo, and that election being confirmed by the pope, he was consecrated in the presence of his father with great solemnity at Lerida, by Don Ximenes de Luna, archbishop of Tarragona, and Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of Saragossa. The Infant Don Juan of Arragon consecrated archbishop of Toledo. d He was no sooner in the possession of his new dignity than he began to exercise acts of primacy, upon which the two archbishops excommunicated him; the king was exceedingly offended; but when those prelates told him, that they did it to vindicate the independency of the crown of Arragon upon that of Castile, he was very much softened, and advised his son to go to his church, where this extraordinary conduct did not a little recommend him^s. A new war having broke out between Frederic, king of Sicily, and his brother-in-law Robert, king of Naples, the king of Arragon desired the pope to interpose, and at the same time demanded his permission to send two ships richly laden into the dominions of the Infidels, to procure the liberty of multitudes of his subjects, Arragonians and Catalans, that were prisoners there, which was readily granted^t. 1320.

e THE queen Donna Maria dying, the king soon after married a third time, Donna Elizinda de Moncada^u. An assembly of the states being held at Lerida, the king laid before them his title to the island of Sardinia, and likewise informed them, that the inhabitants, weary of the tyranny of the Pisans, had pressed him to deliver them; that however, as he could do nothing without their assistance, he would not do any thing without their advice. The states answered, that he was bound in honour as a king to prosecute his right; and it was his duty to relieve the miserable; and that whatever he thought reasonable to ask, they were ready to grant. Don Sancho, king of Majorca, who was present, did homage for his dominions, and offered to serve in this expedition with twenty gallees. The Infant Don Alonso was declared admiral and commander in chief, and, having hoisted his flag in the harbour of Barcelona, f had quickly a fleet and army sufficient for the conquests he was about to undertake^v.

BUT the king was advised to delay the expedition a little, till it should be seen what favours the pope would grant him, in respect of levying money upon the clergy, and also what dependence might be placed upon the assurances he had received from some of the nobility; and many of the inhabitants of the island of Sardinia. In regard to the court of Rome, he found himself absolutely disappointed; the pope grew jealous of his power, and therefore would contribute nothing towards making him so near a neighbour. In Sardinia some of the Undertaken by the Infant Don Alonso, conducted with prudence, and ended with success.

nobles took up arms in favour of the king of Arragon, surprized several of the garrisons ^a belonging to the Pisans, and, having given the highest demonstrations of their fidelity by beginning the war, pressed the king of Arragon not to abandon them². As this was never his intention, and as his preparations had been still going on, there was nothing farther necessary than to send his orders for the prince to embark, having previously sent a small squadron; with a supply of troops and provisions, to the lords who had taken up arms. The prince sailed on the fifth of June with a fleet of sixty men of war and galleys, and two hundred and forty transports³. Upon his arriving happily in the port of Palma, and debarking his forces, many of the nobility and gentry came in, and acknowledged the king of Arragon for their sovereign; by whose advice the prince invested Izlegias and Cagliari, the two principal places in the island, at the same time. Both these places made a good defence, and the Pisans, on ^b their side, used their utmost endeavours to relieve them; so that it was the seventh of February, in the year following, before the first of them surrendered, and the latter held out near a year, and was rendered at length upon terms, the republic of Pisa being to hold the city and castle as vassals to the king of Arragon, and to put the rest of the island into his hands².

1324. ^c THIS treaty being carried into execution, the Infant Don Alonso returned into his father's dominions, and landed at Barcelona, on the second of August. In his absence, and while he was dangerously ill, at the siege of Cagliari, his brother Don Pedro had prevailed upon their father to create him count of Ribagorça and Ampurias with very great solemnity, and, as some writers say, in case of Don Alonso's death, he was in hopes of defeating his nephews of the succession: his father, to prevent any intrigues of this sort, gave him the command of the ^d auxiliary troops, with which he was obliged to furnish the pope, in consideration of his grant of the islands of Sardinia and Corfica; for, besides two thousand marks of silver, he was to send a hundred horse, and five hundred foot, to serve in the wars of the church². On the arrival of Don Pedro, the pope remitted half of this for ten years. On the fourth of September died Don Sancho, king of Majorca; upon which, Don Jayme signified his intention to unite those islands to his other dominions; but the Infant Don Philip, who had embraced an ecclesiastical life, having demonstrated to the king, that Don Jayme, the son of the Infant Don Ferdinand of Majorca, was the lawful heir, and called to the succession by the will of the deceased king, the king of Arragon declared, that he would be as tender of another's rights as of his own, and relinquished all claim, but that of appointing the Infant Don Philip ^e his uncle guardian of the young prince².

He defeats his uncle's scheme, and procures his son to be acknowledged successor to the king. THE fleet of Arragon had scarce quitted the coast of Sardinia before troubles broke out there; which, however, were quickly appeased. However, the potent family of Oria, and the marquis de Malespini, not finding their account, at least in the degree they expected, from this revolution, changed sides, and, in conjunction with the Pisans, renewed the war². The king of Arragon sent immediately a squadron of twelve sail, with a fresh body of troops into the island. The Pisans were no sooner informed of this, and that the castle of Cagliari was closely blocked up, than they fitted out a strong fleet under the command of Gaspar Oria; but admiral Carroz, with the fleet of Arragon, lying before the harbour of Cagliari, prevented their entrance, and, after a very sharp and bloody dispute, beat and dispersed them². ^e In Arragon, the king held the states general at Saragossa, where, at the instance of the Infant Don Alonso, his son Don Pedro was acknowledged heir to the crown, in case his father should die in the life-time of the king; with which his uncle Don Pedro, count of Ribagorça, was so highly offended, that he withdrew from the assembly, with all the lords of his party².

The king dies with very great esteem, and in possession of the hearts of his subjects. THE Infant Don Juan, the king's uncle, archbishop of Toledo, and chancellor of Castile, having lost the favour of the king Don Alonso the eleventh, and being deprived of his high office, exchanged his archbishopric for that of *Tarragona*². In Sardinia, Don Raymond de Paralta and admiral Carroz pushed the war with so much vigour and success, that at length the Pisans offered to evacuate the island, which they were permitted to do, in virtue of a treaty made for that purpose. The marquis de Malespini and the malecontents, having now ^f lost all support, applied themselves to the king of Arragon, to know what fate they were to expect: who, in return, acquainted them, that, in case they could forget their former seditious inclinations, they might depend upon the same favour and protection that was shewn to the rest of his subjects; upon which they laid down their arms, and returned to the quiet enjoyment of their estates². The pope being engaged in a war against the emperor Lewis of Bavaria, the king of Arragon sent his son the Infant Don Pedro with the auxiliaries that he was bound to furnish, as feudatory to the holy see for the island of *Sardinia*². a teenth day of October died Donna Theresa, the consort of Don Alonso; by whom she had three children, Don Pedro, Don Jayme, and Donna Constantia. Upon the last day of the same month deceased the king Don Jayme, surnamed very deservedly the Just, infinitely regretted by all his subjects; in the twenty-seventh year of his reign, and when his glory was at its highest pitch¹.

ALONSO the fourth succeeded his father with universal approbation, and was crowned with great solemnity on the feast of Whitsunday following, in the cathedral church of Saragossa, by Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of that city, in the presence of the states, who were then assembled^k. Upon this occasion, the king made many knights, and amongst them his son Don Jayme, whom he created count of Urgel. He also concluded a treaty with the kings of Tunis and Tremecen, to whom he was become very formidable by his possession of Sardinia^l. Don Alonso IV. succeeds his father, and espouses the Infanta Leonora of Castile.

b In the beginning of the succeeding year, he had an interview with Don Alonso of Castile, with whom he concluded a very close alliance, and, as the seal of it, espoused his sister the Infanta Donna Leonora; and, at the close of the year, that princess was delivered of Don Ferdinand, whom his father created marquis of Tortosa, and lord of Albarracin^m. In consequence of his treaty with Castile, he found himself obliged to take some share in the war with the Moors, and accordingly acted against the king of Granada both by land and sea; though the Castilian writers would persuade us, that he was a little negligent in that war, on account of his own disputes with the *Genoese*ⁿ. It is indeed true, that the republic of Genoa having excited the malecontents to take up arms, and furnished them with assistance; the king, provoked by this behaviour, entered into a war with them, which was both long and bloody; but that this did not hinder him from executing his treaty with Castile appears incontestible from hence, that the king of Granada had no sooner concluded a truce with Don Alonso of Castile, than he marched a numerous army through Murcia into Valentia, where they wasted the whole country with fire and sword^o. A. D. 1330.

c THE pope and the king of Naples interposed with Don Alonso of Arragon, in favour of the Manages Genoese, who, finding their whole coast destroyed by the king's fleet, seemed desirous of putting an end to the quarrel. Don Alonso answered, that when they withdrew the troops they had in Sardinia, and gave him proper assurances that they would give no farther assistance to the rebels in that island, he would forget what was past, and live with them as friends for the future; but that, while he continued their enemy, he would endeavour to make them sensible, they had not consulted their interest in giving him offence, neither was he induced to alter his opinion by their sending a fleet of forty men of war and galleys, to ravage the coasts of Catalonia and Valentia. These afterwards made an attempt upon Sardinia, where they were so warmly received, that they retired with loss, as the Moors of Granada likewise did, who had made another irruption into the kingdom of Valentia, upon the king's advancing towards them with a numerous army: so that abroad things went as well as the king could desire; and if they had remained in quiet at home, there could have been nothing left for them to wish: but the same spirit of discord that disturbs private families, in finding a passage into those of kings excites national discontents^p. foreign affairs; with great spirit, success; and reputation.

d To conceive this matter clearly, it is requisite to observe, that the generosity of this monarch was so well known as to excite, soon after his accession, an application from the states to prevent his granting away any of the demesnes of the crown; which he took to be so reasonable, that he promised upon oath not to make any grants for ten years to come. This oath his son the Infant Don Pedro apprehended to be infringed, by his bestowing Tortosa and Albarracin on the Infant Don Ferdinand, of which he complained loudly. On the other hand, the king declared, that when he made that oath he had no thought of precluding himself from the right of providing for his children; and, by the advice of his young queen Leonora, banished Don Pedro de Luna, archbishop of Saragossa, who, as she surmised, had put this into the Infant's head^q. This irritated Don Pedro to such a degree, that he surprized Xativa, which was one of the places the king had assigned Donna Leonora for her jointure. The queen, who was very sensible that the king's ill state of health, who was at that time very much afflicted with the dropsy, was what chiefly encouraged the Infant to these excesses, applied to her brother, who refused to interfere at all during the life-time of the monarch, who had rejected the applications of Don Juan Emanuel and the rest of the malecontents, with great prudence and honour; but assured her, that if, upon his demise, his successor did her any injustice, she might rely upon his protection^r. The Infant, to strengthen his party, laboured, with the consent of his father, to marry the heiress of Navarre. This year was fatal to two princes of the royal blood, the Infant Don Juan, patriarch of Alex- Unhappy in his family, from what cause, and in what an high degree.

andria, and archbishop of Tarragona, less distinguished by his birth and titles than by his virtues; and the Infant Don Jayme, who, as we have before observed, preferred a private life to the splendour of a crown; and, after he made that choice, never gave any sign of dissatisfaction, or the slightest grounds of suspicion^a.

Dies with the sincere affection of his subjects, and highly respected by his allies.

A. D. 1335.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, the marriage of the Infant Don Pedro was concluded by the archbishop of Saragossa with Donna Maria, princess of Navarre, though it was at first intended he should have married her eldest sister Donna Joanna; but it seems he liked the younger better, and insisted upon her being declared heiress of the kingdom, in prejudice of her elder sister, who, after this affront, married the viscount of Roan^b. It was in consideration of this marriage, that the Infant engaged himself precipitately in favour of the people of Navarre, in the invasion they made upon Castile, where he received that chastisement that was due to his folly, as we have shewn in its proper place. The king, Don Alonso of Arragon, made this year a tour into Valentia, in hopes the air of that country might have contributed to his recovery; and, while he was there, he received ambassadors from the king of Granada, with whom he concluded a peace^c. The war in Sardinia still subsisted, and, in its consequences, had created some disputes between the crown of Arragon and the pope; the king insisting, on the one side, to be released from the tribute he paid for the island of Sardinia, since the whole of it was not in his possession; and the pope complaining, that the admiral of Arragon had acted to the prejudice of Robert, king of Naples^d. Don Juan Emanuel threw himself, at this time, upon the king's protection, who, though he would give him no assistance towards the execution of his project, did not think fit to deny him a retreat^e in his dominions, out of respect to his birth. The care of his physicians, and the mild climate of Valentia, proving ineffectual for the king's relief, he departed this life on the twenty-fourth of January, one thousand three hundred and thirty-six, in the ninth year of his reign, having merited, by the gentleness of his administration, the surname of the Kind^f.

Don Pedro IV. succeeds his father, and meets with much discord and trouble.

Don Pedro the fourth felt all the cares and anxieties of royalty, from the moment he became a king. The queen his mother-in-law, Donna Leonora, with the assistance of Don Pedro Exerica, and some other persons of quality, took the necessary measures to provide for the security of herself and her children, though, at the same time, she wrote in very plausible terms to the king^a. The inhabitants of Catalonia pressed Don Pedro, with great importunity, to make a tour into that country, and to confirm their privileges before he was crowned; while the people of Arragon, on the other hand, insisted, that he should follow the custom of his predecessors, assemble the states, and confirm their privileges at his coronation. He judged it, after mature deliberation, more convenient to comply with their desires, and accordingly he was crowned on Easter-day in the cathedral of Saragossa; or rather he crowned himself, for the only two Catalan lords who remained with him advised him to this expedient, that the archbishop of Saragossa's placing the crown upon his head might not be urged as an argument that he held Arragon, as well as Sardinia, as vassal to the pope^b. Immediately after his coronation, the people of Valentia intreated him to come thither, and to confirm their privileges; but he thought it more expedient to go to Lerida, where, after he had done all that was expected from him, the prelates and lords of Catalonia did homage, and swore fidelity^c. As the king of Castile pressed him to confirm his father's grants to the queen and her children, he gave him only general answers, insinuating, that he was desirous of living upon good terms with the queen his mother-in-law, and of providing for his brethren; but that, if his father's grants were exorbitant, he could not acquiesce under them without prejudice to his subjects^d. The states general of his dominions approved of his conduct, and declared the estates of Don Pedro Exerica forfeited. The king, however, sent commissioners to Don Pedro to summon him to return to his duty, whom he received with great respect, and submitted to all their demands; but, upon the appearance of a body of Castilian horse, he delivered them into their hands, notwithstanding he had given them a safe conduct^e. The king of Arragon immediately entered into a treaty with Don Juan Emanuel, and the malecontents of Castile, upon which ensued a war between the two kingdoms^f.

THE queen-dowager Donna Leonora, having applied to pope Benedict the twelfth, he acted, upon that occasion, in a manner very suitable to his character; he solicited the kings of Castile and Arragon to lay aside hostilities, and to resume the milder method of negotiation. He represented to the latter, that since he considered his father's grant to be exorbitant, it would be best to refer that to the states, concluding his interposition with a stroke

- a of his papal authority, requiring the archbishop of Saragossa to come to Rome, to answer for a behaviour so unworthy in a Christian prelate, as that with which he was charged, of fomenting disputes in the royal family^c. The kings submitted to the pope's advice; and Don Juan Emanuel being reconciled to his sovereign, was appointed plenipotentiary for the queen-dowager; the king, on the other hand, made choice of his uncle the infant Don Pedro; and, upon a conference held in the presence of the pope's legates, the arbitrators agreed, the king should receive Don Pedro Exerica into his favour; that the king of Castile should release the viscount of Cabrera, and other lords of Arragon, who were prisoners in his dominions; that the queen-dowager should be put in possession of all the places assigned her by the late king, without prejudice to the authority of the reigning prince; and that the infants Don Ferdinand and Don Juan should likewise be put in possession of their appennages; but that the king might give an equivalent for the latter, if he thought fit. These articles A. D. 1338. were ratified by the kings of Castile and Arragon; and this troublesome affair ended, the two monarchs entered into a close alliance against the Moors, who threatened both their kingdoms with an invasion, both by land and sea, from Granada and Morocco^f.

- In the beginning of the ensuing year, the queen Donna Leonora returned to court, where she was exceedingly well received, and had the generosity to pardon the archbishop of Saragossa all the injuries he had done her, though she knew he had prevailed upon the deputies of that city to protest against the last agreement^e. The king of Majorca having deferred doing homage for his dominions, the king Don Pedro assigned him a day for that purpose; and though he laboured to have the time prolonged, yet, in the end, he was forced to submit^b. The king of Arragon went in person soon after to Avignon, to do homage to the pope for the kingdom of Sardinia; and being accompanied at his public entry by the king of Majorca, a very unlucky accident happened. The lord, who led the king of Arragon's horse, suffering him to go a little too quick, he, who performed the same office to the king of Majorca, struck both the horse and the man: upon which the king of Arragon laid his hand upon his sword; but his uncle Don Pedro interposing, things went no fartherⁱ. The fleet of Arragon served with great reputation this year against the Moors, but the admiral who commanded it had the misfortune to be killed at the siege of Algezira, to the great mortification of the king of Castile as well as of his master^k. The precautions taken by Don Pedro in repairing and fortifying all the strong places in Valentia, and the keeping a stout squadron upon the coast, prevented, or rather put it out of the power of, the king of Morocco to execute the invasion that he intended: so that the young monarch raised a high reputation, which however was chiefly owing to the prudent councils of his uncle Don Pedro, who managed the great influence he had over him entirely for the benefit of his subjects, and the honour of the crown^l.

- The pope being well informed, that the reason why the king of Arragon was so exceedingly apprehensive of the Moors making a descent in his dominions, was the number of Mohammedans and Jews that inhabited Valentia, wrote to him in very pressing terms to drive them all out, and sent briefs upon the same subject to the archbishops of Tarragona and Saragossa; but the king, who knew that a great part of his revenue arose from the industry of the one, and the commerce of the other, was in no great hurry to pursue this ecclesiastical advice, but chose rather to reap the benefit of their stay, and to guard as well as he could against the inconveniencies attending it^m. The people of Corfica, perceiving that the lords in Sardinia, who had embraced the party of the crown of Arragon, were infinitely more at ease than themselves, began to wish they were under the same sovereign; and Hugo Cortingo and Lope Cinerecha, who were the principal persons in that island, dispatched the bishop of Aleria to assure him, that, if he would but afford them the countenance of a fleet, they would revolt, and put the island into his hands; but Don Pedro had at that time so many things to attend, that he gave these lords a fair answer, yet did not accept of their proposalⁿ. However, he sent his uncle Don Sancho to Rome, to solicit a grant of the tenths of the clergy for three years, in consideration of his war against the Moors, and to remit the tribute of the island of Sardinia, since he did not receive so much out of its revenues^o.

His spleen against Don Jayme, king of Majorca, rose so high, that, notwithstanding that monarch had married his sister, he resolved to dispossess him of his dominions, which seemed a work of no great difficulty, since, by a very unseasonable affectation of independency, he had drawn upon himself the arms of the king of France, and was already stripped of most of the countries he held in that kingdom, and had taxed his subjects in the islands so high, ^a that they solicited the king of Arragon to take them under his protection^p. According to some writers, the king of Arragon had been instrumental in exciting his brother-in-law to refuse homage to the French king, on purpose to bring him into difficulties; and indeed ^b there is great reason to believe, that what they have delivered on this subject is true. For, in the midst of his distress, and when he was daily soliciting relief, he summoned him to appear, in the assembly of the states of Barcelona, to answer for the non-payment of tribute, for presuming to enter into a war with France without his permission, and for coining money, which, as his feudatory, he had no right to do. About the same time, he sent his brother Don Jayme to fetch over the queen of Majorca his sister; and that unfortunate monarch her husband, seeing plainly that his ruin was designed, in a high fit of resentment began first: ^c He renounced his homage to Don Pedro, proclaimed war against him, challenged him, and seized all the merchandize belonging to his subjects that were in his dominion^q. Don Pedro, who expected all this, withdrew his fleet from the coast of Castile, where it had performed great things, and took all his measures with such an air of uncertainty and trouble, as if he had been apprehensive of danger from a prince, whom he was contriving to dispossess of all his dominions, and made no doubt of performing it in a single campaign. We shall be obliged to mention these transactions again in another place, and shall therefore run over the capital points briefly here.

THE situation of things in Europe, at that time, put it fully in the power of the king of Arragon to execute all he intended, with the same ease and promptitude with which it ^c had been contrived: and he went through every step of it with the same stern unrelenting severity that he had shewn in his first proceedings. He began by declaring roundly on the eighteenth of February at Barcelona, that the king of Majorca stood deprived, for his contumacy and rebellion, of all his dominions; and, at the same time he made this declaration, he ordered his brother to fall with a strong corps of troops into Roussillon^r. He embarked in person on board his fleet with fifteen thousand foot and three hundred horse, and with this force he debarked in Majorca, on the twenty-fifth of May. The king Don Jayme had a considerable body of troops in good order, with which he thought it very practicable, either to have prevented Don Pedro's landing; or with some advantage to have given him battle after he was landed. But alas! he was very little acquainted with his own circum- ^d stances; since no sooner was Don Pedro in the field, and in a condition to act, but, according to the assurances they had given, the whole, or at least the far greatest part, of the king of Majorca's army deserted; so that he was forced, in a week's time, to embark with a few faithful friends on board a small ship, which landed him safely in France^s. Don Pedro, on the other hand, made a solemn and splendid entry into the capital, and promised the inhabitants, that their island should never be detached from the dominions of Arragon more; and having left a force sufficient to secure that, and reduce the two other islands of Minorca and Ivica, he returned into his own territories, fully determined to strip this miserable prince of the poor remains he had still left^t: in which he made a considerable progress the same year; but, at the request of the pope's legate, towards the close of it, he consented to a truce for ^e eight months. This seemed to be the effects of pity, but proceeded in reality from policy; for his funds being exhausted, he was obliged to put his army into winter quarters^u.

As soon as the truce expired, which was in the month of May following, without paying the least attention to the interposition of the pope and other Christian princes, he resumed the war with such rigour, and with so great a superiority, that the unfortunate king of Majorca, who had shut himself up in Perpignan, finding it impossible to make any resistance, had recourse to his clemency; and, being introduced into his presence by Don Pedro Exerica, bending one knee to the ground, he humbly acknowledged his indiscretion, and besought him to remember, that he was a king, a prince of his own blood, his brother-in-law, and that his children were his nephews. To which ^f Don Pedro very drily answered, that, upon the surrender of Perpignan, he might merit his pity. It was accordingly surrendered, and the king of Arragon made his public entry into it on the sixteenth of July; and, on the twenty-second of the same month, he published an edict, by which the county of Roussillon, and all the states dependent upon it, were re-united for ever to the crown of Arragon^w. He carried his vengeance still farther; under pretence of expressing his pity, he declared, that if the unfortunate Don Jayme would lay aside the title of king, he would allow him an annuity of ten thousand livres per annum, and permit him to enjoy some estates he had still left in France, which, as he foresaw, drove that undone prince into despair. All that was left in his power was, to express his rage

a against the king of Arragon in the roughest terms, and the companions of his ill fortune threw out reproaches of the same kind against Don Pedro Exerica, which however were very ill founded, and had like to have been attended with very fatal consequences: at length, not knowing where to hide his head, the count of Foix generously afforded him a retreat, which gave the king of Arragon infinite disquiet *.

THE pope and the king of France made still some shew of soliciting, in favour of the dethroned king. But Don Pedro was a thorough politician, took his measures so well, rendered himself so formidable, and applied his presents and his promises with such propriety, that he quieted Clement the sixth ^{Softens the pope and the crown of France, in the business of the king of Majorca.}; and by proposing a marriage between his daughter and the grandson of the French king, he stopped all solicitations from that quarter². He discovered some inclination to revive his disputes with the queen-dowager, and his brothers; but Don Alonso of Castile sustained their interests in a very different manner from that which had been shewn by the pretended friends of the king of Majorca; upon which, as his interest directed, Don Pedro thought fit to desist³. He was now become odious, but, at the same time, terrible to his neighbours: however, the Genoese and the Pisans were in great hopes, with the assistance of some exiled malecontents, to have it in their power to expel his forces out of Sardinia. A. D. 1345.

THE scheme was well laid, and, in all probability, would have had its effect; but Don Pedro's Defeats the politics dissipated the storm; he made a strict alliance with the Venetians, which gave him a superiority at sea, and, as if it had been the pure effects of clemency, he granted a pardon ^{Defeats the schemes of the Genoese and Pisans upon the island of Sardinia. 1346.} without restrictions, and restored all the exiles to their estates, so that of conspirators they became courtiers in an instant: and thus the schemes of the two republics were absolutely defeated^b. The constant success that had attended his negotiations and his arms, cherished that ambition which was natural to Don Pedro, and encouraged him to believe, that he might execute without difficulty what none of his predecessors durst have attempted. He had already awed the states into many things, and he resolved to exert his utmost policy and power to procure their concurrence in a measure, which he knew the best part of them must consider as directly contrary to the constitution: a thing hitherto unpractised in Arragon, where preceding kings had made the protection of the public liberty the ruling maxim of their administrations.

d WE have before observed, that in his marriage with the infanta Donna Maria of Navarre, he had stipulated an infraction of the rule of succession in that kingdom; and as he had by this princess three daughters, the infantas Constantia, Johanna, and Maria, he determined to ^{Forms a design of altering the succession in favour of the infantas his daughters.} set aside his brothers; and to engage the states to entail his whole dominions upon the infanta Donna Constantia. The first step he took, in order to this, was to establish a commission of twenty-two divines and civil lawyers, and of these nineteen declared the king's proposition to be conformable to the laws of Arragon^c. Ferreras, and some other writers, seem to be also of this opinion; but the ablest and most learned of the historians of Arragon are of the other side^d. It is not our business to interfere in this dispute, but it is our duty to report the facts, and this, which is before us, makes it evident, that the rule of succession in Arragon was otherwise; for, if it had not, the king stood in no need of a new law, but might have trusted the succession to the regulation of the states upon his demise. On the other hand, the infant Don Jayme, who conceived himself to be exceedingly injured by this disposition, associated the principal nobility of Arragon, who charged the king with violating their privileges in many particulars, in that kind of confederacy to which they gave the name of the union, and declared himself their head; upon which the king deprived him of his post of lieutenant-general of the kingdom of Valentia, forbid him to enter that city upon any pretence, and extended this prohibition also to Barcelona, Lerida, and Saragossa^e. In this situation of things, an event happened that might have changed the face of them entirely, which was, the queen Donna Maria's being brought to bed at Valentia of a son; but this young prince died the same day, and, on the fifth day after, his mother also expired^f. 1347.

f THE king Don Pedro having information that the queen dowager had proposed to the court of Portugal a marriage between her son the infant Don Ferdinand, and the infanta Donna Leonora, ^{His brother Don Jayme revives against him the union of Arragon.} he dispatched a minister of his to Lisbon, to solicit that princess for himself, in which, by the help of an infinity of intrigues, he prevailed^g. The dethroned king of Majorca made an attempt upon that country, but without effect; the same spirit that had driven him out inducing the people to keep him out; so that, with a few forces he brought with him, he was forced to embark again, and retire into France^h. The news of this invasion, and of his brother Don Jayme's being invited by the nobility and people to Saragossa, in quality of the head of the league, ^a induced the king Don Pedro to go into Catalonia to keep that country quiet. He had no sooner quitted Valentia than the nobility and people of that kingdom likewise formed a union, of which they made the infant Don Ferdinand chief. Don Pedro, soon after his arrival at Barcelona, dispatched an able minister to the court of Castile to dissuade the king from entertaining any correspondence with the union of Arragon, assuring him he would consider his sister the queen-dowager's interest as his own, provided he would give no assistance to that assembly, which the king readily promised; but, at the same time, allowed the infant Don Ferdinand to raise eight hundred men in his dominions ⁱ. On the other hand, Don Pedro licensed Michael Perez Zapata to become a mighty warm patriot, that, by insinuating himself with the principal persons engaged in the union, he might either bring them into the king's ^b measures, or raise disputes among themselves; but, for the present, this project likewise failed. The king was on the point of quitting Catalonia, when he understood that the king of Majorca, with a small body of troops, had penetrated into Roussillon. Upon this he marched thither, attacked, and defeated him; and, having provided for the security of that country, returned into Arragon, where he found himself obliged by the union to call an assembly of the states at Saragossa ^k.

He is constrained to call an assembly of the states, and to make therein great concessions.

HE saw clearly, that he should be obliged to make many concessions; and therefore, the day before the states met, he privately made a protest, that whatever acts he did or signed in that assembly were null and void, as being against his opinion, and under compulsion. Fortified with this unkingly evasion, he met the states, made them a long, artful, disingenuous ^c speech, and heard very patiently all the disagreeable things they had to say; for without scruple they told him to his face, that his reign had been hitherto a continued series of breaches upon their constitution; that, by bestowing public employments upon bad men, he had made the people of Arragon pay the wages of those who laboured for their destruction; that, for the future therefore, he must think of governing by law; of removing these dangerous people from about his person; and of receiving his ministers, governors, and generals, upon the recommendation of the states: which, if he hesitated to do, they would elect a new king. He seemed to take no offence at this, but contented himself with observing, that it was improper for persons in such an assembly to come armed; which he did in favour of his own partizans, who were afraid of declaring themselves upon that account: the assembly ^d thereupon made an order, that for the future none should appear armed in their debates. The king, now secure of a party, came the next day, and falling upon his brother Don Jayme, in a set speech told him, he was an unnatural and perfidious rebel, and his associates traitors. The infant excused himself very modestly, hinted at the services he had done his country, which, he said, were overpaid by the honour they had done him in electing him head of the union; but some of the members who were near the door opened it, and exclaimed, that the king had violated the privileges of the states, and that it was doubtful whether their lives were secure. Upon which, a multitude of people armed burst in, and the king was indebted to his brother, and the chiefs of the malecontents, that he went away alive ^e.

THE infant, and some of the principal nobility, attended him to Barcelona, where the queen was expected, and where, while they waited for her, an apoplexy was so complaisant as to remove Don Jayme; which has induced the historians of Arragon to assert, that it was of the king's procuring ^m. It did not however contribute much to his advantage, since, while his marriage was celebrating with pomp and magnificence at Barcelona, Don Ferdinand was making a great progress, by force of arms, in the kingdom of Valentia, and, from his success there, was declared also head of the union of Arragon; into which kingdom he sent his brother Don Juan to supply his place ⁿ. In Sardinia also most of the great families had rebelled; upon which the king sent Hugo Cervelon with a supply to his brother the viceroy, which proved fatal to them both; for engaging the malecontents precipitately, they were, ^f together with the viceroy's son, and all the Arragonian cavalry, cut to pieces ^o.

THE next year was still more fruitful of great events; indeed, there have seldom happened, in the same compass of time, so many extraordinary transactions in any kingdom. The union of Valentia went on raising troops, and the union of Barcelona, according to the league that was between them, sent a considerable reinforcement, under the command of Don Ximenes de Urrea and Don Lope de Luna, which last was privately in the king's interest, and, by picking a quarrel with his associates, debauched the best part of the troops, and defeated the service ^p. However, the infant Don Ferdinand was so well beloved, and the a cause was so popular in Valentia, that he suffered nothing by this accident, but found himself very soon at the head of fifty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The king Don Pedro, who was at Morviedro, with a very small party, being apprehensive of his safety, judged it expedient to fortify the place, which occasioned a general insurrection of its inhabitants, who intended to have put to death the king's chief counsellors and favourites, but that they secured themselves by a timely retreat, and left the king to take care of himself. He pacified the people, by assuring them, that he sought only his own preservation; upon which they judged it best for him and for them, to conduct him with the queen to Valentia, where they were received with great respect^a. In the mean time, the king laboured to bring off his brother the infant Don Ferdinand, by proposing to declare him lieutenant general of his own dominions, and his successor, in case he died without issue male; but the infant answered very firmly, that betraying the trust his country had reposed in him, was not the proper way to merit a crown^b. Don Pedro then demanded of the king of Castile leave to levy some horse in his dominions, which, because it could not be decently refused, and was thought of no great consequence, was granted; and accordingly Don Alvaro Garcia de Albornoz, who was related to Don Lope de Luna, raised, for Don Pedro's service six hundred Castilian horse.

By the ill conduct of the king's favourites, a sedition was excited in Valentia; the populace besieging the palace, and threatening Don Bernard de Cabrera, and Don Berenger de Arbella with death. The king, tho' a prince of great courage, was in much confusion; but Don Pedro de Moncado advising him to go out with arms in his hand, and assuring him that his presence would disperse the populace, he ventured upon that dangerous experiment, and, meeting with success, never apprehended any thing from popular tumults after^c. His favourites, in the mean time, fled to Barcelona, and procuring an address from thence to the king, he followed them^d. The union of Arragon, being persuaded that the king was assembling troops against them, solicited the infant Don Ferdinand to disperse them, which he very gallantly attempted; but through the unexpected junction of Don Lope de Luna with his forces, and those commanded by Don Alvaro Garcia de Albornoz, the forces of the union were defeated, the infant wounded, and taken prisoner, but, as it fell out very luckily for him, by the Castilians, who treated him with great respect, and amongst whom his person was in safety^e. Don Pedro declared Don Lope, count de Luna, the first subject in Arragon who had this title, and upon this victory marched directly to Saragossa, where he declared null and void the concessions he had made to the union; and, after having put the whole city in the utmost fear, executed thirteen of the principal persons in it; and thus, by a single miscarriage, the union of Arragon was dissipated^f.

This scarce appeared any thing in the view of that high-spirited prince, since the union of Valentia still subsisted; and, notwithstanding what had happened at Saragossa, made no overtures of submission. The next point, therefore, was to subdue them; to which the king marched with his victorious army. The quarrel was decided by a battle, in which the nobility of Arragon behaved very gallantly, and those of Valentia with all the fury that could be inspired by despair; so that, in the event, they were rather butchered than beat; since nothing, but the loss of their troops, could have lost the battle; which left the best part of the kingdom, and the capital, wholly at the king's mercy^g. In the first transport of his rage, he talked of giving it to the pillage of his soldiers, burning it to the ground, and sowing it with salt; but some of the lords that were about him moderated his passion, and hindered him from committing these excesses. However, he entered Valentia as a conqueror, sacrificed numbers of better men than himself to his ambition; and, as at Saragossa so here, he called for the roll of his concessions to the union, and destroyed it with his own hand^h: forgetting, that the promises of a king are sacred, and that he becomes ipso facto a tyrant, who professes, that he borrows his authority from force. Don Alonso of Castile interceded with him in favour of his brother Don Ferdinand, and queen Leonora, offering to conclude a marriage between his son Don Henry, and one of the infantas of Arragon; Don Pedro answered, that the queen-dowager had intrigued, and Don Ferdinand fought against him; so that they had no favours to expect: but as the one had been his father's wife, and the other his father's son, they should peaceably enjoy what he had left them. In regard to the marriage, if he would restore him the kingdom of Murtia, and hold no correspondence with his malecontents, he was willing it should take effectⁱ.

The king had made Rimbao de Corbera viceroy of Sardinia, and he could not have confided that island to a person of greater courage or capacity. He quickly repaired the losses which his predecessors had sustained, and put things upon a right foot. But the Genoese having gained a great victory over the combined fleets of the emperor of Constantinople, the king of Arragon, and the republic of Venice, and beginning to make a great naval armament, the viceroy came himself to Barcelona, to obtain a proportionable supply of ships and men, which the king his master readily furnished^a. About the time he put to sea, in his return to Sardinia, there came intelligence, that the king of Majorca with his fleet and army was very likely to intercept him; upon which he debarked his forces in Majorca, where Don Jayme quickly after landed; and, upon Sunday the twenty-fifth of October, was defeated, or rather oppressed by numbers, and fighting courageously, refusing quarter, was slain^b. His only son Jayme, after receiving a grievous wound in the face, was made prisoner, and carried by the admiral of Arragon, Don Pedro de Moncada, to his uncle, who received him graciously, and sent him to reside at Barcelona, ordering his father's body to be brought over, and buried in the cathedral church of Valentia^c. The viceroy of Sardinia, after the defeat of the king of Majorca, re-imbarked his troops, and, upon his arrival in that island, settled every thing to the king's satisfaction.

HOWEVER, Don Pedro considering that it lay at a distance, and that whenever disturbances happened there it gave him no small trouble, he signified to the malecontent lords, that if any thing could induce them to be quiet, he was inclined to do for them what they could desire; which, for the present, brought things into order^d. The pope's legate Bernard Alanis, canon of the church of Valentia, having excommunicated some persons of high quality for not paying some ecclesiastical dues, the king commanded him to absolve them, and upon his refusal, sent both him and his father to prison; which having no effect upon the legate, he ordered a gibbet to be erected upon the castle wall, and the legate to be hung up there by the feet, with an assurance, that if he did not do what the king directed, the rope should be cut, and he left to tumble down the rocks; but the canon having hung some time, desired to be taken down, and did as the king desired^e. The pope, as it might be well expected, took fire at this, and threatened the monarch of Arragon with all the thunder of the church; but the pope being poor, and the king rich and great, an embassy to Avignon, and a few good words, pacified all^f. On the twenty-seventh of December, Donna Leonora, queen of Arragon, was brought to bed of the infant Don Juan, to whom at his birth the king gave the title of duke Gironne; which, in succeeding times, became the title of course of the eldest sons of the kings of Arragon^g. He renewed likewise his alliance with Don Pedro the cruel of Castile, and terminated, by a treaty with the crown of France, all points in difference about the territories formerly belonging to the king of Majorca^h. He likewise concluded a new treaty with the Venetians against the Genoese, and, the civil war being again broke out in Sardinia, he sent a stout fleet to the assistance of his subjects, and of his allies.

THAT war becoming daily more serious, the king went into Catalonia, to hold an assembly of the states, where he demanded a very large supply, which was granted him, and having, in return, appointed Don Bernard de Cabrera, at the request of the states, general and commander in chief, he, to oblige them the more, gave him the county of *Bas*ⁱ. At the time of the arrival of the count, Don Bernard the viceroy was employed in the siege of Algieri; to succour which place, the Genoese sent a fleet of five large men of war, and fifty gallies, under the command of Antonio Grimaldi, one of the best officers in their service. Upon this, the count Don Bernard quitted the siege, and with the Venetian admiral Nicola Pisano, who brought with him twenty gallies, went to offer the enemy battle. The Genoese, proud of their former naval victory, did not decline it, and on the twenty-seventh of August the fleets engaged with great fury and obstinacy on both sides. Some say, that the Venetian and Catalonian gallies were not only intermixed but chained together; however that might be, there is nothing more certain than that this was one of the hardest fought battles in those times; but, in the end, the confederates gained a complete victory, the Genoese losing no less than eight thousand men, amongst whom were many of the principal nobility, thirty-three gallies, and three thousand two hundred prisoners; on the part of the Catalans, three hundred and fifty men were killed, and two thousand wounded^k. After this glorious success, Don Bernard returned to the siege of Algieri, which, having no farther succours to expect, surrendered upon terms, all the malecontents being allowed to march out, except Fabian Doria, whose head was struck off the next day^l.

a money, partly by fair promises, excited a general insurrection in Sardinia, when the count Don Cabrera was on the very point of returning home. He debarked his troops again, and, having joined them with those of the viceroy, marched against the rebels, and gained a complete victory. However, finding that the Genoese had sent over a fresh supply of money and men, and were preparing a formidable fleet, he judged it expedient to return to Barcelona with his vessels, which stood in need of repair, in order to make a full report to the king of the situation things were in, and to explain to him the necessity of his going into Sardinia in person, if he judged the reduction of that island necessary to his glory, and the safety of his dominions^m. On his arrival, he found the king was at Valentia; upon which he went thither, was very graciously received, his plan being approved, and himself sent back to Barcelona to assemble a fleet fit for such an expedition. In the mean time, the king went to each of the great cities in his dominions, and demanded contributions for the war, which were very cheerfully and readily granted himⁿ. In this progress, the king had a hint given him, that himself, and all his predecessors, had been extremely wanting to their own glory, and to the welfare of their subjects, in not erecting any where a public seminary for learning: of which he was so fully convinced, that, notwithstanding the pressing conjuncture of his affairs, he thought fit to found instantly a university at Huesca, which has since produced men of eminence in all kinds of learning^o.

ALL the necessary preparations for the king's expedition being made, he went first to Barcelona, and from thence to Roses, where he embarked with the queen, and some of the principal nobility of his dominions, on the fifteenth of June. His army consisted of ten thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, his fleet of twenty-one sail of capital ships, and a hundred galleys; which sufficiently explains the great power of this monarch at sea, and how much it had been augmented in a short time. Upon his arrival, he found Algieri again in the hands of the rebels and the Genoese; upon which he determined to besiege it by land and sea^p. The Genoese, on the other hand, attempted to relieve it by a fleet, but desisted from their project, finding it impracticable. The judge of Arborea, who was at the head of the malecontents, was more successful; for understanding that the king's army suffered much from an epidemic distemper, and that himself was retired to Cagliari much indisposed, he marched by land to its relief, with twenty thousand men: upon which Don Pedro Exerica and Don Bernard de Cabrera, who commanded the siege, entered into a treaty with the judge, and, by granting him large terms for himself, induced him to abandon the Genoese. It was with some difficulty that the king was brought to consent to this, but, at length, having ratified the treaty, which he never intended to execute, the town, on the nineteenth of September, was put into his hands, and he caused it to be peopled immediately by his own subjects^q. The next year, the king called an assembly of the states of this island at Cagliari, which instead of contributing, as he expected, to the pacification of the quarrels that had lasted so long, produced an unanimity of another kind, the issue of which was a general insurrection. His troops, however, had the good fortune to defeat the rebels in a general engagement; upon which, leaving the best part of his army behind, the king embarked for Barcelona^r. After his return, he made a tour to Avignon, to regulate some affairs with the pope, where, at his request, he offered to make peace with the Genoese, provided they would evacuate Sardinia, as, on the other hand, he was inclinable to make a cession of Corfica, reserving an annual tribute of fifty thousand florins; but the negotiation being drawn into a great length, at last ended in nothing, though both parties were weary of the war^s; but still their animosities ran too high to admit peace.

THE Genoese sending fresh troops into Sardinia, the king of Arragon made suitable preparations for the defence of that island, and committed the principal management of the war to Don Bernard de Cabrera, count of Ossona^t. While his affairs were thus embarrassed, Don Pedro the cruel of Castile, in a manner forced a quarrel upon him, as we have shewn in its proper place. Don Pedro of Arragon would willingly have avoided it; but when he found this was not to be done with honour, he defended himself and his dominions with courage. His mother-in-law, and both his brothers, were in the interest, and at the court of the king of Castile; but, on the other hand, the count Don Henry and the count Don Tello, brothers to that prince, had sought and received the king of Arragon's protection^u. In a little time, his own brother Don Ferdinand, having made an irruption into his dominions with a body of Castilian troops, desired to be reconciled to him upon certain terms, with which he readily complied, and Don Ferdinand returned to his duty; which proved exceedingly fatal to his mother and his brother, whom he left in Castile^w. The pope interposed in vain his good offices between the two crowns, and we may guess at the respect paid to his authority, by the king of Arragon's entering into a league with the king of Morocco, as the monarch of Castile did with him of Granada; which, however, was a small offence, in comparison of causing the queen-dowager of Arragon to be put to death, upon suspicion, contrary to the ties of nature, and the law of nations^x. He attempted also to invade the kingdom of Valentia, and to make an attempt on the island of Yvica, but failed in both; neither had the fleets of Arragon any great success against those of Castile; it may be, the subjects of both crowns were wise enough not to act over vigorously in a quarrel in which they had no concern.

THE war continuing still with Castile, and Don Pedro the cruel having the advantage in a battle fought near Najara, Don Pedro of Arragon became very desirous of peace^y. He sent his daughter, the infanta Donna Constantia, this year, under the escort of a good fleet, into Sicily, to her husband the king Don Frederic^z. The next year, by the mediation of the pope, a peace was concluded with the crown of Castile; but the satisfaction resulting from thence lasted not long^a. Don Jayme, son to the last unfortunate king of Majorca, and nephew to the king of Arragon, by a bold and bloody attempt escaped out of the old palace of Barcelona, where he was detained, and went to Avignon^b. Don Pedro the cruel, having entered into an alliance with Charles the wicked, king of Navarre, and thereby secured his assistance, made no ceremony of breaking the peace with Arragon; and, in conjunction with the king of Navarre, attacked that monarch unexpectedly, who thereupon recalled count Henry of Castile out of France, and gave him the strongest assurances of his protection and assistance^c. The king had now two pretenders to the crown of Castile, the count Don Henry, and his own brother, the infant Don Ferdinand. He encouraged both, though he had no affection for either; but the count Don Henry, having excited some jealousy of the infant Don Ferdinand, the king his brother ordered him to be arrested, and, upon his refusing to submit, a struggle arose, in which he was killed, to the great satisfaction of the count, and without any great regret on the part of the king; whose hatred pursued him from his cradle to his grave^d.

THE pope interposed in favour of Don Jayme, but to no purpose; for, upon offering his mediation for concluding a peace with the Genoese, who were very troublesome, the king of Arragon accepted it readily^e. The war with Castile gave him still a great deal of trouble; and though few princes have had parts better suited to their circumstances than the monarch of whom we are speaking, yet he found himself in a state of perplexity, which gave him inexpressible disquiet. This unhappy situation of mind drew him into one of the blackest and basest actions that a prince could commit. Don Bernard de Cabrera had been his general, his minister, and his favourite, from the beginning of his reign, and by innumerable services had merited his confidence, though it had lost him that of his fellow subjects, which he once possessed in a supreme degree. Don Bernard, sensible of this, and knowing his master better than any body, endeavoured to prevent a reverse of fortune, by a voluntary retreat; from which, in this confused state of affairs, Don Pedro had recalled him; but that great man perceiving how much he was exposed to envy, and fearing its effects, endeavoured to retire to France. Upon which, the queen, the count Don Henry of Castile, the count de Ribagorça, and others, prevailed upon the king to cause him to be pursued. Being overtaken and imprisoned, he was accused of numberless crimes, tortured by the king's command, and condemned by the infant Don Juan, duke of Gironne, whose governor he had been, to lose his head on a scaffold, in the great square of Saragossa, which was accordingly executed^f. There is cruelty and treachery enough in this story, as it is thus told; and therefore we cannot, with Mariana, yield any credit to those who report, that the king pronounced sentence of death, and that Don Juan cut off his head with his own hands; but it is more than probable, as the best historians agree in it, that Don Bernard's great offence was, being too good a servant to a bad prince^g. The fleet of Arragon was this year beaten by that of Castile, which determined Don Pedro to those measures he afterwards pursued.

THE liberty the king had taken of discontinuing his tribute to the holy see for the island of Sardinia, induced the pope to look for a new tenant; and the judge of Arborea being still in arms against the king, and wanting only the gloss of a title, was willing enough to purchase it on the pope's terms. This could not be so secretly carried but it came to the king of Arragon's knowledge, who immediately sent a person of distinction to do homage to pope Urban the fifth at Avignon, and to pay the arrears of tribute; upon which, in the judgment a of the pope, he became a legal monarch again ^b. This, and some other troublesome affairs, did not hinder Don Pedro from prosecuting his great design, of enabling the count Don Henry to dethrone his brother the king of Castile; for which he expected a very large recompence, tho' it was visibly his interest to have concurred in it without any. We have shewn, in another place, how this revolution was effected, which, at the very beginning, did the business of Don Pedro, king of Arragon; for the king of Castile no sooner found himself pressed, than he abandoned all the conquests he had made in his dominions; but when he came to A. D. 1367. summon king Henry, when in possession of the crown, to yield him the kingdom of Murcia, which he had always aimed at, he refused it, tho' he complied with all the rest of his engagements ^c. This might very probably be one reason why the king of Arragon entered into a league with Edward, prince of Wales, granted him a free passage, and some assistance in his expedition for dethroning king Henry; by which he secured himself against the revenge of Don Pedro the cruel; but this did not hinder his entering into fresh negotiations with king Henry the next year, when he attempted the recovery of his kingdom ^d.

THE troubles in Sardinia continued, or rather augmented, so that the king was obliged to send a new army, under the command of Don Pedro de Luna, who obliged the judge of Arborea to shut himself up in the strong town of Oristan, which he immediately invested with the whole force that he had brought with him, and the best part of the troops that were in the island before, hoping to put an end to the war by the reduction of the place; but a sedition happened in his camp, and he had unluckily so great a contempt for the enemy, that he did not observe a very strict discipline: of which the judge of Arborea taking advantage, issued out of Oristan with all the troops he had therein, and attacked him with such fury, and so great advantage, that himself, his brother Don Philip, and the greatest part of his forces, were cut to pieces, and the rest, to a man, made prisoners; the news of which struck the king of Arragon with great consternation ^e. This induced him to temporize with the king of Castile, whose brother the count Don Tello had scandalously yielded to him many places in Castile ^f. He entered also into a league with the king of Portugal, who stiled himself monarch of Castile, but he did not execute it with any great punctuality, as he only aimed at keeping the king Don Henry in awe ^g. In Sardinia, when things were desperate, and there was no time to transport forces, he changed the face of affairs at once, by appointing a nobleman, of the family of Doria, viceroy. He was at that time amongst the malecontents, but, upon receiving this favour from the king of Arragon, he quitted them, and brought such an accession of force to the king's troops, as put things once more into a good condition, and gained time for the king to send thither a powerful squadron; which he did. On board of which went, as a soldier of fortune, an English gentleman, named Walter Bennet, who having undertaken to carry over a thousand lances, the king gave him all the lands of the judge of Arborea, when he could conquer them ^h. 1371.

THE next year the king renewed the truce which had been made with the king of Castile; married both his sons; the eldest Don Juan to Martina, sister to the count of Armagnac, and the younger Don Martin to Donna Maria Lopez de Luna, daughter to the count of that name ⁱ. At this juncture he did a thing, which ought not to be buried in oblivion; he sent for Don Bernardin de Cabrera, and having publicly declared, that he was satisfied of his grandfather's innocence, and that he had been most grossly imposed upon by his enemies, he restored him to the title of count of Offona, to all the estates of the family, and made him satisfaction for the time they had been in the hands of the crown. The people, who had applauded his injustice, because they hated his favourite, were very silent as to this action; which was by much the greatest in his whole reign ^j. As he grew old, he began to be apprehensive of the intrigues of the king of Castile, who had set Don Jayme, king of Majorca, at liberty, and practised the very arts that he had learned in his court, to give him disquiet. However, there was a circumstance, that, in the midst of all the intrigues on both sides, kept these princes from coming to extremities, or even from doing each other all the secret mischiefs they might have done. The Infant Don Juan, who was the heir of Castile, had been bred up in the court of Arragon with the Infanta Leonora, and being accustomed to consider her as his wife, before he knew what that meant, his passions increased with his years ^k. The king Don Henry, having perfected all his schemes, and having a numerous army on the frontiers of Arragon, sent to let Don Pedro know, that as he was sensible of the injuries he had received, so he did not forget the favours he had formerly done him, and therefore he was content, forgetting all subjects of dispute, to make a solid and lasting peace, and to complete the marriage of their children, that had been talked of from their infancy. The king Don Pedro, to whom this message was delivered, with a threat of declaring war, rejected the offer with scorn and contempt; but, at the same time, he signified to the queen of Castile, that tho' he disdained her husband's threats, yet out of respect to her, and the constancy of the Infant Don Juan, he was willing to sign a peace upon any terms; and, having kept his word, the marriage was accordingly solemnized with great splendor^a. On the second of June, the same year, died Donna Leonora, queen of Arragon; and Don Jayme of Majorca, much about that time, made an irruption into Roussillon^c.

in Sardinia by a critical act
of temerity.

BUT new disturbances sprung up as the old ones were composed; Don Jayme dying, left all his rights to the duke of Anjou, in consideration of the services he had done him while living, on a presumption that his sister Donna Isabella would do the like, which she did; and this duke prepared to assert his claim by force of arms^b. In Sardinia things grew more desperate than ever; the judge of Arborea had beat count Doria, and conquered all the island, except the town of Cagliari, which he besieged, while his son blocked up the place by sea; the governor being brought so low, as to dispose every thing for setting the place on fire, and making his escape in a few light vessels, if not relieved by a certain day^w. The king found means to rid himself of both troubles; he engaged the king of Castile to enter into a negotiation with the duke of Anjou, who, having reckoned upon him as an ally, could not refuse him as a mediator. It happened that he had a small squadron in the harbour of Roses, when the ill news from Sardinia arrived, and, having embarked a few troops, dispatched it immediately; for he judged, that, by surprising the enemy, he might save all, and, if that could not be done, the loss was but little enhanced. The event justified his reasoning; his fleet coming unexpectedly, beat that of the malecontents, and relieved Cagliari: the judge of Arborea seeing his hopes defeated, when on the point of being accomplished, fell sick, and died of grief^x. His son, thro' whose carelessness the fleet was beat, had such strong passions, and such weak abilities, that he was able to do nothing. On the 25th of July, in the succeeding year, died Don Frederic, king of Sicily, leaving his only daughter Donna Maria, the heiress of his dominions; substituting, in case of her demise, his natural son William, and, if he died without issue, the royal family of Arragon^y. Don Pedro immediately applied himself to pope Gregory the eleventh, who, from Avignon, was returned to Rome, offering to do homage without delay; alleging, that the crown belonged immediately to him, because it could not descend to a woman. The pope contented himself with asking, how, in that case, his right arose? and took the young princess under his protection. However, this pope did not long survive; and Don Pedro, having engaged Don Raymond de Moncada, count of Aoste, he scaled the walls of the castle of Catanea, and carried off the young queen Donna Maria in the night^z.

THE king, being become for the third time a widower, the famous Donna Joanna, queen of Naples, imagined he would make no scruple of marrying her, with so rich a portion. Pedro was too wise a man to be caught with appearances, in a point that so much concerned his peace; and therefore he married Sybilla de Tortia, a widow lady of unexceptionable character; whom he caused to be crowned queen; which so provoked Donna Joanna, that she adopted his competitor, the duke of Anjou, for her heir^a. The next year, the inhabitants of the duchy of Athens and Patras threw off the yoke of the crown of Naples, and declared for the king of Arragon; which was the less strange, as they were, for the most part, descended from Catalans and Arragoneses^b. The king Don Pedro formed a project for marrying his two grandchildren, Don Martin, son of the Infant Don Martin, and Donna Maria, queen of Sicily, whom, for that reason, he caused to be brought into Arragon. About this time, a new and extraordinary scene opened in the island of Sardinia, where the people, wearied with the tyranny of the young judge of Arborea, put him to death, supposing that this would have restored tranquility to their country, as his sister Leonora was married to count Doria. But Donna Leonora, a woman of great parts and a high spirit, took up arms against her king and her husband at once^c. The continual expences of the war in Sardinia raised first murmurs, and then troubles in Catalonia. Besides, the queen Donna Sybilla quarrelled with the heir apparent Don Juan, in which the king took part against his son, more especially after he became a widower, and refused to marry his niece the queen of Sicily; but, with some difficulty, the royal Infant was prevailed upon not take arms^d. These disorders lasted two or three years, till at length the king resolved to make himself master of the city of Tarragona, which had always belonged to the archbishop, and, to accomplish this act of injustice, he made a use of arms; upon which the archbishop excommunicated him. The king soon after fell ill, and, having first given satisfaction to the church, so as to entitle him to the sacraments, he deceased on the fifth of January, one thousand three hundred and eighty-six, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and in the fiftieth of his reign^c. He was surnamed Don Pedro the ceremonious, from that pomp and punctuality which he observed in all transactions of government. He was, in many respects, the wisest, but, in many more, the worst, king that ever sat upon this throne; and tho' he was better obeyed, he was much less beloved, than any of his predecessors. He was buried in the monastery of Poblette, and though his subjects durst scarce shew it, they were very well pleased with his death^f.

Don Juan succeeded his father in the throne, and, at the time of his demise, was himself dangerously ill in his palace at Gironne; his mother-in-law, the queen Donna Sybilla, being thoroughly sensible on how ill terms they stood, made her escape, the day before the old king's death, with her brother Don Bernard de Fortia. However, the Catalans, who hated that princess, pursued her so closely, that she had no remedy but to take shelter with her brother in his castle, which was presently invested by the Infant Don Martin, and the count de Cardona: Donna Sybilla. as they had no succours to expect, the queen and her brother thought it prudent not to augment the fury of their enemies by an obstinate resistance; so that they quickly surrendered, and were carried by the infant Don Martin to Barcelona, and there strictly confined^e. The king treated Donna Sybilla with a degree of severity that was by no means natural to him; the crime of which she was accused was fascinating or bewitching the deceased king, and this upon the evidence of a Jew, who acknowledged he had some hand therein. Upon this, several were put to the question, and, being found guilty upon their own confession, suffered death; and, in all probability, the queen herself had been in danger, if, very happily for her, the pope had not sent cardinal de Luna, with the title of his legate, who interceded for that princess, her brother Don Bernard, and the count de Pailbars; upon which the king pardoned them as to their lives, but he deprived the queen-dowager of her jointure, which he bestowed on his own queen Donna Violante^h. On the eighth of March, the king confirmed the privileges of the Catalans, declared void all his father's grants to the prejudice of the crown, and appointed the viscount of Rocaberti governor of the countries he held in *Greece*ⁱ. The count of Ampurias, who, in the quarrel between this prince and his father, had been stripped of his territories for adhering to the former, was no sooner informed of his accession, than he returned home, and took possession of them; which, at first, the king took extremely ill, as if it had been in contempt of his authority; but, in a little time, and upon better information, he restored him to his favour, and cancelled all that had been done to his prejudice in the former reign^k. By which, some think, he scarce did more than repair the injuries done him in his own.

THE famous John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, upon his return from that expedition, of which we have given a large account in a former section, thought he had some reason to take offence at the conduct of the king of Arragon; he sent therefore the archbishop of Bordeaux to demand a sum of money from that prince, as an equivalent for not furnishing him with a certain number of horse every campaign, as by his treaty with the crown of England he was bound to do. The king answered, that the troops were always ready; and, as they were never demanded, he did not think himself obliged to pay any such sum of money: the prelate, however, replied in such rude terms, that the king caused him to be arrested; upon which, the duke his master ravaged the territories of Arragon, but, in a little time, these differences were appeased^l. The emperor Wenceslaus sent an ambassador to compliment Don Juan upon his accession, who received this testimony of the emperor's respect with great kindness^m. In Sardinia, he granted all the estates of her father to Donna Leonora de Arborea, which restored peace in that island, and procured the new viceroy, Don Simon Perez de Arenas, a quiet administrationⁿ. At this time there was a schism in the church; but the king was prevailed upon to acknowledge pope Clement the seventh, who resided at Avignon, and thither he went to do him homage for the island of Sardinia^o. The character of Don Juan was certainly that of a mild and merciful prince, but he was too uxorious, and the queen Donna Violante much too fond of pleasures; her favourite Donna Carazza Villaragut had, for that age, a very refined taste in poetry and music, and she was so delighted with works composed in a mixed kind of language, which in Arragon they called Gaya, and, according to Mariana's interpretation, was no other than the dialect called in France, Limosine, that she prevailed upon the king and queen not only to entertain poets who excelled therein, but to erect schools and academies for the improvement of this kind of poetry. The nobility of Arragon were so little pleased with the new turn taken at court, that they expostulated very roughly with the king, and were even on the point of taking up arms. The queen and Donna Carazza had also their party. However, in an assembly of the states, held at Monçon, that lady was banished, and these new-fashioned foreign diversions were prohibited under very severe penalties^p; neither did these disturbances break out any more.

THE count de Armagnac sent his brother count Bernard, with a great body of troops, to make an irruption into Catalonia. The Spanish historians say, that they were English, French, Flemings, and, in short, a mixture of all nations; and that the cause of this irruption was a mere appetite to plunder: but from other historians we learn it was not so. The count de Armagnac pretended a right to the dominions of the crown of Majorca, and it was in support of this claim that his brother, at the head of all the soldiers of fortune he could collect, made this incursion in the midst of winter^q. In the spring he besieged Besalu, the garrison of which made an obstinate defence, and Don Bernard de Cabrera, having defeated part of the French forces, when the king marched with a numerous army to fight the rest, Don Bernard de Armagnac thought it expedient to retire, rather than run the hazard of the battle^r. The king, at the beginning of his reign, had created his brother Don Martin, duke of Montalban, and his son was entitled Don Martin de Jerica, from the lordship of that name^s. The great point in view of both brothers was, that of marrying this young prince last mentioned to Donna Maria queen of Sicily, their niece; and having with much difficulty obtained a dispensation from pope Clement the seventh, dated in the month of November, it is presumed, that they were married towards the close of the year; at least it is certain, that, in the beginning of the next, a fleet of one hundred sail, and a considerable body of land forces was assembled, on the coast of Catalonia, under the command of Don Bernard de Cabrera, with whom embarked the duke of Montalban, and his son and daughter, the king and queen of Sicily, for that island. This expedition was attended with success, and that with severity towards those who opposed these princes; but the history of this war belongs to another place. As new troubles were broke out in Sardinia, the king of Arragon intended to have gone thither with a royal fleet and army; but the apprehension of the kingdom of Valentia's being invaded by the Moors, prevented his leaving his dominions, and obliged him to content himself with sending thither a numerous reinforcement, with a strong squadron^t. This year the Infanta Donna Violante was married to Lewis duke of Anjou, and the Infanta Donna Joanna to Matthew count of Foix, the former being the king's daughter by the reigning queen, as the latter was by his former consort^u. To strengthen the present harmony subsisting between the two crowns, and to prevent disputes on that head, the limits between the kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon were settled by the express command and conjunct authority of both princes^v. A precaution which had afterwards a very good effect.

THE next year the king renewed his preparations for passing into Sardinia, where things were in greater confusion than ever; but either want of money, or his own indolence, hindered him a second time, though he knew that his brother, his nephew, and his niece, were besieged in the fortress of Catanea, by the malecontents of Sicily, and he had given them the strongest assurances that, as soon as the affairs of Sardinia were redressed, he would infallibly come to their assistance^x. But Don Bernard de Cabrera, considering that his family had been raised by the crown, mortgaged all his lands for a large sum of money, and therewith equipped a strong squadron; by the timely arrival of which, under his command, their Sicilian majesties were saved from imprisonment at least, if not from death^y. Upon the decease of pope Clement the seventh, the cardinals of his faction at Avignon elected the famous Peter de Luna, of one of the noblest families in Arragon, who assumed the name of Benedict the thirteenth, and gave immediate notice of his accession to the papal throne to all Christian princes, and more especially to the kings of Castile and Arragon^z. The concerns of Don Juan continued in great disorder, the count de Armagnac continuing to make incursions into Roussillon, to which he pretended a right; the troubles in Sardinia increasing, and the war in Sicily being still kept on foot^a. The king, who was a mild and good-natured prince, easily persuaded into wrong measures, but withal as easily set right, and who is celebrated by the historians of Arragon for a quality not common in kings, hearing reproofs patiently, and esteeming and preferring those from whom they came, left public affairs, in a great measure, to the queen Donna Violante, a princess of great spirit, and much given to intrigue; while he chiefly amused himself with the pleasures of the table, the conversation of his nobility, and the sports of the field. As he was hunting, he unluckily fell from his horse, frightened, as some writers a say, by the sudden appearance of a monstrous she-wolf, of which fall he died, on the nineteenth of May one thousand three hundred ninety-five, in the ninth year of his reign, and the forty-fifth of his life, leaving behind him two daughters married to two French princes, as we have before mentioned; his brother the duke of Montalban being at this time in Sicily^b.

THE sudden and unexpected death of the king occasioned great consternation and trouble; The succession the queen-dowager Donna Violante, probably with a view of gaining the regency, gave out, secured to Don that she was with child. Matthew, count of Foix, claimed the crown for his wife, the eldest Martin duke of daughter of the deceased monarch; but Donna Maria de Luna, duchess of Montalban, Montalban, by asserted the rights of her husband with equal spirit and success; and, in the month of July, she spirit and the states of Arragon, Valentia, and Catalonia, declared Don Martin, pursuant to the testimony of the deceased king, the sole heir of his dominions, and confirmed the queen in the exercise of the administration^c. She made no scruple of putting guards upon the dowager, to prevent any imposture, and withdrew them immediately upon that princess's declaring she was not with child^d. She granted safe conducts to the ministers sent by the count de Foix to the states of Arragon and Catalonia, and granted that prince a copy of the clause relating to the succession in Don Juan's will. She took equal pains to avoid a war by a negotiation, and to provide for it, if it was not to be avoided, which fell out to be the case. The count and countess de Foix passed the Pyrenees, and fell with a considerable body of troops into the territories of Arragon, assuming the title of king and queen, and made themselves master of the town of Balbastro, notwithstanding a very gallant resistance, and flattered themselves with the hopes of becoming possessors of that kingdom by force of arms. They were quickly convinced of their error by the steady defence of the citadel of Balbastro, into which the principal persons, amongst those who had defended the town, retired. Their army quickly found e themselves invaded by famine; they no sooner sent parties on any side, in order to obtain a supply of provisions, than they were surrounded and cut to pieces. At length, having no other resource, they retired into Navarre, so miserably harrassed in their retreat, that their army was become little more than an escorte^e. A. D. 1395.

THE king Don Martin received the news of his accession, and a considerable reinforcement of troops, by a strong squadron which the queen had dispatched^f. He did not, however, Don Martin immediately embark for his hereditary dominions, but employed some time in settling the settles his son's affairs of his son; in order to which, the very report of his being become king of Arragon affairs in Si- did not a little contribute. This, however, took up so many months, that it was the middle cily, and of December in the next year before he was ready to embark. He judged it convenient, makes a tour to Avignon however, to take Sardinia in his way, where he settled every thing to the people's satisfaction, before his re- and provided with very strong garrisons some places that had been conquered in the island of Corfica. He then proceeded to the coasts of France, and, landing in Provence, went to Avignon to confer with pope Benedict, to whom he did homage for the kingdoms of Sardinia and Corfica. Having regulated several points of consequence with him, he re embarked on board his squadron, and continued his voyage to Barcelona, where he arrived on the twenty-f sixth of June^g. On the twenty-eighth he declared the count and countess of Foix traitors, 1397: and confiscated all their estates. He went afterwards to Saragossa, confirmed all the rights and liberties of the people, and, before the close of the year, sent powerful succours both to Sardinia and Sicily^h.

IN the month of April in the succeeding year, he held an assembly of the states at Saragossa, in which he expressed his gratitude for their zeal and duty in his absence, and expatiated Caresses the on this subject in so happy a manner, that they assured him he had nothing to do, but to states in such a acquaint them with any thing that might be still wanting to the prosperity of his affairs, and manner as to he should find they would act with the same spirit. He then desired they would acknowledge draw from his son, the king of Sicily, for his successor, upon condition that that kingdom should be them larger annexed to the crown of Arragon; to which they consented: they likewise granted him the supplies than sum of one hundred and thirty thousand crowns to pay his debts, and an annual revenue of thirty any of his pre- thousand crowns in the nature of a civil listⁱ. The count de Foix made a new attempt, in the autumn, to penetrate into Arragon, but without effect; and deceased, not long after, without issue^k. The corsairs of Barbary having disturbed the commerce of his subjects, Don Martin fitted out a strong fleet to chastise them, and afterwards sent a squadron to the assistance of pope Benedict; which, however, being harrassed by contrary winds, returned without per-

In the mean time pope Boniface, provoked by his attachment to his competitor, bestowed the kingdoms of Sardinia and Sicily on Don Artal de Alagon, count de Molinetto, provided he could find any way to get possession¹. A conduct in the court of Rome, which, however agreeable to Italian policy, is clearly inconsistent with the principles of the gospel.

DON Martin, in the ensuing spring, prevailed upon the French to raise the siege of Avignon, upon a promise that Benedict should renounce his right to the papacy, if his competitor would do so too^m. On the thirteenth of April the king was solemnly crowned in the cathedral of Saragossa, and, on the twentieth of the same month, the feast of St. George, the patron of the kingdom, the queen was also crowned with like pomp and splendourⁿ. Archambaud de Grailli, who had succeeded the count de Foix by marrying his sister, offered to renounce his pretensions to the crown of Arragon for a small county, which the king granted him with very good will^o. He sent, the same year, a fleet of seventy sail to the assistance of his son in Sicily, who, by the help of these timely succours, put an end to all the troubles in that island^p. The duke of Anjou, having demanded Donna Violante, the king's niece, with her fortune of one hundred and sixty thousand crowns, the king sent both that and the princess, upon her renouncing all title to the succession^q. The next year was fatal to the royal family in Sicily, where, early in the spring, Don Pedro, the only son of their majesties, deceased^r; and, on the twenty-seventh of May following, his mother Donna Maria, who by her will bequeathed the kingdom to her husband, who was also the heir by descent^s. As he was in the flower of his age, many marriages were proposed for him; but, by the advice of the king his father, he preferred the Infanta Donna Blanca of Navarre, and that princess was sent to him, on board a fleet commanded by Don Bernard de Cabrera, in the month of September following, where she was received with all possible demonstrations of joy and affection^t. But he still continued in the pursuit of irregular pleasures.

The king's unexpected death without heirs occasions an interregnum.

DONNA Joanna, the king's niece, widow of the count de Foix, who had formerly given him so much trouble, was exceedingly desirous of passing the rest of her days in her own country, and, upon her signifying this to Don Martin, he very readily assented, assigned her the palace of Valencia, and a revenue of three thousand crowns^u a year. He endeavoured by the like acts of condescension to pacify the troubles in Sardinia, where the nobility were continually caballing against each other, and all together against the royal authority; and the case was very much the same in the kingdom of Arragon, where, though all the lords professed great duty for the king, and really shewed it, yet, from an affectation of power and independency, they were continually embarked in factions and quarrels against each other^v. The young king of Sicily, giving too much ear to some bad counsellors, the king his father sent for him, and he came accordingly to Barcelona; but could not be prevailed on to remain long there, alleging, that his own dominions would suffer greatly by his absence, and, therefore, in the autumn of the same year, he returned to Sicily^w. The next was fatal to the old queen-dowager Donna Sybilla, and to the queen consort Donna Maria, whose death was equally lamented by the king her husband and by his subjects^x. The factions in Valencia were now become to the full as troublesome as those in the kingdom of Arragon; in consequence of which, Don Raymond Boyle, governor of the capital, was assassinated coming out of his palace, which murder the king caused to be enquired into so closely, that most of those who were any way concerned in it came to be discovered, and, as they deserved, put to death; his brother, who was not altogether innocent, escaped with the loss of his right hand^y. The island of Sicily, being torn with civil dissensions, and the lords, in the king of Arragon's interest, having signified the distress they were in to the king of Sicily, he immediately determined to go to their relief. He did so; and, not long after his arrival, he gained a glorious victory, which might have restored that country's quiet, if the victor had not been vanquished by his passion; for, being extremely captivated with a young woman whom he saw there, he abandoned himself, in such a manner, to his lust, that, being seized with a fever, he died on the twenty-seventh of June^z. The king his father, who was now become his heir, finding that great troubles were like to arise in his dominions about the succession, endeavoured to prevent it by marrying; and, accordingly, espoused Donna Margaretta de Prades, who was of the royal house of Castile: and this is supposed to have hastened his death, which happened on the last of May one thousand four hundred and ten^b; when he had just entered the sixteenth year of his reign.

- a We are now arrived at an interregnum; for, upon the demise of this prince, the states assumed the supreme authority in the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia, and in the principality of Catalonia, till it should be determined by them to whom the crown of right belonged. It is to be observed, that notwithstanding they were united under one sovereign, yet these three states remained perfectly independent, and to these were now added the kingdoms of Majorca, Sardinia, and Sicily. There had been many competitors for the succession in the life of Don Martin, which put him under great difficulties. Amongst these, the count of Urgel was the most troublesome, and therefore he twice appointed him vicar-general of his dominions; which was very satisfactory to the count, who judged, that it made him known to the people in the light of presumptive heir: the king saw it in the same light, but had quite another meaning; for he knew that the nobility of Arragon would consider it as an invasion of their privileges, and impute it not at all to his judgment, but to the count's ambition; in which he was not at all disappointed. The true scheme of the king was, in case he had no children by his last wife, to settle the crown on his grandson Don Frederic, the natural son of the king of Sicily. Which project of his he could never bring in any degree to bear; for the lawyers opposed it unanimously, as inconsistent with the constitution, injurious to the remains of the royal family, and prejudicial to the people. The lawyers had a great ascendancy in this country, and were superstitiously devoted to their ancient form of government; of which, as it could not be any where else so properly introduced, we will speak clearly and succinctly here.
- c THOSE who take the antiquity of the kingdom of Arragon higher than we have done, say, that when the people, upon the subversion of the Gothic monarchy, made choice of a prince to lead them against the Moors, they made an express capitulation with him, that he should govern according to their laws, and should not invade their liberties, of which they were jealous to an extreme degree. But if this be true, in any sense, it must, as we shall hereafter shew, be true of the old kings of Navarre. It is, however, infinitely more probable, that the remains of the Goths, in general, throughout Spain, adhered as strictly to the old principles of their policy in the state, as they did to the doctrine and discipline of their church. That the latter was sooner changed than the former, was owing to the artful incroachments of the pope, whose authority, when it was once owned, was not easily to be resisted. But in the state, all the greater and the lesser nobility, that is to say, all who had any property, had so strong an interest in the preservation of their privileges, that it was much less easy to cancel, or even to change them. Besides, Arragon, being an inland kingdom, property underwent little alteration, and families, so long as they subsisted, preserved their estates. But be this as it will, it is beyond all question, that the monarchs of Arragon were very limited monarchs, and that the constitution, during the reigns of those princes, whose history we have written, was very little impaired. Let us now see what that constitution was. We have very ample materials; the substance of which we will represent as briefly as we can.
- d
- e THE men of property, those who had estates, which, generally speaking, they had acquired by their swords, were stiled originally, and in general, Los Ricos Hombres; that is, literally, rich men; but may be more sensibly translated, men of estates, or, men of property; that is, as the lawyers of this country express themselves in plain terms, barons; for they say, that whatever titles of honour were afterwards introduced, as flowing from the king's will and pleasure, yet the right of sitting amongst the states did not arise from their being dukes, marquisses, or counts, but was inherent to them as barons; and they give us a list of eleven or twelve old families, who were the original Ricos Hombres, or barons of Arragon. In process of time they came to be distinguished into the greater and lesser nobility. The former were those who, by the favour of the crown, were advanced to superior titles of honour; the latter such as retained only their ancient dignity; the prelates likewise sat in that assembly, and the deputies from the great cities. In this assembly of states, laws were made for the government of the whole realm, and to see those laws put in execution, and to prevent any subject, of what rank soever, from being denied the benefit of them, against the oppression of any other subject, or even of the king himself, they had a magistrate, who was the head of justice, whom they stiled, El Justicia de Arragon, or chief justice of Arragon, to whom appeals might be made from the king, who might controul the king if he acted against the law, and who was not accountable, for any thing he did in the discharge of his office, to the king, but to the states.
- f
- THE historians of Arragon affirm, and there is good reason to believe, that this office was as ancient as their monarchy; but, however, the history of these chief justices, which is very copiously and distinctly written, rises no higher than to the taking of Saragossa from the Moors. It is said, that, at the inauguration of their kings, the chief justice sat on a high tribunal in his robes, with his head covered; the king then came before him, and, kneeling down bare-headed, swore to maintain their privileges, and to govern according to law. Upon which proclamation

Some account of the original constitution in the monarchy of Arragon.

Their kings; tho' not elected, were always confirmed by the people, and sworn to maintain the laws.

High office of chief justice of Arragon defined and described.

proclamation was made on the part of the assembly, in these words: Nos que valemus tanto como vos os hazemos nuestro Rey y Señor con tal que guardéis nuestros fueros y libertades, si no, no: We, who are as good as you, have taken you for our king and lord, so long as you respect our laws and liberties, and no longer. It is said, that the king Don Pedro the first, by great art and management, and by the promise of other privileges less dishonourable to the crown, and as advantageous to the people, procured this form to be abolished by the states; and, it is added, that having the parchment in one of his hands, which contained the law, he drew his dagger, and wounding the hand in which he held it, suffered the blood to stream over it, adding these words: Ley de poder elegir Rey los Vassallos sangre de Rey avia de costar. A law that gives vassals a power to elect their king, ought to be effaced with a king's blood: from whence he was surnamed Don Pedro el Pugal, or Peter with the dagger; and as a sufficient evidence of the truth of this, they shew his statue, with the dagger in one hand and the parchment in the other, in the Casa de la Deputation, or house of commons at Barcelona.

A common mistake on this subject stated and rectified.

THIS, though written by very grave authors, and taken upon trust by strangers, has very much the air of a fable; and so indeed it is, but not without a ground of truth. The king was not Don Pedro the first, but Don Pedro the fourth, surnamed the ceremonious; and the law was not of election, but that for establishing the union, which he cancelled in an assembly of the states, by cutting it in pieces with his dagger; in doing which he struck his finger by accident, and when he saw the blood run, he said to the states: A law, that has occasioned so much bloodshed, is happily wiped out of your statutes by the blood of a king. It is however certain, that though Arragon never was an elective kingdom, yet the confirmation of the states to the next heir's title was held so necessary, that it was very ill taken, if he either did any regal act, or even assumed the title, before he had sworn to preserve their privileges: and, in consequence of that oath, was recognized and acknowledged for their sovereign by the states. They likewise took upon themselves to examine and decide, when any disputes arose, in relation to the succession, as we shall see at large in another section; but, at present, it is requisite to give the reader, as we have undertaken, the histories of all the monarchies in Spain; that of Majorca, under the few kings that it had, in which the reader will find various circumstances worthy of his notice, and which do not occur in any of the accounts published in our history.

S E C T. XI.

The history of the kingdom of Majorca, from the time of its being conquered by James I. of Arragon, to its re-union, or rather second conquest by Don Pedro IV. after which it remained annexed to that crown.

^a THE possession of the island of Majorca; and of those that depended upon it, was an object, which those who were masters of the continent of Spain had ever in view, and sooner or later achieved it. The Moors, as the reader will see in another place, made themselves masters of them, and lost them again; but, pursuing their designs some time after, they had better fortune, and had been actually sovereigns here upwards of four centuries, when Don Jayne of Arragon formed the design of augmenting his own dominions; by the junction of these islands^a. It must not, however, be understood, that, in all this space of time, they had received no interruption; for the contrary is true. Several of the counts of Barcelona, provoked, in some measure, by the depredations committed on their coasts by the Majorcan Moors, who had a natural turn to piracy, but chiefly out of a desire to make conquests, or, at least, reprisals by descents of a like nature, had given them a great deal of trouble, ruined some of their best towns upon the coast, and enriched themselves and their troops by the plunder^b. But as, in most of these expeditions, they were indebted to the Pisans, the Genoese, or some other of the Italian states, for the best part of the naval force that was employed in them, we thought it expedient, as well to avoid swelling this part of our work as to prevent repetitions, to refer those expeditions till, in the natural course of our undertaking, we shall come to treat of the history of these maritime states^c. Here, therefore, the reader is to expect only what regards the royal house of Arragon. Some historians have suggested, that when Don Pedro the second went into Italy, and was crowned by the pope, one great motive of his voyage was to negotiate a league with some of the republics before-mentioned, in order to facilitate a design he had formed, of invading and reducing these islands^d; but, as we have shewn in the history of his reign, he quickly found himself so much embarrassed, with a variety of troublesome affairs that he had upon his hands, that he left his project to be accomplished by some of his successors, under a probable expectation they would see the facility and expediency of this conquest, for the security of the rest of their territories.

As a sufficient account of these islands have been given in other parts of this work, ^a a particular description of them will not be expected here; and yet there are some things that, for the better understanding of the history, it is absolutely necessary to take notice of. These islands, but more especially Majorca, or, as the Spaniards write it, Mallorca, was in a far different condition from what it has been since^e. All writers agree, that there is hardly any country more indebted to nature; for though one part of it be mountainous, and consequently not very fertile, yet the greater part of it is flat, and of so excellent a soil, that it produces prodigious quantities of corn, as good in its kind as any in Europe; oil, wine, and salt in vast abundance; cattle and sheep sufficient for the inhabitants: but deer, rabbits, and wild fowl in such plenty, as might alone have furnished their subsistence^f. The air is very pure and temperate, and, by its situation, the heat in summer is so qualified by the breezes, that it is not only the largest and most plentiful, but by much the pleasantest of all the islands^g. These and other advantages were, at this juncture, improved to the utmost; for the Moors, ever industrious and indefatigable, and withal wonderfully populous, surrounded the whole coast with fortifications, that is, with a kind of towers, and lines between them; cultivated every spot that was not either rock or sand; carried on a great trade with their countrymen in Spain and Africa, and had no less than fifteen great towns, whereas there are not now above three^h; neither was it at all difficult for the Moorish sovereign to bring into the field an army much superior in number to the inhabitants that are now upon it, taking in all ranks, sexes, and ages. In a word, at this time the king of Majorca was very powerful, and his subjects rich and happy, through the exercise of trade with their own countrymen, and piracy upon the Christiansⁱ.

cause occasions the war, by which the

WE need not wonder that, in circumstances like these, both prince and people were less prudent than if they had been in a worse situation. They had, upon some slight pretences, taken two vessels belonging to Barcelona, one of which was very richly laden. Of this, the people of that city complained to their king Don Jayme, who was at that time but a very young man, much perplexed in his affairs, and who, in all probability, had never thought of attacking these islands; at least nothing of this kind appears from his conduct; for, upon this complaint, he sent an ambassador to the king of Majorca to demand satisfaction, which might have been easily given; for the Catalans were in reality the aggressors, and had taken a tartane of Majorca, though of no great value^k. But very unfortunately for the Moorish prince, he enquired of a Genoese master of a ship, what strength the king of Arragon had; who answered, that he was a poor pitiful prince, who, with the whole force of his dominions, was not able to take the castle of Peniscola^l. When the ambassador had his audience, the Moorish king put on an affected ignorance, and asked him, who his master was? My master, answered the ambassador, is Don Jayme, king of Arragon, the son of Don Pedro, who, at the memorable battle of Tolosa, cut many thousands of your nation to pieces^m. This unexpected answer so ruffled the Moor, that he was on the point of seizing him who gave it; and tho' upon reflection he did not do that, yet he answered him with contempt, and ordered him to quit his dominions without delay. A conduct inexcusable in itself, and of which he had quickly cause to repentⁿ.

*Don Jayme I.
makes an oath not to desist till the Moors
were at his mercy.*

AT his return, the ambassador found his master at Barcelona, to whom he gave a very particular account of the reception he had met with, which so irritated Don Jayme, that he swore, at the altar, never to desist from his enterprize against Majorca, till he had the king by the beard, that is, till he had his enemies at his mercy. There is, however, great probability, that there was a mixture of policy with this resentment. He was desirous of being at the head of an army entirely under his own command, and of accustoming his nobility to obey him; his cousin Don Nugno Sanchez was very desirous of having the command given to himself, but the king would not hear of it^o. The nobility of Arragon, and even the pope's legate, advised him to turn his arms rather against Valentia; but he was determined. The nobles of Catalonia furnished him with all he could desire: and in what condition they were able to do this, will appear from the quota furnished by the archbishop of Tarragona; which was, a thousand marks in gold, five hundred quarters of wheat, one hundred men at arms, and one thousand foot, to be paid by him till the conquest of the island^p. His whole force consisted of fifteen hundred horse, and about fifteen thousand foot, of whom about a thousand were mere adventurers from France, Provence, Gascony, &c. He put to sea on Wednesday the first of September, and, after two or three storms, came upon the coasts of Majorca, where the Moors opposed his landing, which was not effected without much trouble and some loss; at length, however, his whole army was debarked, and a resolution taken to give the enemy battle: in which the soldiers were so eager, that they would have marched without their officers^q, who only laboured to restrain them till they were recovered a little from their fatigues: however, their impetuosity prevailed.

Majorca and his subjects absolutely reduced within four months.*

THE Moorish king lay with an army of five thousand horse, and thirty-seven thousand foot, in the best position he could take for covering his capital; Don Jayme attacked him with such fury, and his troops, who were all old soldiers, and accustomed to the field, were so much superior to the Moors, that, notwithstanding their superiority in point of numbers, they were quickly routed, and so totally, that the king had much ado to collect eight thousand men, nor could he do this till the city of Majorca was invested, into which he got with his forces by a stratagem^r. While Don Jayme remained before the place, several of the Moorish lords submitted to him; so that he was master of a great part of the island before the city was reduced^s. At length, the Moorish king offered to pay the expences of the war; and that being rejected, he proposed to surrender the place, and to pay a certain sum of money for every head, to preserve them from being put to death, which the king would have accepted, but the army refused, and demanded to be led to the assault. The Moors, absolutely desperate, defended themselves with great obstinacy, and some of the lords proposed to the king renewing the negotiation; which Don Jayme refused, adding, it is too late to be wise, now we must conquer or die. At length, however, the place was taken^t. The Moorish king endeavoured to conceal himself, but was taken, and presented to Don Jayme, as was soon after his son, a youth of thirteen years old. The king of Arragon, in discharge of his oath, a took his enemy by the beard, but spoke to him kindly, and promised him good usage; as for the son, he was instructed in the Christian religion, baptized by the name of Don Jayme, and the king gave him a very large estate in Valentia, where his posterity were still remaining in the days of Mariana ^u. The city was taken, and the island of Majorca consequently reduced, on the last day of the year; so that this expedition was executed in about four months, and the king enabled to comply with the promises he had made to his nobility, and to those of other nations, who, under the specious pretences of religion and honour, were in reality cutting out settlements for themselves with their swords ^v.

It was some years before the Moors were brought thoroughly into subjection; for, having a natural abhorrence to their new masters, as Catalans as well as Christians, they were perpetually taking up arms; and when they could no longer keep the field, they sheltered themselves in the natural fortresses of the island, that is, vast caves in the sides of high mountains, the entrances of which were easily defended, and the room within was so great as to admit many families without any considerable inconvenience ^x. By degrees, however, they were brought under, but it is judged that, by the slaughter during the war, and these insurrections, and the numbers that quitted their country, and retired into the kingdom of Granada, or to Barbary, this island lost one half its inhabitants. The king, Don Jayme, greatly augmented and adorned the city of Majorca, or Palma, which, at the time it fell into his hands, was built chiefly on the sea coast, and on the side of the mountain; upon the summit of which stood a citadel that protected, but, at the same time, commanded the town ^y. This the king caused to be demolished, and instead of it built a most beautiful cathedral, a noble palace, and other public edifices, which were also well defended by towers, and other fortifications; the port he secured by a most noble mole, and established an excellent form of government, which, by rendering the inhabitants easy and happy, drew thither continual supplies of people from all parts ^z. In 1232, he made a second voyage thither, when he summoned the Moors, who inhabited Minorca, to submit, and, by a stratagem of lighting many fires every night along the opposite coast, terrified them to such a degree with the apprehensions of an invasion, that he brought them to submit, and to pay him an annual tribute ^a. In 1256, he established his son Don Jayme in the possession of these dominions, which, however, gave great offence to the heir apparent of the crown of Arragon, and notwithstanding, as we have shewn in the former section, that he had formerly bestowed them upon the Infant Don Pedro of Portugal, as an equivalent for the countries which he had acquired by marriage ^b.

Don Jayme the second, upon the demise of his father, succeeded to the throne, in virtue of his father's will, who bestowed upon him, not only the kingdom of Majorca, and all its dependencies, but likewise the lordship of Montpellier, the counties of Roussillon, Collioure, Constans, Cerdagne, Valespir, and all that he possessed in France ^c. Don Pedro the third of Arragon, tho' he was by no means satisfied with this disposition, yet he confirmed it, upon condition that his brother should do him homage, and hold his territories as a feudatory to the crown of Arragon; which appears clearly, from a treaty between them, in the month of January, in the year following the death of their father ^d. However, Don Jayme was so offended with this, and with his not having the kingdom of Valentia, which he surmised his father likewise intended him, that when Philip the hardy, in pursuance of the pope's invitations, determined to invade Arragon, he not only granted him a free passage through his territories, which perhaps might have been justified, as he was his feudatory for the countries he held on the continent, but also assisted him in his war against his brother ^e. This so provoked that monarch, that he sent his son, the infant Don Alonso, with a potent fleet and army to depose his uncle, which he accordingly did; the people willingly submitted, upon account of the heavy taxes that had been imposed upon them by Don Jayme; he likewise reduced the island of Ivica, and left strong garrisons therein, and at the same time projected the entire reduction of Minorca ^f. The reason of this seems to have been, that the inhabitants, notwithstanding their submission to Don Jayme the first, continued their piracies; for which the sole remedy his prudence could suggest was to expel them that country: and this, after a vigorous war of two years, he gloriously effected, by the capitulation of Port Mahon, and of St. Agatha, when the Moors consented to give him a certain sum of money for every head to obtain leave to retire into Barbary, and that such as had it not to give, should remain, and submit to such terms as he thought fit to prescribe ^a.

A. D. 1287. Deprived of his dominions by one nephew, and restored to them by another. THE king Don Jayme, who still retained Roussillon and the rest of the countries he held in France, gave his nephew all the disturbance he could; but this served only to increase the weight of his misfortunes, as all his attempts proved unsuccessful. However, by the interposition of the pope and the king of France, Don Alonso, upon the conclusion of a general peace, consented to restore his uncle to all his dominions, to be held, as before, by homage rendered to the crown of Arragon; but before this treaty could be fully accomplished Don 1291. Alonso died ^b. His brother and successor Don Jayme the second was content that things should remain in this situation, as appears by a large and full treaty, which is still extant, concluded between them at Argilers, in which the former styles himself Don Jayme, by the grace of God, king of Arragon, Valentia, and Murcia, and count of Barcelona; and the latter king of the Majorcas, that is, Majorca and the islands dependent upon it, count of Roussillon and Cerdagne, and lord of Montpellier; in which they stipulate a perpetual friendship for themselves and successors against all powers whatever, subject to the homage formerly stipulated; and this treaty bears date June 9, 1298. By virtue of this treaty ^c, Don Jayme found himself once more in the peaceable possession of his dominions, and so continued to the time of his decease; which was about four years after. By his queen Esclaronda, who was the daughter of the count de Foix, he had Don Jayme, who became a monk, Don Sancho, who succeeded him, Don Ferdinand, and Don Philip, who was an ecclesiastic. He had also a daughter, Donna Sancha. The body of this prince, Don Jayme the second, lies interred in the cathedral church of Majorca ^d.

Don Sancho did homage to Philip the fair, king of France, on the eighth of December the same year, for the lordship of Montpellier ^e; and, on the seventh of July in the year following, he likewise did homage to Don Jayme the second ^f. He had afterwards some dispute with the crown of France about his lordship of Montpellier, which the king of Arragon pretended was to be held of him, independent of the crown of France; and some proceedings there were upon this matter before the parliament of Paris; but Philip the long took the cognizance of this difference from them, and adjusted it with the two kings himself ^g. Don Sancho was a prince of a mild and equitable disposition, content with his small dominions, which he governed in peace to the time of his demise, which happened on the fourth of September, one thousand three hundred and twenty-four, without issue ^h.

The king of Arragon disposed to seize these territories upon his dying without issue.

Don Jayme king of Arragon immediately seized his dominions, as has been mentioned in the former section: but the Spanish historians, and even those of the kingdom of Arragon, who very highly commend his justice in restoring them, do not give us any clear account upon what motives the original measure was taken. It seems in the will of Don Jayme the conqueror, king both of Arragon and Majorca, there was a substitution of the royal house of Arragon, in case the heirs male should fail of Don Jayme king of Majorca; and some of the courtiers of the king of Arragon persuaded him, that, Don Sancho dying without heirs, he had a just title to the kingdom under that will ⁱ. But the Infant Don Philip of Majorca represented to him, that Don Jayme the second left four sons, of whom the late king Don Sancho was not the eldest, but succeeded in the place of his brother, who had renounced the world; that his next brother Don Ferdinand, who should have been his successor, was indeed dead, but had left by his wife Donna Isabella, heiress of the Morea, a son Don Jayme, who was indisputably the heir male of his grandfather, and consequently entitled, under that will, to the kingdom of Majorca, and its dependencies ^j.

Don Jayme III. does homage to the king of Arragon, and espouses his daughter Donna Constantia.

THE Infant Don Philip of Majorca did homage, as guardian of his nephew, and in his name, on the first of October, one thousand three hundred and twenty-seven, to Don Jayme the second of Arragon, and by the interest of the same Don Philip a marriage was concluded for the young king, with the Infanta Donna Constantia of Arragon, daughter to Don Alonso, heir apparent of that kingdom ^k. It is indeed suggested by Mariana, that it was in regard to this marriage Don Jayme of Arragon sacrificed his claim to the crown of Majorca; but this seems very improbable, since the young king had infinitely more interest in marrying that princess than her grandfather could have in disposing of her, since he might, without difficulty, have matched her to princes of equal rank and greater power. On the twenty-fifth of October, one thousand three hundred and twenty-eight, Don Jayme of Majorca did homage in person to king Alonso the fourth of Arragon his father-in-law ^l; when, without question, the treaties between the two crowns were renewed; by which it was settled, that they should assist each a other with their whole force; and in case any differences arose between them, the points in controversy were to be determined by the pope: neither is there any reason to suppose, that Don Alonso would insist upon any harder terms from a prince of his blood, and his son-in-law, than the kings his predecessors had done from the ancestors of this young prince; but, on the contrary, there is nothing more probable, than that Don Jayme looked upon himself as very secure of support from Arragon, as well in consideration of this alliance, as of those treaties by which he was, strictly speaking, entitled to it^c.

It may be, that his conceiving too highly of the benefits he might draw from this alliance, might induce him to frame false ideas of his own power, and put him upon making a greater figure than his predecessors had done. The very situation of his dominions, and their tenure, b exposed him to continual difficulties, in which the making one or two false steps was more than sufficient to throw himself and his subjects into the utmost distress. The circumstances of the times were very critical; and though he was a prince of high courage, and did not want abilities, yet his having a spirit superior to his fortune, and his affecting an independency which was altogether impracticable, drew him quickly into perplexities, and, in the end, proved his ruin^d. He was summoned by Philip de Valois, king of France, to do homage for his lordship of Montpellier, and all its dependencies; and being, at that time, embarrassed by the Moors, he accordingly did homage on the twenty-eighth of April, though unwillingly, as conceiving there was none due^e. He applied himself the same year to pope John the twenty-second for two favours, the first was, a power to levy the tenths upon the clergy; the second, c a permission to send three ships with rich merchandize to Alexandria; for without the licence of the pope, in those days, Christian princes could not suffer their subjects to have any correspondence with the infidels; and both were to enable him to defend his territories from the invasions of the Moors, and to clear the adjacent seas from their corsairs^f. The pope granted him both his requests, provided that the ships he sent to Alexandria did not furnish the infidels with arms or military stores; and, in all probability, these supplies enabled him to protect his subjects, and to repress the pirates of Barbary^g. We have good reason to believe, that his success in this served to support and to heighten that ambition, which was but too high already.

UPON the demise of his father-in-law Don Alonso, he was summoned by Don Pedro the d fourth to do him homage, which he accordingly did, on the seventeenth of July, in the states of Catalonia, assembled at Barcelona. The very next year his dispute broke out with the king of France, who, being jealous of his intention to shake off his sovereignty, had expressly forbid him to celebrate jousts or tournaments in any of the places he held from him, without his permission first obtained; in contempt of which the king of Majorca caused them to be performed^h. He was encouraged to this, by the dangerous war in which Philip de Valois was then engaged with the crown of England, and the hopes he had of being supported both by that monarch, and the king of *Arragon*ⁱ. Some historians deny this, others pass it over; but there are unquestionable authorities to prove, that there was at this time an alliance brought upon the carpet between the crowns of England, Arragon, and Majorca, against France. There is, however, great reason to believe, that Don Pedro was never at all in earnest, but took these steps purely with a view to amuse and mislead this unhappy prince to his destruction^j. Don Pedro was a great politician, and having formed in his own mind a resolution to deprive him of all that he held, as a feudatory to the crown of Arragon, he judged that nothing could be more conducive to the effectual execution of this scheme than to leave the French king at full liberty to strip him of all the lordships for which he had done him homage. He executed this perfidious plan with such dexterity and address, as deceived the unhappy Don Jayme to the last^k; who by letters, ambassadors, and personal applications, repeated his demands of succours, in virtue of the treaties subsisting between them, and on the score of his being his vassal; which succours, tho' Don Pedro, under various specious pretences, f declined, yet he would never deny, but flattered him with hopes, till the French, by dint of a superior power, deprived Don Jayme of the lordship of Montpellier, and all its dependencies, and then, as at the proper season, he disclosed his meaning plainly^l.

HE caused, as we have said in a former section, the king of Majorca to be summoned, to answer to certain points of accusation that were brought against him, nor would he grant him any delay, though he desired it; and in his own memoirs Don Pedro acknowledges, that all the answers he gave to his applications were, Let him appear before the states; let him justify his own conduct, and I will grant his request. As to two of the three points of the charge, that is, that he had entered into a war with the king of France without his consent, and that he had imposed very heavy taxes upon his subjects, they were plainly things with which he had nothing to do; for, by the treaty subsisting between them, they were reciprocally obliged to assist each other if attacked; but the king of Majorca was not at all restrained from making war or peace as he thought fit: and, in respect to taxes, it is in express words declared, that the king of Majorca might impose and levy them as he thought proper^c. In regard to the third head, of coining money at Perpignan, the king of Majorca was not so excusable, as there was a clause which prohibited this in the treaties; and as it appeared to have been the intention of the original donor Don Jayme the first of Arragon, that no money should be current in the five counties, bestowed upon this prince's grandfather, but what was coined at Barcelona^d. We are assured by Mariana, that, besides the heads before-mentioned, there were other accusations, of a far more heinous nature; such as having formed a design to assassinate the king of Arragon at their last interview, which, out of humanity and the affection due from a sister, the queen Donna Constantia had discovered to Don Pedro; and that he had offered to enter into an alliance against him, not only with the king of France, but with the king of Morocco^e. These, very probably, were only thrown in to make up weight, or to deter the king from appearing, if he had any such design; since, if they had been founded in truth, they would have been far better reasons for depriving him of his dominions than those which were assigned.

From whom he takes that island, and all its dependencies, by an invasion.

THE king of Majorca, being no longer at a loss to know his brother-in-law's intentions, published a manifesto, in which he loaded him with reproaches, declared war against him, and took the best measures he could for his own defence. The historian of Majorca asserts, that, in the midst of his misfortunes, his subjects were never wanting in their fidelity, and produces a public instrument of their's^b, by which they approve and justify that monarch's conduct; which is directly contrary to what the historians of Arragon assert, as to their being universally discontented, and of their inviting Don Pedro to deliver them^f. But perhaps truth in this case may lie on both sides, that is, the people of Majorca, while the king was in possession, might publish, or might allow him to publish, whatever he thought proper, in their names, for his justification, and yet be secretly discontented, and entertain a private correspondence with his enemies. At least there seems to be some cause to suspect this, from the slender resistance that Don Pedro met with, when he soon after invaded Majorca^g. It also appears, that there must have been great errors in government, from the condition that things were then in; for, notwithstanding the extremity to which he was reduced, and the necessity he was under of raising the whole force of his dominions, Don Jayme was not able to bring into the field above a third part of the troops which the Moorish king assembled, when in the like circumstances; neither did these make any considerable defence: but all things fell immediately into such confusion, that the king, tho' personally brave, was constrained to seek his safety in flight, and that with a few followers only, while Don Pedro made a public entry into Majorca with loud acclamations of the people, leaving a viceroy behind him, with a small number of forces, who held these territories afterwards without trouble or dispute on the part of the people, whom the historians of Arragon therefore affirm to have been very well pleased with this revolution^h.

WE have in a former section related how this war ended, and the unfortunate king of Majorca was despoiled of all his dominions; and even of his regal title, by his enemy, which induced him to retire to the count de Foix, to preserve his life and liberty, with a power at least of meditating revenge: he sent a long memorial, containing the history of the injuries that had been done him, to pope Clement the sixth, who interposed with Don Pedro, in regard especially to the king's family, exhorting him to restore at least his queen and his children, if not his dominions; upon which Don Pedro suffered his sister Donna Constantia to go to her husbandⁱ. It is also certain, that he solicited the king of France to interpose in his behalf, who treated him very unkindly, though he gave him fair words and fine promises^j. Don Jayme, to stave that, tho' his fortune might, yet his spirit never could, be broken, embarked a small body of troops aboard a few galleys, and attempted to make a descent on Majorca; but was repulsed in such a manner, that he was obliged to retire; upon which, taking advantage of the troubles in Arragon, he made an irruption into Roussillon, and recovered the county of Conflans; but Don Pedro marching against him from Barcelona, a smart action a happened between them at Vinea, in which Don Jayme was routed, and forced to retire.^o He made afterwards an attempt upon Puyserdan with the like ill fortune; and at this time the king of France seized his lordship of Montpelier, alleging, that, as he was his vassal, and had made these incursions without his leave, he had forfeited that feigniory^p. This fact is put out of all doubt by a letter from the pope to the French king, dated August the eighteenth, the same year, intreating him to restore that lordship, that this unhappy prince might not be driven to absolute despair, or his family, descending from a long race of kings, be utterly deprived of subsistence^q. It appears from hence how much those authors are mistaken who A. D. 1347. assert, that Don Jayme of Majorca was present in the battle of Cressy; and how much more those writers are deceived, who affirm, that he was killed there August the twenty-fifth, one thousand three hundred and forty-six, which is a piece of false history that deserves certainly to be exploded, tho' it has so long passed current amongst us^r.

ALL his disappointments served only to sharpen the courage of Don Jayme, who having, by a deed, signed the eighteenth of April at Avignon, and assented to by both his children, sold the lordship of Montpelier, and all its dependencies, to the king of France, for one hundred and twenty thousand golden crowns^s; he spent the whole in raising an army for the recovery of Majorca. Some writers say, that this consisted of three hundred horse and three thousand foot; others say, fifteen hundred horse and eleven thousand foot: it may be the former was the number of troops he carried over, and the latter of his army when joined by his partisans in Majorca^t. He was as unfortunate in his last as in his former expeditions; for, before he could have time for taking any proper measures for augmenting his forces, by the accession of all who were yet well affected to him in Majorca, he was attacked by Gilbert de St. Ellas, viceroy of that island, and by Rimbao de Corbera, viceroy of Sardinia, at the head of eight hundred horse and twenty thousand foot, all old troops; upon which his new-raised forces immediately fled, but, those he brought with him remaining firm, the king fought it out to the last, and refusing quarter, was pierced thro' the body with a lance; after which, as some say, the Catalans cut off his head^u. This happened on Sunday the 25th of October. In him ended the monarchs of Majorca, of the royal house of Arragon^v. By his first wife, Donna Constantia, he had two children, Don Jayme and Donna Isabella; by his second, Donna Roland, or Donna Violante, whom he married after her decease, which happened in the year one thousand three hundred and forty-six, it does not appear that he had any issue.

We might here close this section, without pursuing the history of this unlucky family any farther; but then some passages in the foregoing history, and others in the following sections, would be left very obscure, and, which is worse, under great suspicion of inaccuracy, falshood, and contradiction; which is frequently the case with writers of general history, by their affecting brevity too much. We will therefore give a succinct account of the son of this monarch Don Jayme the younger, whom the Italian writers stile sometimes James of Majorca, from his pretensions to that kingdom; and sometimes James of Tarracona, from the place of his birth, better known afterwards by the more illustrious title of king of Naples^x; which did not hinder him from bearing still in his mind the claims that he derived from his birth, which led him into adventures that have brought him more than once in our way; and it is to reduce them into their natural order, and to fix their dates from authentic authorities, that we find ourselves obliged to resume them here. The strange errors which some great authors have fallen into upon his account, will sufficiently justify our conduct.

We cannot fix the time of this prince's birth, tho' we can come pretty near it, for, in the ratification of his father's sale of the lordship of Montpelier, dated May 15th, 1349, he is said to be more than eleven, and under fourteen^y. In October the same year he was taken prisoner in Majorca, and sent by his uncle to be kept at Barcelona, where, on the first of May, having found means to furnish himself with false keys and with arms, he opened the prison doors; and, having slain Nicholas Rovira, who was his keeper, and would have hindered him, he made his escape to Avignon, where he was protected and caressed by the pope^z. As he was at this time esteemed one of the handsomest and most accomplished princes of the age, queen Joan of Naples, who was just become a widow, offered him her person and her crown, which, in his circumstances, he thought it prudent to accept^a. After Donna Isabella likewise espoused John the marquis of Montferrat, and received from her a uncle Don Pedro a considerable fortune^b; but, notwithstanding this seeming turn of fortune, he was still so possessed with a desire to recover his hereditary dominions, and found so many circumstances that imbibited his stay at Naples, even with the regal title, that, four years afterwards, we find him at Bordeaux, soliciting Edward the black prince to assist him in the recovery at least of his dominions on that side the Pyrenees; which the prince promised him, provided he would attend him in his expedition into Spain; which he did^c; and, in his to see a young monarch, whom, contrary to the ties of nature, and the law of nations, he had so much injured.

Dies, endeavouring to recover his dominions.

1375:

His sister Donna Isabella conveys her pretensions to the duke of Anjou.

THE next summer, when the prince of Wales retired out of Castile, he was constrained to leave Don Jayme sick behind him, and by this means it was that he fell into the hands of Don Henry, king of Castile, a prince who, having felt the weight of misfortunes himself, had a generous concern for the distresses of others^d. He treated the king of Naples kindly, but kept him a prisoner till he had made his peace with Arragon, when Don Pedro was in hopes that he would either have delivered him up, or have confined him closer; but the king Don Henry suffered him soon after to go to Avignon, where, by the assistance of the duke of Anjou, he for four years together alarmed the king of Arragon at least, and at length assembled an army, with which he advanced as far as the Pegro, where, finding himself distressed for provisions, and his forces in danger of being surrounded, he sent to Don Henry of Castile for assistance and advice^e. That great and gallant monarch gave him both; he offered him his court for an asylum, and he promised to persuade or to compel the king of Arragon to grant him an establishment; and, to deliver him out of his present perplexity, he ordered a corps of troops to advance to Soria, where the king of Majorca joined them. But unhappy princes are commonly deceived by the glimmerings of good fortune; Don Jayme fatigued himself so much in this forced march, that, being seized by a malignant fever, he died in a few days, and was buried in the monastery of St. Francis, in the town of Soria^f. The reader will judge what credit is due to those historians who so positively assert, that his consort queen Joan of Naples, having found him in bed with a mistress, caused him to be beheaded^g.

His sister Donna Isabella, widow of John Marquis of Montferrat, was with him at that time, and, by the interposition of the king of Castile, a convention was concluded with the king of Arragon, by which a sum of money was given her for the pay of the troops that were about her, and they were allowed to retire without molestation^h. It was this princess, who, after the decease of her brother, confirmed the donation, which, in conjunction with him, she had made of all her rights to the duke of Anjou, to whom they were under very great obliga-tionsⁱ. How these pretensions were afterwards transferred, and at length extinguished, has been shewn in its proper place, so that we are now at liberty to return to the history of Arra-gon. But, before we do this, it may not be improper to take notice of an observation made by Ferreras, that the misfortunes of Don Jayme the third, king of Majorca, ought to be a perpetual warning to all princes in his situation, who should be extremely careful to preserve their dominions in peace, and by that means secure the affections of their subjects, who, jealous of their own happiness, will make such efforts for its preservation as they would think impracticable in defence of any monarch's title. Time, and a prudent use of favourable events, may gradually aggrandize even the smallest sovereignty; but a little king, who racks his subjects, that he may make a figure which he esteems worthy of a crowned head, takes the surest and speediest method of being no king at all^k. To this we may add, that, if Don Jayme the younger had lived to be an old man, he would have been the indubitable heir of his persecutor's dominions, and consequently have prevented that struggle amongst the competitors for this succession, of which it will be our business to give the reader a comprehensive view at the beginning of the next section, which will conclude the history of Arragon, and all the territories annexed to it, before its conjunction with Castile in the persons of Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella.

S E C T. XII.

The history of the kingdom of Arragon, continued from the interregnum on the death of Don Martin, to the union of the crowns of Castile and Arragon, under their catholic majesties Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella.

^a THERE never was a country left in a more miserable or exposed condition than this of Arragon, by the death of the king Don Martin, who, in the last months of his life, employed all his thoughts to preserve himself in ease and safety, without being obliged to declare in favour of any of the pretenders, who he knew could none of them be settled in the legal and quiet possession of the throne, but by the authority of the states, to whose decision therefore he was inclined to leave it ¹. Upon his demise, all things seemed to fall to pieces; Arragon, Valentia, Catalonia, became at once sovereign states, without any other union than their mutual regard for their own interests, which were better consulted by their having but one sovereign, than any other way; and yet separately they were in great confusion. In Arragon the factions of the Lunas and the Urreas, the former espousing the party of the count de Urgel, while the latter, who were his declared enemies, scattered discord through every corner of the kingdom ^b. In Valentia, the Contellas and the Villaraguedes, by their dissensions, did the like ^c. In Catalonia things were in a more composed condition, the states immediately assembled, and assumed the government ^d. In Majorca, and the islands dependent upon it, all things were perfectly quiet, through the care of Don Roger de Moncada ^e. Sardinia was torn to pieces by a civil war; and in Sicily, Don Bernard de Cabrera, count of Modica, held a very suspicious conduct, seizing by force most of the considerable places, putting garrisons in them, fitting out several squadrons to cruise upon the coasts, though he pretended to aim at nothing more than preserving the island for the crown of Arragon; and yet he besieged the queen-dowager Donna Blanca, who had assumed the title and power of queen regent for the same purpose ^f. What ^g is most extraordinary, notwithstanding all these quarrels and disturbances, there was nothing lost; and though it was a long time before they were appeased, yet, when that happened, all things fell into the old channel, and the lustre of the crown of Arragon was not at all diminished. A felicity that has scarce ever attended a complicated succession left in such a manner.

^h POPE Benedict the thirteenth, who was himself an Arragonian, used all imaginable methods to quiet the minds of the people in that kingdom, and in Valentia, to very little purpose ⁱ. Some indeed of the nobility in both kingdoms acted like good patriots, and acted to the utmost of their power for the welfare of the state; in order to which, they procured a truce to be made in Arragon for three years, by which all private quarrels, on what pretence soever, were to be suspended during that time, and to this they were sworn. It was in general so well observed, that, when Don Antonio de Luna demanded a conference with the archbishop of Saragossa, Don Garcia Fernandez de Heredia, he made no scruple of consenting to it, though he was the head of the opposite faction. When they met, Don Antonio picked a quarrel with the archbishop, and, having posted an ambuscade conveniently for that purpose, attacked and murdered him, which threw the whole kingdom into a flame, and alarmed not a little the parliament, then sitting at Calatayud; to oppose which, Don Antonio and his party called another assembly, to which they gave that title in another place ^j. In Valentia the troubles were near as great, and the malecontents had recourse to the same method of meeting again in another place, and of calling themselves a parliament. In both kingdoms they were forced to have recourse to the Infant Don Ferdinand of Castile, to desire that he would send troops to protect them, and to give a proper degree of weight to the only legal authority subsisting in either country ^k. In Catalonia things went somewhat better; the parliament at Tortosa were generally and chearfully obeyed; so that when the count d'Urgel advanced with a body of troops, the parliament sent him so quick a message, that he thought fit to retire. They likewise desired the Infant Don Ferdinand to withdraw his forces; from which he excused himself, as they were not sent to awe but to protect the parliaments of Arragon.

and Valentia^k. These three assemblies, having conferred by deputations, agreed to lose no time in the election, or rather declaration, of a king, for which purpose they appointed a standing committee to take the preparatory measures, who were to meet and hold their deliberations at Alcaniz. The troops, however, of the count de Urgel committed so many disorders; that the parliaments were obliged to have recourse to the Infant of Castile for troops sufficient to keep the passages to that place clear and safe; and, after this, the deputies from all three parliaments resorted thither, and began to enter in earnest upon the business^l entrusted to their care.

At length nine judges are chosen, to determine the title of the claimants. AFTER mature deliberation, it was resolved, that this great affair should be decided by nine judges, men of experience and integrity, and that each state should chuse three; and that they should meet at Caspé, a place standing very conveniently on the frontiers of Valentia and Catalonia, belonging to the knights templars; but upon this occasion, by the permission of the pope, there was put into it a very strong garrison, composed of Arragoneſe and Catalan troops, for at that time the two parliaments of Valentia kept that country so divided, that it was not easy to distinguish where the authority lay. Orders were given to the several competitors to send their agents to Caspé^m. In the mean time the civil war which had begun the year before in Valentia, rose to such a height, that the viceroy, who was intirely in the interest of the count of Urgel, endeavoured to join a body of his forces with all the strength of his own party; but, being intercepted by the chiefs of the opposite faction, an action ensued on the twenty-seventh of January, in which there were five thousand slain, and, amongst them, the viceroy and the grand bailiffⁿ. There happened at this time an incident which manifests the true spirit of party; the victors obliged Don Arnold de Bellera, the son of the viceroy, to carry his father's head upon a pole, when they made their public entry into Morviedo. This melancholy affair, however, was attended with some good events, for the people in general began to see the folly of keeping up these divisions, and consequently the rage of parties gradually declined; insomuch that, towards the end of March, the two parliaments united, and sent a detachment of troops to make their quota of the garrison of the fortress of Caspé, into which, without any dispute, they were received, and all things disposed for the reception of this august tribunal^o, to whom the preservation of so many kingdoms was consigned.

W^hic^h, by the consent of all the parliaments, are named by the viceroy and chief justice of Arragon. THE judges were not chosen with the same facility. The Catalans and Valentians especially were much divided. At length, understanding that the Arragoneſe had referred the choice of their commissaries to the viceroy and chief justice, they all agreed to leave the nomination of their judges to the same persons; who declared, for the kingdom of Arragon, Don Dominic Ram, bishop of Huesca, Don Francisco de Aranda, Don Berenger de Bardogi; for the principality of Catalonia, Don Pedro Zagariga, archbishop of Terragona, Don Gulermo de Balseca, and Don Bernard de Galbes; for the kingdom of Valentia, Don Boniface de Ferrier, general of the chartreux, his brother Vincent de Ferrier, of the orders of frier preachers, a man of a vehement disposition, but who, by his probity and disinterestedness, had acquired a general reputation of a saint, and Don Ginez de Rabaza, the most celebrated civil lawyer in the kingdom. But when the judges were all arrived, had taken their respective seats, and, in their first sessions, appointed tutors to maintain the cause of Don Frederic, count de Luna, on account of his youth, the last of these judges, Don Ginez de Rabaza, either lost, or pretended to lose, his senses; upon which his family had leave to withdraw him; and Pedro Bertran, another very eminent lawyer, was appointed in his stead^p.

These judges meet at Caspé, open their tribunal, and hear the claims of the several pretenders. WE have insisted the longer upon this affair, as there are but very few instances in history where the rights of succession have been canvassed before a tribunal composed of judges who were immediately to become the subjects of him in whose favour they declared, and whose authority, after their decision, was as properly owned and submitted to as before. It is true, that some exceptions were taken by two of the parliaments, upon their nomination, against some of the judges, upon a presumption that their sentiments were already known; but, in answer to this, it was alleged, that stations change men, and that the notions of the private person might give way to the lights acquired by the judges; that it would not be easy to replace them by men of as great character, not liable to the same objection; and, lastly, that these exceptions came too late, since it was unanimously agreed to adhere to the persons named by the viceroy and the grand bailiff; and at length all the parliaments acquiesced^q. It is now time to inform the reader who the competitors were, and how their claims were supported; since, in the course of this or perhaps of any other history, there is scarce a parallel of a proceeding of this nature, in which all things were conducted a with a dignity and an impartiality suitable to the importance of that question which they were to decide.

THERE were in the whole seven competitors, five princes and two princeſſes. The first of these was Don Alonso, duke of Gandia, the son of the Infant Don Pedro, and the grandson of Don Jayme II. king of Arragon, so that he was a direct male descendant of the royal house of Arragon. This prince died while the controversy was depending; upon which Don Juan count de Prades, his brother, claimed in preference to his nephew the count of Denia, son to the deceased duke. But the judges determined clearly that the right accruing to the duke of Gandia, in case he had any right, accrued at the death of the king Don Martin; and that therefore the title, whatever it was, must be in his son, who was his representative, and not his brother. Don Jayme count de Urgel was the next claimant, as being the son of Don Pedro count d'Urgel, and the grandson of the Infant Don Jayme; who was so created by his father Don Alonso the fourth, the eldest son and successor of Don Jayme the second; so that it was alleged he had clearly a better right than the duke of Gandia, since, Don Jayme the second being their common ancestor, he claimed under the eldest, whereas the duke claimed under the youngest son. The third was Don Frederic count de Luna, natural son to Don Martin the younger, king of Sicily, who would have been indisputably the heir of all these dominions, but for the flaw in his birth; to help which, three legitimations were insisted upon; that of his father, that of his grandfather, and that of the pope. However, upon examining these legitimations, it appeared, that the intention of them all was to qualify him for the succession in Sicily; and, in the act of legitimation by his grandfather, it was declared, in express terms, that he should not be qualified or intitled thereby to succeed to the crowns of Arragon, Valentia, Sardinia, Corſica, and Majorca, or to the counties of Barcelona, Rouſſillon, and Cerdagne. Lewis of Anjou, duke of Calabria, and count de Guise, claimed in right of his mother, Donna Violante, queen of Naples, daughter to Don Juan, the elder brother of Don Martin. That queen herself also claimed, as did Donna Isabella, the wife of the count of Urgel, as being the daughter of Don Pedro the fourth. Lastly, the Infant Don Ferdinand of Caſtile set forth his title, being the son of Donna Leonora, the eldest sister of the two last kings.

THE advocates for his title seem to have been much abler men than those intrusted with the concerns of the other candidates; they set out with overturning all the old doctrine about the right of heirs female, which, in a military state, as that of Arragon originally was, they affirmed could never subsist, because an heir female is a perpetual minor, and therefore incapable of being at the head of such a state. As to the case of Petronilla, upon which all the other lawyers had stumbled, they removed it by a very subtle, but at the same time by a very plausible distinction, asserting, that she neither had, nor was ever understood to have by the states, any right in her own person at all. Her husband Don Raymond never assumed the title of king, but administered the government till there should be one; that, upon his demise, she indeed assumed the title of queen, but it was only that there might be the greater formality in her act, by which she devolved the government upon her son Don Alonso, tho' an Infant, who was the true heir of his grandfather Don Ramiro, surnamed the Monk. Upon this, the true rule of succession was laid down to be, that heirs female were excluded; but that the heirs male descended from females were capable of the succession, in proportion as they stood nearest in alliance to the last deceased prince, and were capable of administering the government; upon which principle the king of Caſtile had declined making any claim, tho' the representative of his father, who had a right prior to the Infant Don Ferdinand, because he was at this time himself a minor. That, with regard to the duke of Calabria, the states had already precluded him, by setting aside his mother, as well as the countess of Foix her sister, when they called the late king Don Martin to the throne; so that, upon the whole, the Infant Don Ferdinand was the nearest heir male to the last reigning prince, capable of the succession. However this had been received in Arragon, the Caſtilian lawyers had so fully possessed Don Ferdinand with an opinion of this title, that he would have asserted it by force.

THE judges spent thirty days in hearing with great candour and calmness whatever could be offered to them in behalf of any of the candidates. This being done, they assembled, and debated the matter among themselves. Vincent de Ferrier was the first who spoke, and declared for the Infant Don Ferdinand; five more of the judges concurred with him; the archbishop of Tarragona gave his voice for the count d'Urgel, Gulermo de Balseca was of his opinion; as for Pedro Bertram, he declined giving any opinion at all, as not having had time to acquaint himself with their several pretensions. But as the three judges for Arragon, two of the

Valentians, and one Catalan, were of the same opinion, they proceeded to draw up the decree, which was made public on the twenty-eighth of June, in the church of Caspé, with all the marks of solemnity that could be devised, and with great acclamations of the people, who were glad to see the interregnum at an end, and the antient form of government restored^a. It cannot, however, be supposed, that, in a case of this nature, any decree could be made that would have no malecontents. St. Vincent, as they stiled him, plainly perceived this, and that the count of Urgel had still a very strong party, who complained openly that they called an Infant of Castile to the succession of the crown of Arragon, in prejudice to the noble race of the counts of Barcelona, from whom the count was indisputably descended; and therefore he endeavoured to dispel their melancholy by a sermon that he preached the next day with great emphasis, but which, notwithstanding, made very little impression on those who were of another opinion, though it very strongly confirmed such as were in the same sentiments, as, in disputes of this nature, is commonly the case. The Castilian writers, when they tell us, that, exclusive of his pretensions, Don Ferdinand was, of all the candidates, the prince who, for his personal great qualities, best deserved the throne, cast a shade of calumny upon the judges, whom they labour to commend, for they were not appointed to consider of conveniencies, but to decide a point of right^b by the known laws of their country.

Good reason to believe they decided according to their consciences in this affair.

UPON the closest inspection, however, it will probably appear to the candid and impartial reader, that they really discharged their consciences; though it must be allowed that they cast the succession upon a prince, who, if they had been free to make their choice, would have best deserved their suffrages. Those who were in the interest of the count of Urgel magnified his descent in a direct line from the counts of Barcelona, without distinguishing that this could only give him a title to the principality of Catalonia, and this too upon a supposition that heirs male, descending from females, were not capable of inheriting. But the principality of Catalonia and the kingdom of Valentia being united to the crown of Arragon by the assent of the states, the rule of succession to that crown was to be the rule of succession in the present case; and as the counts of Barcelona had acquired the regal dignity by their descent from a female, there was no reason that another family should not acquire it in the same way, which was the unanimous sense of the commissioners of Arragon. Besides, the count of Urgel had taken up arms, had committed hostilities against his country, and was looked upon to be the author of the most execrable assassination of the archbishop of Saragossa. To all which we may add, that, to prevent the miseries of a civil war, the parliaments of Arragon, Valentia, and Catalonia, who had an unquestionable right of declaring and confirming the titles of their kings, had in the most solemn manner devolved their power upon this occasion on the nine judges, and were therefore bound to follow their decree, it being made upon mature deliberation, freely, and without any suspicion of corruption^c. A kind of reasoning, which, through the whole of this affair, they had approved and pursued.

He is acknowledged, proclaimed, accepts the crown, and comes immediately to take possession of it. A. D. 1412.

ACCORDINGLY each of the parliaments sent deputies to the new king Don Ferdinand, to acknowledge his title, and to do him homage; which having accepted, he confirmed all who were in employment, and, in the beginning of August, he held an assembly of the states, received their oaths of fidelity to himself and to his son the Infant Don Alonso, his heir apparent; the kingdoms of Sardinia and Sicily likewise submitted, and the Genoese concluded a truce with him for five years^d. He went afterwards to Barcelona, where he held the states of Catalonia, confirmed their privileges, and received their oaths^e. The count of Urgel, however, could not be persuaded to acquiesce, or to pay his homage, though the king Don Ferdinand assured him of his favour, of indemnity for what was past, and, as he had no children but daughters, offered to marry the eldest of them to his son the Infant Don Henry, and to create him duke of Montalban. The count for some time kept the treaty on foot, and seemed to act as if he intended a submission, demanding an immense sum of money for the expences he had been at in pursuing his title to the crown, and other favours; which granted, he was content to do homage: however, Don Ferdinand would listen to nothing of that kind, but insisted on his doing homage first; which step taken, he was willing to do for the count whatever he could reasonably desire; and with this conduct the states of Catalonia were perfectly satisfied. But the count was privately taking other measures, in conjunction with Don Antonio de Luna, and other busy spirits, who were bent upon raising a civil war^f, which turned not at all to their advantage, though it gave much disturbance to the new king, and brought many and great miseries upon their country.

^a At the opening of the next year it appeared, that the count de Urgel had entered into an alliance with the duke of Clarence, had promised him his eldest daughter in marriage, and expected great succours from him out of Gascony: he took likewise every other measure that he thought capable of exciting domestic troubles, or bringing in foreign invaders. He prevailed so far as to cause some tumults in Saragossa, and to bring a multitude of adventurers of all nations, to try what was to be got by plundering Arragon and Catalonia: but he was not capable of bringing a strength into the field sufficient to look the king in the face, which obliged him to take shelter in the fortress of Balaquer, a very strong place, on the north side of the Segro, commanding a very pleasant and fertile country, which he defended with great courage and spirit for a long time, in hopes of being succoured by his foreign allies². The king, Don Ferdinand, commanded the siege in person, in which the duke of Gandia served with great courage and reputation, and at length the count of Urgel was compelled to surrender at discretion, and to go and throw himself at the feet of the king *Don Ferdinand*³. The states of Catalonia, who at the beginning had declared him a traitor, passed sentence upon him of perpetual imprisonment; the king having absolutely promised him his life, they confiscated all his estate, and that of his mother, by whom he was principally encouraged to act as he did. The king sent the count to be kept in Castile, and ordered him to be treated with all possible lenity and respect, as^b some authors say.

Reduces the count de Urgel, who had taken up arms against him.

A. D. 1413.

In the month of January, Don Ferdinand was crowned with great solemnity at Saragossa, where he created his eldest son prince of Gironne, and the Infant Don Henry prince of Pena-fiel; gave audience to the ambassadors from the emperor, and most of the other crowned heads in Europe, and made several good laws. In the assembly of the states^c, the same year, he had an interview with pope Benedict the thirteenth^d. A conspiracy was soon after discovered, by the mother of the count of Urgel, to poison the king; and by the assistance of foreign troops to raise her son to the throne. The king caused her with great secrecy to be arrested; in her custody letters were found from the king of Portugal, the duke of Clarence, and other princes who were acquainted with her intrigues. The king confined her and her daughters strictly, but would not proceed to extremities^e. He sent his son the Infant Don Juan into Sicily, having signed the contract of marriage for him with the young queen of Naples, but that princess had married the count de la Marche, of the house of Bourbon, before his arrival. The Neapolitans were extremely piqued at the queen's conduct, and made the king of Arragon offers of taking up arms in favour of the young prince; but Don Ferdinand told them, that he had kingdoms enough already, and that, considering the inconstancy of their queen, he thought his son had a good escape^f.

Is crowned with great solemnity at Saragossa, and is as well received at Arragon as possible.

The countess of Urgel intending to send her daughters into France, the king sent for the two eldest to court, and left the two youngest with her, upon a promise that she would not send them out of the kingdom^g. He had demanded of the states of Catalonia, a year before, a sum of money, to enable him to regulate the affairs of Sicily, which they were not inclined to grant; he made the same demand again this year at Barcelona, and was without ceremony refused; but was given to understand, that it was not out of disrespect to him, or for want of money, but to vindicate their privilege of refusing when they thought fit^h; which the king took so extremely ill, that he went to make a tour into Castile, where, his health being before infirm, he died, on the second of April, when he had governed the kingdom of Arragon three years nine months and five days. He had by his consort Donna Leonora de Albuquerque five sons, Don Alonso, prince of Gironne, the Infants Don Juan, Don Henry, Don Sancho, and Don Pedro; all of whom, except Don Sancho, survived him; and as many daughters. He was a prince of the most unblemished character that the age produced, of real piety, strict justice, and great moderation; the only fault his new subjects found with him was, that he loved his countrymen the Castilians too much, and had too many of them about his personⁱ; which though in itself a virtue, was in his situation misplaced.

1415. The states of Catalonia expostulate with him, on which he retires into Castile, and dies.

^f The prince of Gironne succeeded his father by the title of Alonso the fifth, and found the first moments of his reign perplexed by the insolence of pope Benedict the thirteenth, who, having amused his father with a promise of giving peace to the church by a resignation, was so much provoked at his renouncing obedience to him, and sending ambassadors to the council of Constance, as other Christian princes did, that he declared him a schismatic, and fallen from his regal dignity^k; notwithstanding which, his partisans had the confidence to desire the king's leave to supply him with provisions in the fortress of Peniscola, where, without this indulgence, he must have perished. However, the king consented to their demand, without departing any farther from his father's measures ¹. About the same time Don Antonio Luna involved a great many persons of quality in a very black design against the king's life, and for putting Don Jayme, count of Urgel, upon the throne; for the carrying on which scheme, he had amassed from the friends of the count a million of florins; but, when it was upon the point of being carried into execution, it was discovered, and a list of all the nobility that had any share in it put into the king's hands; who tore it without reading it, contenting himself with saying, that he would at least force them to acknowledge he had more regard for their lives than they had for his ^m. The wars in Sardinia and Corfica gave him great disturbance, so that at length he meditated an expedition in person; but he found the same difficulty his father had done in procuring supplies; instead of which the states of Catalonia sent deputies to expostulate with him on the keeping so many Castilians about him; but he told them, that he employed none of his Castilians in public affairs; and that he would not be dictated to as to the servants who were about his person ⁿ. We have in another part of this work given an account of the share he had in the affairs of Castile, and therefore shall not mention them here. His brother the infant Don Juan, whom he had recalled in the beginning of his reign from Sicily, from an apprehension that mutinous people might have set him upon the throne, married about this time the queen-dowager Donna Blanca, who was the heiress of Navarre, with the king's consent ^o. Don Alonso of Arragon, having obtained, by the assistance of pope Martin the fifth, a sufficient supply of money, executed his design of going in person to Sardinia, where, as he expected, he settled every thing to his own satisfaction, and obtained from the states of that island a free gift of one hundred thousand florins for the expences of his voyage, and to enable him to proceed to Sicily ^p, where his presence was become absolutely necessary.

WHILE he was providing for this new expedition, Antonio Carracca applied to him on the behalf of queen Joan of Naples, against whom the pope, the duke of Anjou, and the constable Sforza, had entered into a confederacy to depose her, offering that she should adopt him for her son and heir, and give him immediately the duchy of Calabria, if he would assist her. The king, knowing that the duke of Anjou had entered into a treaty with the Genoese, accepted the proposal, and sent a stout body of troops to her relief, by whom the siege of Naples was raised; upon which the queen installed Don Alonso by proxy heir apparent of her kingdom, and duke of Calabria ¹. However, in his expedition against Corfica, the king of Arragon was not altogether so fortunate. The next year he went to Sicily, and, having assembled a great fleet and army, passed over to Naples, and made his entry into that city on the seventh of June, where he was very kindly received by the queen, who, notwithstanding, began to alter her sentiments in relation to the services done her by that prince, and to consider some way of revoking her adoption ^r. The pope, in point of dissimulation, fell not at all short of this princess; for some writers say, that he confirmed the adoption of Don Alonso; but all agree, that he caused several places in the territories of Naples to be delivered up to him, as heir of the kingdom, at the very time he was carrying on intrigues against him ^s. The king Don Alonso was in the mean time employed in reducing that part of the kingdom of Naples which still adhered to the duke of Anjou; and his success, which ought to have endeared him to the queen and her minister, served only to increase their hatred, from a persuasion that whatever augmented his power must lessen theirs ^t. The plague being at Naples, the king and queen retired to Gaeta, where the latter carried on her intrigues with the pope, the duke of Milan, and even her competitor Lewis duke of Anjou; of all which though the king was not ignorant, he took no sort of notice; but, as soon as Naples was free from the plague, he marched back thither by land with his forces, having appointed a squadron of gallies to transport the queen, who, surmising on the sudden that those gallies might have orders to carry her to Spain, absolutely refused to go on board, and, with those who were about her, took shelter in the strong fortrefs of Capua; so that now the breach between the king and queen became public, though as yet there were no acts of hostility committed; on the contrary, both sides affected to give out, that their disputes were far from being irreconcilable; and that, upon a proper explanation, there was nothing more likely than that they should become good friends ^u.

- a At length the queen having entered into an alliance with the powers before-mentioned, and procured a promise from the pope, that he would cancel her adoption of the king of Arragon, and confirm that she was about to make of Lewis, duke of Anjou, she judged the shortest and surest method of bringing this new scheme to bear, was to remove the king of Arragon secretly; in order to which, she sent her high steward to invite him to a conference. Don Alonso, having intelligence of the design, caused that lord to be arrested, and set out immediately to go to the conference which the queen had proposed; but when he drew near the castle, they not only refused him admittance, but discharged such a flight of arrows as wounded his horse in several places, and killed some of the nobility who were about him; which so provoked him, that he attacked and besieged it, though to no purpose^w. By this means a civil war broke out in the very city of Naples, which lasted till the subjects of Don Alonso sent him such powerful assistance, that the queen was glad to escape, and leave him in possession of the capital; where he did not however remain long; but leaving his brother Don Pedro, who came with these succours, his viceroy, he embarked on board his fleet, in order to return to his hereditary dominions, and, in his passage, landed his troops, and made himself master of Marseilles; which tho' he suffered to be pillaged by his soldiers, yet he placed guards upon the churches, to protect the ladies who had taken refuge in them; and when, in return, they would have made him a valuable present out of the jewels which they had saved, he refused it, saying, that he revenged the injuries he had received as a prince, and did not come thither to plunder^x. It is necessary to remark, that at this time the city of Mar-
- b seilles was in possession of the house of Anjou.

ONE of the principal reasons of the king of Arragon's returning home was, to procure the liberty of his brother the Infant Don Henry, whom Don Juan of Castile had very justly imprisoned for the disturbances he had created in that kingdom, and of which, in speaking of the reign of that prince, we have given a large account. While this affair was depending, the Infant Don Juan of Arragon became king of Navarre by the death of Charles the Noble, and, by his interposition, prevented a war from breaking out between the crowns of Castile and Arragon, and the liberty of his brother Don Henry. But, notwithstanding this, jealousies between these two monarchs continued, and even increased; insomuch that, Don Alonso of Arragon apprehending that some advantage might be taken of the count de Urgel's remaining a prisoner in Castile, he caused him to be taken from thence by force, and carried to the castle of Xativa^y. Upon the death of Benedict the thirteenth, who, some writers say, was poisoned, the king of Arragon protected Giles Munoz, who had assumed the title of pope in opposition to Martin the fifth, whom he considered as his determined enemy; for which this last-mentioned pope caused him to be cited to Rome, with an intent to form a process against him; but it being the interest of neither to come to extremities, matters were at length compromised between them, and the king promised to use his endeavours with the pretended pope to lay aside that title, which he afterwards did^z. The misunderstandings with Castile still continuing, the last-mentioned monarch entered into intrigues with some powerful subjects, who were discontented with the king Don Alonso, and amongst these was Don Alonso de Arguillo, archbishop of Saragossa; but the conspiracy being discovered, most of them were arrested; however, only one suffered, who was beheaded; and this prelate, concerning whom there are many different reports, was never seen afterwards. Ferreras is very angry with a certain successor of his, for insinuating that it was not barely treason, but a treason of a kind not to be divulged, which induced the king to treat the archbishop with so much severity. But if there had been nothing in this story, it is not easy to conceive the death of the primate of Arragon should not have drawn upon the king greater censure^a.

- f THE affairs of Don Alonso in Italy had declined from the time he left that country; and his brother the Infant Don Pedro came in person to acquaint him how little hopes there were of retrieving them; which however did not hinder the king from sending such succours as he was able to those who still adhered to his interest^b. At last, when things were almost grown desperate, and the duke of Anjou was become master of the best part of the kingdom of Naples, Don Alonso was surprised by an application from queen Joan and her high steward, who, on the part of the queen, represented to him, that she was very desirous of seeing him at Naples; and from the high steward, that he had a corps of six thousand horse and foot ready to join him as soon as his fleet should appear. The king sent a minister of his own to Rome, to learn the pope's disposition; to whom Martin the fifth very frankly declared, that he would give the king all the assistance in his power; upon which Don Alonso began to think in earnest of another expedition; for undertaking which he made vast preparations in the kingdom of Valentia. While he was thus employed, the pope died ^c, which gave him great uneasiness, but did not however intirely defeat his scheme, though he thought it prudent to give out that his armament was intended against the king of Tunis. When things were in proper order, the king appointed his consort regent of Catalonia, and gave his brother the king of Navarre the like authority in the kingdoms of Arragon and Valentia ^d. The reader perhaps will not be displeased if we inform him, that, exclusive of the reasons assigned in history, an author ^e who may be depended upon acquaints us with the private but principal motive which induced this monarch to spend the remainder of his days in perpetual action and fatigue. He was one of the most graceful, as well as one of the most accomplished princes in Europe; and his queen Donna Maria of Castile was so jealous of him, that he found it impossible to live in peace. It is true that this was not without reason, since by one of the ladies of her court he had a son Don Ferdinand; which provoked the queen to such a degree, that she put the lady to death; and this affected Don Alonso so much, that he resolved upon this method of dissipating his cares ^f.

He carries it into execution, and at length resolves upon conquering Naples.

THE king's fleet consisted of nine sail of ships of war, twenty-six gallies, and a great number of transports. His first exploit was attacking the island of Gerbes, upon the coast of Africa, where, on the first of September, he gained a decisive victory by land over the troops of the king of Tunis, took his tent with great riches therein, and twenty-five pieces of artillery, and, having reduced the island, and left a garrison there, proceeded to Sicily ^g. There he received an application from pope Eugenius the fourth, who was desirous that he should enter into a league with the Venetians and the Florentines; which he offered to do, provided he would grant him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, to which however the pontif would not consent ^h. However, in the winter he made a new treaty with the queen of Naples, who promised to revoke all she had done in favour of the duke of Anjou, and to declare him her successor ⁱ. The next year passed intirely in negotiations, as did also part of the following, during which Lewis duke of Anjou died; and not long after the queen of Naples, notwithstanding all her treaties and all her professions, called his brother Rene to the succession, though he was at that time prisoner to the duke of Burgundy; however, he sent his consort Isabella, duchess of Anjou, to Naples, who, by the assistance of the pope, was received and treated as queen ^k. In the mean time the queen of Arragon, who had sent the Infants Don Pedro and Don Henry to prevail on the king to return into his own dominions, but without effect, at length engaged Don Juan, king of Navarre, to make a voyage to Sicily for the same purpose, not doubting that, upon his representations, the king his brother would return, and ^l, from his own observations, he induced to remain.

Involves himself in a war with the duke of Milan and the republic of Genoa, in which he is taken prisoner.

HE found Don Alonso absolutely bent upon attempting once more the conquest of Naples, and, with a fleet and army ready for that purpose, the king of Navarre and the Infant Don Henry embarked with him; but the Infant Don Pedro was left to command in Sicily. The duke of Sessa, and some others of the king's party, made themselves masters of Capua, to which city the king and his brothers repaired; and, having held a council of war there with all the Neapolitan grandees in his interest, the siege of Gaeta was resolved on; and thither accordingly the king sailed with his fleet, with which he blocked up the place by sea ^m. Two brave men, Otho Zopo and Francisco Spinola, commanded in Gaeta for the duke of Milan and the republic of Genoa, who found themselves under the necessity of turning out women, children, and other useless mouths, from within the place; whom the generals of the king of Arragon advised him to turn back, as a certain means of taking Gaeta quickly; however, Don Alonso received, relieved, and dismissed them, with this memorable expression, that he had much rather lose any city in his dominions than the reputation of humanity ⁿ. The Genoese sent a squadron of twelve men of war and three gallies, commanded by Blaise Acereto, chancellor of the republic, exceedingly well manned and provided, to relieve the place. The king sent two gallies to bring him intelligence; and, as soon as he knew their strength, he sailed with fourteen ships of war and eleven gallies to meet and fight them. In three days he distinguished the Genoese fleet, and on Friday the fifth of August he engaged them. The chancellor Acereto brought only nine ships and three gallies into the line, giving orders to three of his stoutest ships to fall in upon any critical juncture, where they saw it necessary ^o. The Genoese, being better seamen, and their ships in all respects better furnished, had the advantage, and the king's ship was particularly very roughly handled; however, he would have made a tolerable retreat, if the three great men of war had not unexpectedly borne down, and in a few minutes

- a distressed him to such a degree, that the ship was sinking; upon which, to save those who were with him, he caused his flag to be struck to the duke of Milan. The vessels that were near him followed his example, and, except a single ship, the whole fleet was taken^p. This action lasted ten hours: there were about six hundred slain on the side of the king of Arragon, and about as many thousand taken prisoners, amongst whom were the kings of Arragon and Navarre, the infant Don Henry of Arragon, Don Juan de Soto Major, grand master of the order of Alcantara, Don Diego Gomez de Sandoval, count de Castro, with his two sons Diego and Ferdinand, Don Ruy Diaz de Mendoza, surnamed the Bald, and the sons of Don Ruy Lopez de Avalos, with a multitude of other persons of distinction, Arragonese, Valentians, and Catalonians; the prince of Tarento, duke of Sessa, the count de Campo Baso, and many others of the prime nobility of Naples^q. The victory itself became in some measure a burden to those who gained it; insomuch that the chancellor Blaise Acereto, apprehensive of the consequences that might attend keeping such a number of prisoners on board the fleet, under colour of generosity let four thousand private men on shore the very next night, amongst whom many gentlemen escaped^r.

- UPON the news of this victory the siege of Gaeta was raised; but the chancellor of Genoa would not carry the fleet into that port, from an apprehension that the command would be immediately taken from him by Francis Spinola; he sailed therefore to the island of Ichia, and demanded of the king Don Alonso, that he should order the fortress and island to be put into his hands; but he answered, that he would not give a fort to prevent his throwing him into the sea; upon which the Genoese admiral returned to Savona, which at that time belonged to the duke of Milan, and there landed the two kings, and other persons of distinction; from thence they were carried to Porto Venere, where they were met by Nicholas Picinino, one of the duke's principal generals, who, with an escort of six hundred horse, conducted them to Milan, into which city the king of Arragon and the rest of the great persons who were the companions of his misfortunes, made their public entry on the fifteenth of September: and thus ended the triumphs of the duke and the Genoese^s.

- GREAT trials and sudden changes of fortune are the true tests of abilities. The fifth of August was not the most unfortunate, the fifteenth of September was the most happy, of this monarch's life. The duke of Milan, from a point of generosity worthy of so great a prince, treated the king of Arragon with equal magnificence and respect; but what at first was mere complaisance and generosity, became very quickly something more. The very ceremonies of his reception were hardly over, when the king of Arragon told the duke, that he was amazed they should be enemies, whose tempers and whose interests were the same: he said, that, in preferring the neighbourhood of the duke of Anjou to that of a king of Arragon, he acted wisely, and like a politician, but that he ought to consider, that, if a French prince became once king of Naples, it would be a conquest made for France, who would not fail to pour in troops through Piedmont and the state of Genoa; by which they would soon have Lombardy at their mercy, and consequently he, who was now the protector of the duke of Anjou, would be in great danger of becoming the king of Naples's vassal. The duke was struck with this observation very much, more especially when the king added, that these were always the sentiments of John Gallias his father, which the chief counsellors of the duke confirmed. The consequence of this was, that within a few weeks the duke of Milan changed sides, and entered into a treaty offensive and defensive with the king of Arragon, against all the princes in the world, the pope not excepted; with which news the king of Navarre was sent away into Spain, and the king of Arragon, his brother the infant, and the Italian princes, after receiving rich presents and the highest honours, were dismissed without ransom^t; which happy turn in his affairs the king knew so well how to second by his instructions to his generals, that, upon Christmas-day in the same year, the infant Don Pedro became master of Gaeta, and thereby opened a passage to the conquest of the whole kingdom of Naples^u. The republic of Genoa could not at all relish this signal act of generosity, but took advantage from thence to revolt from the duke of Milan, and to declare war both against him and his new ally^v.

THE news of the king's captivity, and that of his brother the king of Navarre, made a great noise in Spain, more especially as the affairs of Arragon were not at that time in the best condition, the disputes with Castile remaining yet unsettled. The queen Donna Maria acted upon this occasion with a prudence so much the more laudable, as it was scarce to have been expected from her sex, and under so much affliction. She dispatched a herald at arms immediately with letters to the king her husband, and assembled as soon as possible the states of Arragon at Saragossa; upon which occasion they shewed the true spirit of a free people; for they advised her to call a general assembly of the states of Arragon, Valentia, Catalonia, and Majorca, in some convenient place, and took upon themselves to dispense with the usual formalities, alleging, that they were contrived only to guard against the royal prerogative, from which they had now nothing to fear^a. The queen fixed upon Monson; to which place the deputies resorted, and took all the steps necessary for the security of their respective kingdoms; after which the queen had an interview with her brother Don Juan of Castile, who, at her request, prolonged the truce^b. While the states were contriving how to procure the sum necessary for the king's ransom, the king of Navarre very unexpectedly arrived, and laid before them the surprising alteration of that monarch's circumstances, and his earnest desire that they would afford him such a supply as his exigencies required. The states at this time were at Alcaniz; but, upon receiving this information, they immediately separated, those of Valentia retiring to Morella, and those of Catalonia to Tortosa, that they might make their levies with the greater ease^c. As for the states of Arragon, they remained where they were; and, to give a good example, granted the king one hundred and twenty thousand florins; in Valentia they gave him one hundred thousand, and the like sum in Catalonia, where they ordered it to be laid out in fitting out a great fleet under the command of the count de Modica^d. Thus the king was in all respects a gainer by his defeat before Gaeta, and was himself amazed at the receiving of succours, which nothing could have procured but the surprize attending such a misfortune, happily improved by the application and address of the queen Donna Maria.

THIS part of the war in Italy has so close a connection with the affairs of Arragon, and it was so necessary to explain the reason of Don Alonso's continuing in that country, that we could not avoid entering into the particulars; but if the reader is inclined to pursue the history of this war farther, he will find it under the history of Naples, to which it properly belongs. Don Alonso being accounted from this time king of that country, the possession of which not without great difficulty he acquired by his arms; and though, being often pressed, he sometimes promised to return to his hereditary dominions, yet it never seems to have been his intention, and perhaps he was as little inclined to draw the queen thither, though he sometimes requested it, and particularly when he sent for his natural son Don Ferdinand, who, notwithstanding her severity to his mother, the queen caused to be educated with great care^e. As for the king of Navarre, and the infant Don Henry, they were wholly intent on promoting their interests in Castile, where they had the displeasure of hearing that the infant Don Pedro had lost his life before Naples; and, what added to their trouble, the duke of Anjou procured a great body of adventurers to make an irruption into Arragon, which however produced little^f. On the other hand, the success of Don Alonso alarmed the Italian princes so much, that a league was formed against him by the pope, the duke of Milan, the count of Sforza, the Venetians, Florentines, and Genoese; notwithstanding which, he became the very next year master of Naples, and broke that confederacy to pieces^g.

Becomes sole and absolute master of the kingdom of Naples, and is so acknowledged.

THE ensuing year was still more glorious for Don Alonso; the inhabitants of most of the provinces of which the kingdom of Naples was composed, being weary of the miseries of war, submitted themselves willingly to that prince, who, by the advice of some of his best friends, resolved to call together the states general of the whole kingdom, which he did at Beneventum, from whence, at their own request, they were transferred to the capital city of Naples, into which the king made a public entry, very little inferior to that of a Roman triumph; the prelates and clergy preceding his chariot, before which was led a white horse richly caparisoned, the chariot being drawn by four horses of the same colour, being open, and very richly gilt, in which was the king alone, followed by all the princes and nobility of the kingdom on foot^h. What added a lustre to the ceremony was, the unaffected modesty of the king, who did not wear either diadem or crown, but behaved towards every body with so much ease, and yet with so much dignity, that he was beloved in the same degree he was admired. In this assembly of the states, his son Don Ferdinand, whom he had created duke of Calabria, was acknowledged successor to the crown; and the king created marquisses and counts, though their number was considerable enough beforeⁱ. He was now reconciled to the duke of Milan, by whose interposition he concluded a peace with pope Eugenius, and who negotiated a marriage for his natural daughter Donna Maria with Lionel d'Este, duke of Ferrara^j. This disoblged Francis Picinini, the son of Nicholas, who had rendered the king great services during the war, and who had flattered himself with the hopes of marrying the princess by way of reward, and who, finding himself disappointed, quitted a his dominions in twenty-four hours^b. Towards the end of the year, two very considerable officers in his service, Broylo de Mure, and Pietro Brunoro, formed a project of seizing his person, in hopes of being gratified by count Sforza; but the plot being discovered when it was almost ripe for execution, the king seized and sent them into Arragon, where they remained for many years prisoners in the castle of Xativa. The duke of Milan, whose son-in-law count Sforza was, and who had hitherto lived upon bad terms with him, now thought fit to grant him his protection, and pressed the king to desist from making warⁱ.

THE continuance of his good fortune augmented, instead of extinguishing, the envy of his neighbours; but though it gave him some disturbance, the loss fell upon them, and the king carried his point. The pope was obliged to grant him the investiture of Naples, which he had so often refused. He likewise legitimated his son, which, though a point of complaisance in him, was however very convenient to the king, since it took away all doubt about the right of succession; for Naples being held as a fief of the see of Rome, the pope, by this act of favour, removed the single advantage that himself and his successors might have taken against him^k. About the same time this young prince was married to Isabella de Clermont, niece to the prince of Tarento; and, to crown his felicity, the Genoese, who had hated him so heartily, and from whom he had received so much hurt, were constrained to demand his protection^l. His subjects in Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, regretted his absence extremely, as they gave him frequently to understand, though at the same time they persisted steadily in their duty, of which they gave him many substantial marks. His brother Don Juan, king of Navarre, though not a little opinionated, often demanded his advice, which he did not often follow; for Don Alonso always recommended a good understanding with the king of Castile, to whom he sent several embassies; and though he could not prevent his brother's taking contrary measures, yet he hindered in a great measure the bad consequences that might have attended them, and enabled the queen Donna Maria to remain always on good terms with her brother. He excited a spirit in the states of Arragon, that enabled him to controul Don Juan of Navarre in those violent measures he took in regard to his son the prince of Viana, and in his intrigues with the malecontents of Castile, with which crown a solid peace was on the point of being concluded, when the king Don Juan of Castile died. This was actually concluded with his successor Don Henry upon the very terms that Alonso desired^m, and, during his life, punctually kept on both sides.

d As the flower, so the decline, of his age was spent in the hurry of negotiations, political intrigues, and the din of arms; neither were they without some disagreeable scenes and uneasy apprehensions. His nephew Don Carlos, prince of Viana, after having sustained a war against his father Don Juan, and suffered a tedious imprisonment, was at length compelled to retire to Naples, in hopes of enjoying some repose under the shadow of his protection. Don Alonso received him with a generosity worthy of so great a prince, and the tender affection that might be expected from so near a relationⁿ. His cousin the duke of Calabria, either in imitation of his father, or from a principle of compassion, shewed him all the respect and kindness imaginable: so that he enjoyed, while he remained with them, all the happiness that it was in their power to bestow, and, through their mediation, things were compromised to his satisfaction with the king his father^o; but afterwards the flame burst out with greater violence than ever, the people of Navarre having proclaimed him king, by which the civil war was renewed; which so provoked the king Don Juan, that he disinherited him and one of his sisters^p.

e Don Alonso, having prevailed on his nephew to leave all things to his decision, dispatched one of his ministers to the king Don Juan, who came at the critical conjuncture when things were on the point of being determined by a battle; but he executed his commission with such firmness and dexterity, that the king of Navarre consented to admit his brother's mediation, to declare all his proceedings against his son null and void, and to leave the terms of pacification to be settled as that monarch should think fit^q. At this time, though he had conquered many difficulties, and had united his old antagonist Francis Sforza, now duke of Milan, to his interests, by the marriage of his grandson to the duke's daughter, and his grand-daughter to the duke's son, yet fresh sources of trouble broke out. Pope Calixtus II. though born his subject, was not well-affected to him, and the Neapolitans in general disliked the duke of Calabria, who was of a cloudy and reserved disposition, and had nothing of that easy address and natural affability which had contributed more to his father's success than either his courage or his abilities; in which, however, few princes were his equals. But what troubled Don Alonso most was the discovery that some of the principal nobility of his kingdom had tampered with his nephew Don Carlos, who had not given so clear and direct an answer as the obligations he was under both to the father and son required. This affected the king so much, that he fell into a fever; and Don Carlos, suspecting the cause, very prudently withdrew into Sicily, while the king, restless and uneasy, caused himself to be carried from one castle in Naples to another, and at length expired on the 22d day of June, 1468, in the 43d year of his reign over Arragon, and the countries dependent upon that crown.

The character of Don Alonso. THE character of Don Alonso V. of Arragon, and the first of Naples, having long ago exercised, as a certain author^r reports, the pens of more than threescore eminent historians, stands not at all in need of any thing we can say; and yet there are certain circumstances that, for the satisfaction of our readers, ought not to be omitted. He was, beyond all doubt, the greatest prince that ever sat upon the throne of Arragon; a very able statesman, and one who did his business directly; disdaining, as became him, whatever looked like cunning; a gallant soldier, and a great captain, perfectly skilled in the art of war, which he managed openly, and without cruelty^s; learned himself, and the greatest patron of learning that age produced. He gave for his device a book opened; and it was his common saying, that an unlettered prince was but a crowned ass. He had, with many and great virtues, some vices, which, however, regarded rather his private than his public life. The greatest of his failings was his love of women, which was fatal to Donna Margarita de Hajar, the mother of Don Ferdinand, and who was big with child by him, when she became the victim of his queen's jealousy^t. He had, besides, a Neapolitan mistress, who made much more noise in the world, and whom some say he was inclined to marry. Her name was Lucretia Alania, and his fondness for her in a very advanced period of life sullied his reputation very much^u. He died, however, with great marks of penitence, declaring, by his last testament, his brother Don Juan, king of Navarre, heir to the crowns of Arragon, Valentia, Majorca, Sardinia, and Sicily, and the principality of Catalonia, with all their dependencies^v. The kingdom of Naples, acquired by his arms, and to which he had a personal, not an hereditary right, he bestowed on Don Ferdinand duke of Calabria. Besides this natural son, he left behind him two daughters, Donna Maria marchioness of Ferrara, and Donna Leonora princess of Rossano, and duchess of Sessa. His death falling out as it did, saved the republic of Genoa, which was on the very point of being overwhelmed by his arms^x, and furnished new matter for intrigues to all the refined politicians in Italy.

Don Juan II. succeeds to the hereditary dominions, and the queen dowager dies soon after. As soon as the news of the king's death reached Arragon, Don Juan II. was acknowledged and proclaimed king at Saragossa on the 25th of July^y. His first care was to appoint his daughter, the countess of Foix, vice-queen of Navarre, and to send Don Lope Ximenes de Urrea, with the title of viceroy, into Sicily, where he was apprehensive that his son, the prince of Viana, would have created some disturbances; but Don Carlos removed that fear by his letters, in which he declared he was willing to reside in any part of his father's dominions that he should assign him; which gave him great satisfaction, tho' he could not presently resolve where to place him^z. On the fourth of September, the same year, died at Valencia Donna Maria, queen dowager of Arragon^a. In the succeeding month of November, the king went to Catalonia, where he confirmed the privileges of the inhabitants; and the next spring he did the same at Valencia^b. The prince Don Carlos, by his command, quitted Sicily, and came to Majorca. During his residence there, a treaty was concluded between him and his father, by which the prince gave up all that was held by his partisans in Navarre, and, on the other hand, he was permitted to live in any part of his father's dominions, excepting that kingdom and in Sicily; in consequence of which also he was restored to his father's favour, such as had been imprisoned on his account were set at liberty, her appenage restored to his sister Donna Blanca, and the revenues of his principality of Viana secured to him^c. This treaty thus concluded, the prince quitted Majorca, and went to Barcelona, where he made the deepest submission possible to the king his father, and to the queen his mother-in-law Donna Juana, daughter to the Amirante of Castile; and thus, in appearance, all past disputes were buried in oblivion; but as children often fall out with their parents, so it seldom falls out that these differences are thoroughly healed^d. The king held the states of Arragon at Fraga, where it was expected that he should have caused the prince Don Carlos to be acknowledged for his successor: as he did not, it occasioned some murmurs; to silence which, he united the kingdoms of Sicily and Sardinia for ever to the crown of Arragon^e. He went from thence to Lerida, where he held the states of Catalonia, where, though he managed things with great dexterity, yet he could not hinder the Catalans from proposing that the infant Don Carlos should be acknowledged for his successor; but he found means a to elude that proposition after it was made, and at length dissolved them at the assembly, without giving them any definitive answer. It was not long, however, before this troublesome affair created fresh confusion, which issued at length in a very melancholy catastrophe, which it is necessary for us to relate, and which we shall endeavour to do as clearly and succinctly as possible, though there are few points in the Spanish history, about which authors are more divided in their opinions, or indeed with a greater shew of reason on both sides ^f.

THE king of Portugal had proposed to Don Juan of Arragon a match between the prince Quarrel be- of Viana and the infanta Catalina, or Catherine, of Portugal, with which the king seemed to ^{between that} be pleased, and to which the prince shewed no dislike. But the ambassadors sent by Don ^{king and his} Henry of Castile to the count of Arragon found means to acquaint the prince, in their master's ^{son the prince}
b name, that he should not trouble himself about the hard usage he met with, since their of Viana.
master was desirous he should marry the infanta Donna Isabella, his sister; in consideration of which marriage, he would maintain his rights, and set him upon the throne by force. The prince, who saw but too much reason to doubt of his father's intentions towards him, did not reject this proposition, but gave a general answer, which the Castilian ambassadors might interpret as they pleased ^g. It was not long before the admiral of Castile obtained intelligence of this treaty, and gave notice of it to the queen of Arragon, who laboured to persuade the king that this was little better than a contrivance to dethrone him. When her arguments failed of persuading, she had recourse to tears; and the old king, to quiet her, promised to arrest his son, and keep him in prison. To seize him at Barcelona was impos-
c sible; he sent for him therefore to Lerida; and though the prince was told what his father's intentions were, yet nothing could prevent his going; notwithstanding which the king caused him to be seized in his presence, and to be afterwards transferred from prison to prison, as if ^{His imprison-}
had conspired against his life ^h. The states of Arragon remonstrated upon this; the states of Catalonia did more; they demanded the prince's liberty, and that he should be declared heir apparent; and they raised a numerous army, and fitted out a great fleet to procure it ⁱ. The king Don Juan armed on his side; but the queen grew afraid, desired her husband to set the prince at liberty, and to comply with their demands; to which he consented, and she had the credit of it. The states of Catalonia thanked her for it by their deputies; but
d they would not suffer her to come with the prince to Barcelona, and the king found himself obliged to leave the whole principality of Catalonia in his hands ^k; but, as if he intended to shew how much this was against his will, he entered into a treaty with the king of Castile, whom he easily engaged to abandon and betray his son, and committed to prison a gentleman whom he had sent to execute a commission of some importance to them both; which behaviour, as it manifested an irreconcilable aversion, affected the prince to such a degree, that he fell into a slow fever, of which he died at Barcelona, on Wednesday, September the 23d 1461, in the 41st year of his age.

THIS prince was highly remarkable for his great qualities and his extensive learning, and still more for his misfortunes. He was certainly intitled to the crown of Navarre, of which ^{Some particu-}
e his mother was the heiress. His courage, his modesty, and his steady adherence to his ^{lars of this} friends, made him generally beloved. He was a great master of antient literature, as appears ^{young prince's} from his writing a commentary on the Ethics of Aristotle. He composed likewise a history ^{life and cha-} of Navarre. He was a great admirer of poetry, and delighted principally in the conver- ^{acter.}
sation of men of letters. He gave for his device two mastiffs snarling over a bone; and sometimes told his friends that bone was the kingdom of Navarre, which sometimes felt the teeth of Castile and sometimes those of France. On his death-bed he desired his father's pardon, and, by his testament, bequeathed the kingdom of Navarre to his sister Donna Blanca. His favourites would have persuaded him to have married his mistress Donna Brianda Vaca; but he refused it, probably out of respect to his sister. He left by that lady f two sons, Don Philip count of Beaufort, Don Juan Alonso, and a daughter Donna Ines, or Anne of Navarre ^m. It was generally believed that he was poisoned; and that the poison was given him by a physician at the instance of the queen his mother-in-law, while he was confined ⁿ. He was so intirely beloved by the people of Barcelona, that they believed miracles were wrought at his tomb. Their resentment of his ill usage ran so high, that they were strongly inclined to set up for a free state; and to this they were not a little encouraged by Lewis XI. of France. We will end this subject by observing, that the infanta Donna Catalina of Portugal entered into the convent of Santa Clara at Lisbon as soon as she heard of the prince's death. A point of honour very common amongst princesses in those days, but intirely voluntary, and might be omitted without reproach ^o.

As the queen Donna Juana was a princess of infinite dexterity and address, she prevailed, notwithstanding these prejudices, on the states of Catalonia to acknowledge her son Don Ferdinand for the legal successor, and to take the oaths to him, considered in that light. The people, however, were intractable; insomuch that a general insurrection ensued, partly owing to the indiscretion of the queen, who encouraged the peasants in a certain district to throw off the yoke of their lords; which disgusted all the nobility, and the queen found herself obliged to retire with her son to Gironne, where she was soon after besieged by the rebels^p. In the mean time the king Don Juan, being in great want of money, entered into a treaty with Lewis XI. of France, to whom he mortgaged the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne for 200,000 crowns; and by the help of this money, and with the assistance of French troops, raised the siege^q. He not long after seized his daughter Donna Blanca, carried her by force over the Pyrenees, and put her into the hands of the count and countess of Foix, who, though they were her nearest relations, were her bitterest enemies. That unfortunate princess wrote to the king of Castile for assistance, to whom she bequeathed her right to the kingdom of Navarre. She was imprisoned for about two years in a castle in Bearn, and then poisoned^r. In the mean time the Catalans continued in arms, and, as we have already shewn, offered their principality to the king of Castile, proclaimed him at Barcelona, and procured succours from him several times, till he was prevailed upon to leave all disputes with the crown of Arragon to Lewis XI. of France, who declared these proceedings void^s. The Catalans then called in Don Pedro of Portugal, under whom they continued the war, though with no great success, the king gaining several advantages over them, and particularly a battle on the last of January, in which several persons of distinction were taken prisoners^t. The credit of this was given to the infant Don Ferdinand, though some writers say that he was no otherwise intitled to it than by being in rear of the army. This was followed by the loss of many places of importance; and, on the 29th of June, in the year following, the infant Don Pedro died, leaving his claim to the principality of Catalonia, which arose from his mother, descended from the count d'Urgel, to the infant Don Juan^u. This, however, had little effect; for, on the one hand, the king reduced Tortosa, and, on the other, the Catalans called in Rene duke of Anjou, and his son John duke of Lorraine, as being descended from a house that once set up a claim to the crown of Arragon.

Great actions and death of that princess, and what she is reported to have said on her death-bed.

THE duke of Anjou was then so far in years, that he was in a manner superannuated; but as ambition is the last inclination subdued by princes, so this application of the people of Catalonia revived him as it were from the grave; and though himself, like the rest of his family, had been hitherto unfortunate in all his pretensions, yet he exerted himself to the utmost in raising forces, which were embarked for Catalonia under the command of his son John duke of Lorraine^v. The king of Arragon, foreseeing that this affair would give him a great deal of trouble, solicited assistance from all quarters; and, though he was very old and infirm, put himself at the head of his armies, and shewed great spirit and experience in the conduct of the war; for the maintenance of which the people of Barcelona spent without reluctance that immense wealth which they had gained by their commerce^x. On the other hand, the queen was no less active; and though many princesses have, like her, entered into their husbands councils, yet there are few examples of their commanding an army as she did. What is still more extraordinary, she formed the project of embarking troops, in order to besiege Roses; which, however, she found it not easy to reduce: after which she made a tour into the county of Foix, where she regulated several points of importance in regard to the kingdom of Navarre. These fatigues, however, became at last too great for her constitution; so that, finding herself indisposed, she retired to Tarragona, where, after a long illness, she breathed her last on the 13th of February, in the year 1468^y. In her last moments, it is said, she exclaimed with great passion, My son, my son, Ferdinand, how dear has thy greatness cost me! Some authors pretend, that she acknowledged the death of the infant Don Carlos; and that when the king Don Juan was informed of it, he expressed the greatest horror and detestation of the fact imaginable^z. He was, not long after, in great danger of being taken prisoner by the duke of Lorraine, who took all his baggage, and afterwards formed the siege of Gironne^a. The king then went to Saragossa, where he held an assembly of the states, in which he declared his son Don Ferdinand king of Sicily, and his coadjutor in the throne of Arragon. The same year Don Juan, who had been some years almost blind by cataracts on both eyes, was couched by a Jew, and recovered his sight^b.

THERE wanted not many who thought the death of the queen would be very detrimental to the king's affairs; but it proved quite otherwise; for the people had been accustomed to attribute most of the violences in his reign to the ascendancy she had over him; and it a quickly appeared that the people are not always mistaken in their sentiments. The king ^{persist obstinately in their rebellion.} assembled a good army for the relief of Gironne, before which the duke of Lorrain lay with an army of 15,000 men; but when the troops of Arragon drew near the place, they found it had already surrendered: upon this the king quitted the command of the army, and retired with a small body of troops, in order to enjoy the pleasure of hunting^c. Don Ferdinand king of Sicily, finding himself at the head of an army, was prevailed upon by some of his favourites to attempt surprising the duke of Lorrain, who being a brave and a better soldier than himself, beat him thoroughly, and would have made a great use of this victory, if the old king had not advanced to Urgel, and thereby hindered his son's troops from flying farther^d. When both armies were gone into winter-quarters, the count de Foix made an

b irruption into Navarre, against whom Don Juan was obliged to march; but matters were quickly compromised. What gave him more trouble than all these, was his extreme want of money, his treasury being in a manner exhausted by the presents and subsidies which were requisite for promoting his son's marriage with the infanta Donna Isabella. He found means, A. D. 1469. however, to fit out a good fleet, in order to intercept the enemy's succours; and, by the sale of some places to the prelates and clergy, he was in some measure delivered from his distress^e. His subjects in Sicily, and his nephew Don Ferdinand sent him also assistance.

ABOUT the middle of May in the next year the king assembled the states of Catalonia at Monson, where things passed rather better than he expected; however, nothing decisive happened in the campaign; and, in September, when he came to hold the states of Arragon at c Saragossa, they granted him all that he demanded; so that he found himself in a condition ^{Are defeated in a general action by Don Juan, with a considerable loss.} to put a good army on foot against the ensuing spring^f. On the 16th of December the duke of Lorrain died at Barcelona; and, in his last moments, advised the Catalans to make their peace with the king Don Juan; which, however, they refused to do, and employed a considerable sum of money in hiring Italian and French troops for their own defence^g. Nicholas, the eldest son of the duke of Lorrain, little regarding his father's admonition, assumed the title of king of Arragon, notwithstanding that the major part of the inhabitants of Barcelona were inclined to submit to the French^h. The king Don Juan reduced Gironne, and several other places; but ran a very great risk at the siege of Peralada, where the count of Campo Baso, at the head of a corps of mercenaries, broke into his camp in the night, and forced the old
d king to save his life by flying on horseback, without any thing on but his shirt: he returned, however, the next day to the siege, and carried the placeⁱ. The inhabitants of Perpignan also cut the throats of the French garrison in the night, and opened their gates to the king's troops^k.
The rebellion was now in a manner confined within the walls of Barcelona, and the king gave orders to his natural son Don Alonso of Arragon, and the count of Prades, to block up that city, in hopes it would produce a treaty; but the rebels, grown desperate, and provoked by the scarcity of provisions, ordered their generals, Don Denis of Portugal, and James Galeot, to march out and attack the king's forces^l. This engagement happened on the fifth of November, and at the very beginning the Catalans gave way; however, about 4000 remaining firm, Don Alonso and the count de Prades surrounded and cut them and their two e generals to pieces; and soon after, the count de Prades defeated the count de Campo Baso, and his Italians. In all probability the king had put an end to the war, if he had not been obliged to attend to the affairs of Navarre, and to those of his son Don Ferdinand, whose marriage with Donna Isabella required continual supplies of money^m, since his business could no otherwise advance in a corrupt court.

IN the ensuing spring Don Ferdinand came to make a his father a visit, and found him ^{Barcelona,} employed in the siege of Barcelona, which was carried on both by land and sea. The pope's ^{after a most gallant defence, but prescribes its own terms.} legate cardinal Borgia came thither also, and had an audience of the kingⁿ. In the mean time Lewis the eleventh of France, and the duke of Lorrain, made various efforts in order to raise the siege of Barcelona, but without effect. At length things were brought to such an f extremity that the besieged had nothing to hope, when the king offered to receive them all to his mercy, to confirm their privileges, to bury in eternal oblivion all that was past, and not to punish them either in person or in property; which terms they rejected, chiefly by the influence of the count de Pailbars, whom he had pardoned the year before^o. The army on the other hand was very earnest in being led on to the assault, in hopes of having the plunder of the place. The king, upon this, wrote a letter to the citizens, dated the 6th of October, in terms as tender and affectionate as if they had been his children, bewailing the miseries they had brought on themselves, and concluding with a protestation, that they, and not he, must be answerable for future events. Upon this, at the persuasion of a priest, who had the reputation of sanctity, they sent their deputies to the king, and made a capitulation^a on the 17th of the same month; in which the king took all upon himself, acknowledged they took arms upon just motives, and pardoned every body, the count de Pailbars excepted, who, however, was suffered to escape^p. On the 22d, the king made his public entry into the city, and confirmed their privileges^q. The same year a marriage was concluded between Don Frederick, the second son of Don Ferdinand king of Naples, and the infanta Donna Joanna of Arragon^r.

The inhabitants of Perpignan in the utmost terror of being besieged by the French.

THE inhabitants of Perpignan and Elne having massacred the French garrisons, in order to put themselves again under the obedience of the king of Arragon, began to be very apprehensive of the vengeance of Lewis XI. who was assembling a great army, on purpose to chastise them. The king came in person to direct the new fortifications of Perpignan, and brought with him his son Don Alonso of Arragon, the counts of Cardona and Prades, and several other officers of distinction, who omitted nothing that could be devised for the security of the place^s. When the strength of the enemy was thoroughly known, they intreated the king to retire; but Don Juan having observed consternation in the countenances of the inhabitants, called a general assembly in the great church, where he told them, that he knew very well the character of the prince they had offended, and the danger to which they were exposed; that they could be only safe by a vigorous defence; and, to encourage them to this, laying his hand suddenly on the gospels, he swore he would remain with them, and undergo all the fatigues of the siege^t. The place was presently invested by a numerous army, under the command of Philip count of Bresse. The Catalans no sooner received advice of this, than, forgetting their former disposition, they took arms every-where throughout the principality, and sent deputies to desire Don Ferdinand king of Sicily to come and put himself at their head. That prince, ever famous for his prudence, would have excused himself from the perplexed state of his own affairs; but Donna Isabella, and the archbishop of Toledo, told him, that his duty required him to forget all things but the danger of his father and his king. He set out therefore immediately for Barcelona, where he found an army of 25,000 men in complete order, and ready to march.

Are gloriously defended in two sieges by the old king, who forces the enemy to raise them both.

THE king Don Juan defended Perpignan with a steadiness that exceedingly perplexed the French, and notwithstanding a circumstance very extraordinary, which was that the citadel was yet in their hands. Their army was at first near forty thousand men; but by Midsummer, when Don Ferdinand passed the Pyrenees, they thought themselves too weak to continue the siege, and therefore set fire to their camp and retired^u. The old king marched out with his garrison to meet and embrace his son, who in a few days followed the French with his army, but found them so well intrenched, that he did not think fit to attack them. Upon their motion a truce was concluded for a time; upon which Don Ferdinand returned with his troops to Barcelona, where he dismissed the greatest part of them^v. On the other hand, Lewis XI. after bestowing the bitterest reproaches upon his generals, cancelled the truce, and having reinforced the army with 10,000 men, sent them back to see if they could take Perpignan, now there was no army to relieve it. The king Don Juan was still there, when the place was a second time invested; and, finding himself pushed hard, he caused a report to be spread, that the great cities behind the French army had revolted, and were marching with great force to attack them in their trenches; upon which they raised the siege a second time, and he handled their rear-guard so roughly, that there was no bringing them to look at Perpignan any more^w. On this Lewis XI. thought fit to send a minister to negotiate a peace, which, both parties being heartily weary of the war, was very speedily concluded, upon easy and reasonable terms^x. The king Don Juan, returning through Catalonia, was received with the loudest acclamations, and those who had been the most forward in the rebellion were not the most backward in paying their court to the victorious monarch, who received them with great courtesy and kindness, and exhorted them to make use of the peace to restore their country to its former flourishing condition^y.

The French, by an insidious treaty, gain what they could not gain by a fair war.

BUT he was quickly convinced that this treaty, which had been negotiated with so much seeming candour, required many improvements and explanations, in order to render it a safe and solid peace. He sent therefore two persons of distinction to Paris, with full powers to adjust every thing, and to set the most difficult points in a full and clear light. These ministers found so many obstacles on the road, that it was a long time before they got to Paris, and when they came there, they found the king absent. They would have followed him, but those intrusted with the administration caused them to be arrested^z. This method of acting answered two ends; it gave the French an opportunity of destroying all the

- a harvest in the neighbourhood of Perpignan, in hopes of causing a scarcity there, when they entered it, as they did with a powerful army; and, on the other hand, it kept the old king of Arragon in the dark, so that he had no kind of certainty whether peace or war was to be expected^c. He went, however, to Barcelona, where he held an assembly of the states, who granted him all he could desire, or rather all they were able^d. He sent also for his son Don Ferdinand, and though his affairs were much embarrassed in Castile, yet, by the advice of Doña Isabella, he set out for Arragon, and travelled with great dispatch; but, on his arrival at Saragossa, he found things in much confusion, the whole country being rent with faction^e. He obtained, however, what forces he could, and, having assembled the states, desired them to enable the viceroy and the chief justice to put the laws in execution, and to restore the public tranquility, giving them to understand, that where there was no law there could be no liberty. In the mean time, the old king, having received a supply of provisions from Naples, had re-victualled Perpignan, and, with the assistance of the troops his son brought him, had a tolerable army in the field^f. Don Ferdinand returned again in a little time to Saragossa, where there was one Ximenes Gordo, who had gained such an ascendancy in the city that nothing could be done without him, whose relations and creatures were possessed of all the good employments, and who, notwithstanding, were guilty of the most outrageous acts of oppression. Don Ferdinand inquired why these mischiefs were not redressed, and was told that Gordo's exorbitant power was too strong for the laws. Upon this he sent for him to the palace, and conducted him into a private apartment, where there were some of his guards, a hangman, and a priest, in whose hands he left him; and, as soon as he was informed that he was dead, he ordered the body to be publicly exposed, and then went to the states, and told them that it was their business to do the rest: upon which they seized his creatures, convicted and executed them by due course of law. Having thus restored the public peace, he returned to Castile^g. The French, having a superior power in Roussillon, A. D. 1474. made themselves masters of Elne, and ravaged best part of the country without measure or mercy, the circumstances of Don Juan being such as put it out of his power to oppose them.

- THE king Don Henry of Castile being dead, and that country in the utmost confusion, Lewis XI. took the opportunity of pouring in multitudes of troops upon Roussillon; so that at length his generals were in a condition to besiege Perpignan for the third time^h. The old king Don Juan, though laden with cares and infirmities, neglected nothing that could be done for the relief of that place, and would certainly have relieved it, if he had either been possessed of money himself, or if his subjects had been wealthy enough to supply him. But, for want of this, the French prevailed. The inhabitants, after eating cats, dogs, and all kind of vermin, surrendered, upon tolerable terms, about the middle of March; and, having stipulated a liberty of quitting the place, most of them retired into *Catalonia*ⁱ. After this conquest, Lewis thought fit to propose a truce for six months, which Don Juan was forced to accept, that he might have some time to provide against the next campaign. As soon as the truce was ended, the French renewed their hostilities, and pushed their conquests to the very frontiers of Catalonia^k. At the same time that they made war on Arragon, the French attacked the dominions of Castile likewise, and made two irruptions into Biscay, but with little effect. However, the last obliged Don Ferdinand to make a tour into that province, which gave him an opportunity of having an interview with his father, whose affairs were never in a worse situation than at this juncture^l. Arragon was so torn by factions, and overrun by banditti, that all the states could do to restore quiet was to authorize holy confederacies, that is, voluntary associations of private men taking arms for the public service. In Valentia the like mischiefs prevailed, and the plague ravaged Barcelona, and a great part of Catalonia^m. The French heightened all these mischiefs by continuing the war, while the Catalans found it impossible to assemble an army, till necessity obliged them to lay their hands upon the treasure belonging to the city of Barcelona, with which the inhabitants were very little pleased; but as there was no remedy, they were obliged to submit, more especially as it was not done without the king's orders.

AMONGST the rest of those potent persons, who made no scruple of increasing the calamities, and adding to the confusion in which affairs then were, Don Jayme of Arragon was one of the most troublesome. Having assembled a band of lawless persons, by their assistance he took possession of the duchy of Villa-Hermosa, and fortified several places for their own security. Upon this the king dispatched his orders to the viceroy of Valentia to set up the royal standard, and to make a fair trial whether the people of that kingdom would not enable him to redress these disorders, and to bring this powerful criminal to justice. The ^a viceroy, in obedience to the king's orders, assembled what forces he was able, besieged the fortresses into which Don Jayme had retired, and, having made him prisoner, sent him to Barcelona, where the king caused him to be beheaded, but gave his whole estate to his grandson ^a. In the month of August, the infanta Donna Joanna embarked on board the fleet sent from Sicily, and, having touched first at Genoa, went from thence to Naples, in order to espouse the king Don Ferdinand ^o. In the last interview the king of Arragon had with his son Don Ferdinand, he had pressed him exceedingly to receive the archbishop of Toledo again into his favour; to which all the answer he received was, that he would labour to overcome the extreme resentment that the queen Donna Isabella had against him; and it was with great satisfaction Don Juan received the news that this was accomplished; but he was by no means ^b pleased that his son and daughter were determined to conclude a peace with the king of France; in consequence of which he saw plainly that the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne would be lost. To protract, however, the evil hour as much as possible, he negotiated a truce for another year, in hopes that by that time he might be in a better condition to carry on the war ^p. His natural son Don Juan de Arragon, archbishop of Saragossa, being dead, he, in conjunction with his son Don Ferdinand, solicited the pope to give that archbishoprick to Don Alonso of Arragon, who was the natural son of the king Don Ferdinand; which the absolutely refused, on account of his being a child, and named the cardinal of Montreal to that archbishoprick; but the two kings adhering obstinately to their resolution of not having any other archbishop, the pope was constrained to declare Don Alonso administrator of the ^c archbishoprick, with which they were satisfied ^q; and which shews how little these lucrative benefices contributed to the welfare of the church, when he, who was esteemed the head of it, could be obliged to grant administration of such a see to a bastard of six years of age, and thereby create a precedent equally pernicious and scandalous.

Dies at Barcelona, by which Arragon and its dominions are united to the crown of Castile.

THE king Don Juan, having appointed an interview with his son at Daroca, was preparing for his journey thither, when he was surprised by death at Barcelona, January 19th, 1479, when he had lived fourscore and two years, and had reigned over Arragon twenty-one ^r. He had by his first queen Donna Blanca, the widow of Martin king of Sicily, and the heiress of Navarre, the unfortunate Don Carlos prince of Viana, the still more unfortunate Donna Blanca, who espoused Don Henry of Castile, and, after having spent her whole life in ^d sorrow, died of poison in prison, and Donna Leonora countess of Foix, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Navarre. By Donna Juana Henriques he had his son Don Ferdinand, pope who succeeded him in the throne of Arragon, Donna Juana queen of Naples, Donna Maria, and Donna Leonora, who died young. His natural children were almost without number. By a lady of the illustrious family of Avellaneda he had Don Juan of Arragon archbishop of Saragossa; by Donna Leonora de Escobar he had Don Alonso of Arragon, duke of Villa Hermosa, and count of Ribagorça; by a lady of Navarre he had two sons, that died young, and a daughter, Donna Leonora, who espoused Don Lewis de Beaumont, constable of that kingdom; and, at the very time of his decease, he had a mistress who was a Catalan. He was naturally just as well as brave, very liberal, but was apt to confide too much in his ^e wives, his mistresses, and his favourites, whence arose all his misfortunes. His body was first deposited in the cathedral of Barcelona, and then carried on the shoulders of the principal nobility of Catalonia to the monastery of Poblete, and there interred with his ancestors ^s. His son Don Ferdinand confirmed the laws and privileges of the kingdom of Arragon at Saragossa on the 26th of June, did the same at Barcelona on the first of September, and from thence went to Valentia for the like purpose ^t; and thus the crown of Arragon was united to that of Castile.

S E C T. XIII.

The history of the Spanish monarchy, from the accession of their Catholic Majesties Ferdinand and Isabella, to that of the emperor Charles the fifth, and the first of that name in Spain.

- a THE news of Don Henry's death no sooner reached the ears of the archbishop of Toledo, Their majesties than he dispatched a courier with a letter to Don Ferdinand, then in the kingdom of Arragon, in which he gave him the title of king of Castile and Leon, and pressed him to lose Don Ferdi- no time in returning to his dominions^a. His consort Donna Isabella did the like, but she nand and Don- thought it very expedient not to defer the ceremony of taking possession of the crown till his na Isabella arrival. It was therefore with this view that, on the thirteenth of December, she caused proclaimed at herself to be publicly invested with all the ensigns of regal dignity, on a scaffold erected in the town of Segovia, upon which a throne was placed very richly adorned; and, when the queen was seated, a herald proclaimed Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella king and queen of Castile and Leon; after which, she went to the cathedral, where Te Deum was sung with loud A. D. 1474.
- b acclamations of the people, and many of the principal nobility came to compliment her upon her accession, and to assure her of their fidelity, amongst whom none was more active than the cardinal of Spain and the archbishop of Toledo^b. She dined that day with Andrew de Cabrera, alcaide of the citadel of Segovia, who delivered up to her that important fortress, with all the treasures that were in it. After dinner, she gave him the gold cup in which she drank; assuring him, that herself and her successor should annually, upon that day, send to him, or his representative, the gold cup in which they drank^c. On the other hand, the marquis of Villena took all imaginable precautions for the security of the infanta; and, having renewed his intrigues with the king of Portugal, is supposed to have sent him the original will of king Henry, that he might be better satisfied as to the rights of
- c this princess, be the more inclined to marry her, and to support the faction which the marquis was forming in her favour^d, and to which his own numerous family and some other persons of quality, adhered.

UPON the arrival of the king Don Ferdinand at Segovia, he made a public entry with great magnificence, and, in conjunction with the queen, continued all the great officers of the crown in their respective charges^e. It was not long, however, before some differences arose about the administration of the government. Many of the nobility thought it belonged intirely to the queen, as the sole heirs of Castile and Leon. Some, however, were of a contrary opinion, and had the lawyers on their side. At length it was agreed, that this delicate affair should be referred to the cardinal of Spain, Mendoza, and the archbishop of Toledo; and by them it was decided, that they should govern jointly; that the king's name should precede the queen's, but that he should do nothing of importance but by her consent, with which he was not intirely satisfied^f (A). The archbishop of Toledo was so much displeased at the regard shewn by their majesties to cardinal Mendoza, that, after visible signs of discontent, he quitted the court intirely, under pretence of being desirous of spending the rest of his days in quiet, but in reality, as himself more truly expressed it upon another occasion, that he might contrive ways and means to make them sensible how dangerous it was to disoblige an archbishop of Toledo^g. The king Don Juan of Arragon sent two persons of distinction to soften him; the king Don Ferdinand sent several of the first nobility on the same errand; the queen went herself to make him a visit to Alcala, but to no purpose,

(A) The articles settled between the arbitrators are reduced to five by Mariana, and are in substance these (1): 1. That in all letters, public acts, and inscriptions upon money, the name of the king should precede that of the queen; but with regard to the arms and titles of their respective dominions, those of the queen should have the preference. 2. That the governors of provinces, cities, and fortresses, should be appointed solely by the queen, hold the places in her name, and that all officers in the revenue should be accountable only to her. 3. That the provision of bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical benefices, should be in both their majesties names, but the nomination solely in the queen. 4. That when they happened to be separate, each should administer justice in the places where they happened to be. 5. And, with respect to ordinary magistrates, either of their majesties might appoint them, who had the privy council attending upon his or her person. It is very certain that Don Ferdinand was so little pleased, that he had some thoughts of returning into his own dominions; and it is also certain, that it was not the statesmen, but the queen Donna Isabella, who satisfied and made him easy (2).

for he sent her word, if she entered the town at one gate, he would go out at the other^a. They tampered also with the marquis of Villena, who made no scruple of setting his price, but, like many great politicians, set it too high¹. At length Don Alonso the fourth, of Portugal, in the month of May, entered Castile, espoused his niece the infanta publicly, and took the titles to which he pretended by this marriage; so that the rest of the year was spent in all the confusion of a civil war, in which though the malecontents did not make any great progress, and even the principal places in the marquisate of Villena revolted in their favour, yet they found themselves so much distressed for money, that, they were obliged to borrow, and convert into specie the church plate, which for many reasons, was never done without great reluctance^k.

THIS war was carried on, on both sides, at least as much by policy as by force of arms, which gave Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella great advantages. The former inquired strictly, and punished with great severity, all offences against the state; but shewed great mildness and lenity in affairs that regarded the crown, received almost all into favour who desired it, and granted them pardons for what was passed, but admonished them to do their duty and obey the laws for the time to come^l. The queen was still more active, milder, and more munificent, the fame of which had great effects. The citadel of Burgos, which had held out an obstinate siege, was surrendered to the queen in person; and this became so much the mode, that with a flying army of no considerable force she reduced several places of strength. The king Don Ferdinand had recovered the town, and was besieging the citadel of Zamora. He made an attempt upon Toro, which was the king of Portugal's head quarters, but without success. He managed this siege with greater address, investing the citadel so closely, that no succours could enter; and fortifying his camp so well, that it was very difficult to force. Don Alonso, notwithstanding, resolved to attempt the relief of the place, towards which the infant Don Juan brought him a great reinforcement of troops out of Portugal, for the raising of which he had made free with all the churches treasure. The army of Don Alonso, thus reinforced, arrived before *Zamora*ⁿ. Don Ferdinand, though superior in number, remained close within his lines, and contented himself with disappointing all the attempts that were made to throw succours in into the fortress, or to attack any of the posts. On Friday the first of March the enemy retired, but in good order, the king in the centre, the prince Don Juan on the right, the archbishop of Toledo, and his malecontents, on the left wing. Don Ferdinand passed the river with his army in pursuit of them; and about four in the afternoon, marching down the side of a mountain, he saw the enemy drawn up in order of battle, in a plain at a small distance from Toro, upon which an engagement ensued. Authors differ much in their accounts of this battle; but it is however agreed, that the centre and the left wing of the Portuguese were routed, the prince of Portugal retired towards night to an eminence, and made a good retreat from thence the next day. The loss was far from being great, and yet the victory proved decisive^o. Don Alonso first sent the prince to cover his own country, and then followed with the rest of the army. The citadel of Zamora surrendered, and Don Ferdinand was left at liberty to go into Biscay, where the French were for the third time obliged to raise the siege of Fontarabia^p. The archbishop of Toledo and the marquis of Villena detached themselves from the Portuguese, in order to mind their own affairs. The queen Donna Isabella drew over many of the malecontents, and most of the cities and fortresses that had been garrisoned by them revolted, and submitted to their majesties^q.

Insolence of Don Alonso de Carillo, archbishop of Toledo, and firmness of the king and queen.

THE king of Portugal being gone into France to solicit succours from Lewis the eleventh, Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella had the more time to restore the domestic quiet of their dominions; a thing so much the more necessary, as in almost all the cities and great towns there were factions that kept up a kind of civil war amongst themselves, without paying any respect to the laws, or regard to the royal authority. At Toledo these heats were carried so high, that, in their majesties absence, a battle was fought between the contending parties, in which a considerable number was slain on both sides. At their return they caused a great number of the most factious persons to be arrested, and brought to a trial, where some were condemned to death, others to banishment and lighter punishments, according to the nature of their crimes; nor would their majesties hear of commuting those punishments for the sake of money, which had a very good effect^r. There was still a kind of treaty going on with the archbishop; to facilitate which, their majesties went to Madrid, and the king offered to treat in person with that prelate at the Pardo; but the latter brought such a multitude of armed men in his retinue, that the king, who was very slenderly attended, thought fit to retire without seeing him^s. Under colour of this treaty the archbishop sent for the constable, the duke of Infantado, the count de Haro, and other friends and relations, to the castle of

- a Uceda, where he prevailed upon them to sign a letter to their majesties, drawn up with great skill and art, full of promises of fidelity and submission, but insinuating that sovereigns ought to have a great regard for their nobility; and proposing, at the close, that the method which had been practised in the reign of king Henry, when the king did nothing but by consent of four of his grandees, who by turns attended on his person, should be revived. Their majesties returned a very quick answer to this letter, in which they told the archbishop and his friends, that they would ever respect the laws to the maintenance of which they had sworn, and make a strict observance of those laws the recommendation to their favour; but this being the rule of their conduct, they knew not any rank of their subjects that had a right to exemption; and that, deriving their authority from divine and human laws, they would govern as sovereigns, and not as slaves to grandees, by whom they expected to be obeyed[†]. This answer mortified the archbishop extremely, more especially when he understood that the constable, and some other lords, were gone to Madrid, to make their submission to the king and queen; and that all the rest, being summoned, had taken the same step^u. An ambassador from Edward the fourth of England had an audience of their majesties, and was received with great respect. The marquis of Villena had made his peace the year before, and promised to restore all the places he held to the crown: one of the chief of these was Truxillo, the queen went thither and summoned it; the governor refused to open the gates; the queen sent the marquis word, that if it was not surrendered by a certain day, he was to consider the agreement as void; upon which he came in person and put it into her hands^w, upon the twenty-fourth of June.
- c In like manner the king and queen traversed most of the provinces, and settled things in the best manner possible, by a proper mixture of clemency and justice; and, by their orders, a truce for three years was concluded with the king of Granada, who, taking advantage of the troubles in their dominions, had made an irruption into the kingdom of Murcia, which being in direct breach of a treaty, tho' for the present passed by, was not either forgiven or forgot^x, more especially as it was accompanied with extraordinary provocations.

- THE queen spent the best part of the next year in the southern provinces of Spain, and was brought to bed of a son at Seville^y, where the factions and disputes which had reigned for many years were intirely pacified, and the duke of Medina Sidonia, and the marquis of Cadiz, whose animosities were the principal source of this disorder, were commanded to quit the city, but allowed to live where-ever else they pleased. At the time their majesties quitted Toledo, they appointed Gomez Manrique corregidor or chief magistrate of that city, with instructions to look very closely to the behaviour of the inhabitants, and to prevent the reviving of those feuds which had already cost them so dear. The corregidor, who executed his office with great punctuality, suddenly called the principal inhabitants together, and having put them in mind of the peace and happiness they had enjoyed under his government, and of the miseries to which they had been exposed for many years before, acquainted them with a design that had been formed to murder him in his bed, by the instigation of the archbishop; at which the whole assembly expressed the utmost abhorrence, caused such as were concerned in this black affair to be seized, and, upon conviction, executed, banished, or whipped, without the least trouble or disturbance^z. This disappointment in his design so provoked that proud prelate, that he suffered his troops to ravage all the country about Madrid, and solicited the king of Portugal to renew the war, promising to put all the places that he held into his hands^a. The king and queen, being informed of this, took a short resolution of keeping no farther measures with him, and thereupon sent orders to Don Alonso of Arragon, the king's brother, to block up Alcala; immediately forbad his vassals, by proclamation, to pay him any rent, or to have any correspondence with him; and demanded of the pope, that an administrator might be named to receive the revenues of the archbishoprick, till, in virtue of a process in form, the see should be declared void. This had such an effect upon the turbulent archbishop, that he very speedily submitted, and, to obtain their majesties pardon, and the restitution of his temporalities, surrendered all the places he held in his hands^b. This year the peace was concluded A. D. 1478. with Lewis the eleventh of France^c, notwithstanding all the representations made by Don Juan of Arragon against it, who looked on himself as abandoned by it.

THE death of the king Don Juan of Arragon having obliged Don Ferdinand to make a tour into his hereditary dominions, the weight of the administration for that time was intirely supported by the queen Donna Isabella, who proceeded very roundly with such as still resisted, for there were very few now who disputed her authority. The war with Portugal still continued, and a great irruption was made in the spring into Galicia, where the enemy had some success at first, but were beaten in the end, and obliged to retire with loss; but they had better fortune in attacking a Castilian fleet which had been sent to the coast of Guiney, and returned from thence with an immense quantity of gold, of which not so much as a ship, or even a man, escaped. The bishop of Evora, who with a great body of troops, partly Portuguese, and partly Castilian rebels, made an irruption into Estremadura, in order to disengage some of the fortresses in that country, which were still in the hands of the malecontents, and which the queen had caused to be besieged, were engaged by the grand master of St. James, and beaten. The loss was not considerable on either side, but the greatest part of the Castilian malecontents were taken, which made it of consequence, and enabled the Infanta Donna Beatrix, the widow of Don Ferdinand, brother to the king of Portugal, and aunt to the queen of Castile, to prevail upon Don Alonso to allow her to treat with the queen Donna Isabella of a peace between the two crowns^c. The queen of Castile received this intelligence with great satisfaction; and, as soon as she could dispose things properly, had an interview with the Infanta at Alcantara, where the principal articles of the peace were very soon adjusted; and though, upon the return of the Infanta, the king of Portugal testified some dislike to them, yet by the persuasions of the Infanta, and of his son the prince of Portugal, he was brought at last to approve them, and they were accordingly signed on the twenty-fourth of September (B); so that now their majesties were acknowledged by all their neighbours, and were left at full liberty to redress all the grievances, and remove all the inconveniencies, that, during so many years of confusion, had crept into the government^f.

pursued for settling the interior affairs of their domi-

THIS was the first care both of the king and queen, who for that purpose called a general assembly of the states at Leon, in the month of January, where several old laws were repealed, others explained, and many new ones made. Besides this, the whole frame of administering justice was reviewed, amended, and extended, in such a manner, that persons of all ranks were brought within the reach of the law, and every town and village throughout their dominions had its proper magistrates assigned^e. The next thing that fell under their consideration was the repeal of the grants made by Henry the fourth, of crown lands and of pensions out of the royal revenues, upon which the deputies from the cities very strongly insisted; but the king and queen thought it was a matter required much deliberation, and that some distinctions likewise ought to be made. The nobility were likewise of this opinion; and all possessed of these grants were obliged to exhibit them to their majesties confessor, who was vested with the power of allowing, annulling, or abridging them, as he thought proper; which he exercised in such a manner, that thirty millions of marvadies annually were brought into the exchequer. The queen Donna Isabella ordered the first year's revenue to be distributed amongst the widows and children of such as had suffered in any degree for their service^h. Amongst the criminals that suffered in consequence of the new regulations, was Ferdinand Alarcon, whom the marquis of Villena had placed about the archbishop of Toledo, and who had been the principal author of the archbishop's ill conductⁱ. Yet sure it was some impeachment of their majesties justice, that, while this fellow was sent to the gallows, the archbishop and the marquis were

(B) This is commonly called the peace of Alcacovas, from the place where it was concluded. It is generally believed that Don Alonso made this peace against his will, being forced to it by the remonstrances of his son the Infant Don Juan on one side, and wearied into it by the solicitations of the Infanta Donna Beatrix, duchess of Viseo, on the other. The terms are somewhat differently reported, but in the main appear to have been these: 1. The king of Portugal was to quit the title and arms of Castile, and their majesties were likewise to quit all pretensions upon Portugal. 2. He undertook not to marry the Infanta Donna Joanna, or to give her any assistance. 3. The princess Donna Joanna was to make her choice, whether, she would marry the Infant Don Juan, then but a year old, or retire into a convent, and this in the space of six months. 4. The Infant Don Alonso, son to the Infant Don Juan, and grandson to the king of Portugal, was to marry, when of fit age, the Infanta Donna Isabella of Castile. 5. The navigation of Guiney was reserved to the crown of Portugal, and that of the Canary Islands to Castile. 6. All who had followed the party of Portugal during the war were to be restored to their honours and estates, and their majesties were to grant a general pardon, without any exceptions. 7. The Portuguese were to restore what they possessed in Estremadura, and to evacuate that province. 8. For the security of the peace, the Infanta Don Isabella was to be given in hostage to Portugal, and the Infant Don Alonso to Castile. 9. Lastly, All prisoners were to be released on both sides (8). The principal apparent cause of this treaty, on the part of Portugal, was the great concern the Infant Don Juan was under to see the blood and treasure of his country exhausted in favour of a title liable to so many objections; but the real and secret cause was said to have been his desire to see his son Don Alonso married to the Infanta Isabella, which he flattered himself would one day raise him to the throne of Castile (9). Whatever his views were of this kind, such a notion prevailed universally in Portugal; and the king Don Alonso himself was so affected with the usage that the Infanta Donna Joanna met with, that he had determined to resign the crown, and retire into a convent, if he had not been prevented by death (1), at the very time when he was on the point of putting this design in execution.

- a both restored to their majesties favour. But the queen shewed a laudable firmness in the case of a gentleman of Galicia, who was condemned to die for the murder of a public notary, who was the only person that could have proved upon him the forgery of a bond for a large sum. To save this man's life, an offer was made of forty thousand pistoles in gold, which, though at that time an object of attention even to a crowned head, was refused*. Ambassadors were dispatched to Portugal, in order to adjust some disputes that were arisen about the terms of the peace, and to be present when the unfortunate Infanta of Castile took the veil¹; notwithstanding which, things were not entirely adjusted till the next year. The Turks having taken Tarentum, and threatening the island of Sicily, the king Don Ferdinand was obliged to make a considerable naval armament for the defence of his hereditary dominions. About this time
- b also the formidable tribunal of the inquisition was first introduced into Spain^m (C).

ALL things were adjusted with the crown of Portugal in the beginning of the year, which gave their majesties an opportunity of putting the new plan for the distribution of justice in execution; and they chose to begin with Galicia, which, of all the provinces in Spain, was in the worst condition. In order to this, Don Hernando de Acensa was named governor, and Don Garcia Lopez de Chintilla chief justice. On their arrival at the city of St. James, the officers of the crown dissuaded them from opening their commissions, assuring them, that the whole country was full of little fortresses, the lords of which acted despotically, each in his little district; and that, if these united their forces, the army of the crown would not be in a condition to make any resistance. Don Hernando and Don Garcia answered, that the crown might be weak, but that God was omnipotent. They ordered open proclamation to be made, that they were there ready to do justice to all who demanded it, and against any who had done wrong; and they proceeded in this so briskly, and with so little respect to persons, that fifteen hundred gentlemen, who were conscious of having deserved death, quitted their country and estates to avoid it; upon which the governor and chief justice quickly changed the face of affairs; for the people in general, perceiving what benefits accrued to them from this commission, chearfully contributed their assistance; so that when two persons of great distinction were arrested, brought to a trial, and convicted of several atrocious crimes, they were executed without any commotion, and notwithstanding they offered prodigious sums to save their livesⁿ. The success that attended their endeavours in Galicia induced their majesties to take the same care of other provinces; so that, in much less time than could have been imagined, the peace of the kingdom was restored, and the people in many places chearfully returned to their labours, who, from the injuries and ill usage they met with, had retired into Portugal, or taken shelter even amongst the Moors^o. In the midst of the summer their majesties made a tour to Saragossa, Barcelona, and Valentia, where they procured the Infant Don Juan to be received and acknowledged as their legal successor; and in this tour they regulated many things, and

Noble firmness in the restoring justice after such an interruption.

(C) The Spanish historians are not perfectly agreed as to the time and manner in which the formidable tribunal of the inquisition came to be introduced in Spain. Mariana fixes it to the year 1478, and ascribes the origin of it to the cardinal of Spain (6). Other writers, whom we have reason to believe more correct, assure us it was not introduced till 1480, and give a very different account of the share that cardinal Mendoza had in this matter; for though they agree that he acquainted their majesties with the great danger they were in from the numerous apostasies both to Judaism and Mohammedism, more especially at Seville, and from that freedom of conversation there was between persons of all religions, by which Christianity suffered much, chiefly from a kind of indolence and indifference which gradually corrupted men's sentiments, and brought them at length to have little or no sense of any religion at all; their majesties desired that he would think of some method for correcting this evil; and accordingly, with some other ecclesiastics, he did take some steps for this purpose (7). But his method was judged to be too slow and mild; and therefore their majesties, by the advice of other persons, ordered their ambassador at the court of Rome to demand of pope Sixtus the fourth a bull for the establishment of the inquisition. At first there were only three inquisitors named, and they had their residence in the convent of the friars preachers at Seville; but the number of persons they arrested quickly made it necessary to provide them another kind of establishment, in consequence of which they were removed to the fortress of Triana, where, in their first Auto de Fe, which was the next year, they actually burnt seven apostates, and punished in a less severe degree several others (8). Mariana carries things much farther; he makes cardinal Turquemada the first inquisitor, and talks of putting to death two thousand, for the offences of which they were convicted before him, which there is good reason to look upon as an exaggeration. But it is however very certain, that the secrecy and severity with which they proceeded affrighted the Jews at Seville to such a degree, that great numbers of them retired into Portugal, and many into Barbary. He is right in saying Turquemada was the first inquisitor general; but he was not appointed so till the year 1483, upon the extension of the powers of this tribunal into many of the great cities of their majesties dominions; and very possibly it is to this time that terrible execution, of which Mariana speaks, is to be referred (9). Himself, and other modern writers, speak with great respect and deference of that tribunal; but it is out of all doubt, that, at the time it was first introduced, the Spaniards considered it, as all other nations where it is not established now do, as the most horrid invention that ever disgraced Christianity, and capable of producing as great mischiefs as those it was established to prevent.

composed numberless feuds that had disturbed the public tranquility for many years^p. At a Barcelona, particularly, the states represented to him, that the country was very much distressed by a misfortune, for which their prudence could suggest no remedy. The deceased king Don Juan had made very large grants to several persons, some of them of great quality, upon a surmise that those who formerly held those lands had been guilty of treason; which those who were thus dispossessed maintained to be absolutely false, and upon this presumption disturbed the possession of such as had the king's grants, and kept the country thereby in a continual state of war. Don Ferdinand, having inquired into this matter, found that his father was in the wrong, and declared his willingness to restore the old families to their lands, if it was practicable. The inhabitants of the city made it so, for, by a large free gift, they enabled the king to satisfy both parties, by restoring estates, or giving such equivalents as to b the parties were most acceptable^q. This year, by a secret impulse, says a Spanish historian^r (a very strange phrase for a flagrant breach of faith!) the marquis of Cadiz gave beginning to the war of Granada, by making an irruption into the territories of the Moors, and carrying off a great booty, in a time of full peace (D); which induced the Moors, on the other hand, to surprize the town of Zabara, on the twenty-seventh of December, where, after putting the inhabitants in chains, they left a strong garrison.

The beginning of the war of Granada, and the incidents that rendered it general.

THERE happened a dispute between their majesties and the pope, in regard to the bishoprick of Cuenca, which was of great advantage to the monarchy of Spain. The pope had a favourite nephew, upon whom he bestowed this bishoprick, though their majesties had recommended another person; a practice contrary to the laws of Spain, but which, in times of c confusion, the popes had ventured upon with tolerable success. In the present case, the king ordered all his subjects to quit Rome, refused to admit a legate from the pope, and carried things so very high, that Sixtus the fourth was not only obliged to abandon his nephew, and to bestow the bishoprick as the king desired; but also to grant, to himself and his successors, by a bull, the right of nominating to all the archbishopricks and bishopricks in Spain, obliging himself and his successors to confirm them^s. A common soldier, or, as some say, a subaltern officer, whose name was Juan de Ortega, undertook an exploit that immediately opened the war with the Moors; for, going as a spy into their territories, he perceived that Malaga and Albama were without garrisons, and might be easily surprized. He reported this to the marquis of Cadiz, who made it his choice to attack Albama, a very pleasant town, seated in the d midst of the mountains, at the distance of somewhat more than twenty miles from Granada, on the banks of the Rio Frio; where, notwithstanding, are the finest warm baths in all Spain. This scheme was executed upon Thursday the twenty-seventh of February, and the fortress surprized, all who were found therein being put to the sword. The Moors in the town, which was one of the richest as well as pleasantest in their possession, made a very brave and obstinate defence, but at length they were forced to submit, and the place was abandoned to the pillage

(D) There was nothing the queen Donna Isabella had so much at heart as the expulsion of the Moors out of Spain, from the mixed principles of ambition and zeal for religion; but there was besides a personal and particular resentment towards the Moorish monarch who then governed Granada, whom the Spanish writers stile Abobacen, or Abenbazan, but whom the Moorish writers stile Abul Hosssein (1). In his youth he had been an able officer and a very gallant man, and during the civil wars in Castile had made some irruptions with success. At the time he last renewed his truce with their majesties in the year 1478, the marshal Ferdinand Sabavedra, being in disgrace with Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, had retired for his own security to Ronda, in the king of Granada's dominions, who thereupon invited him to his capital, and in his presence reviewed seven thousand horse (2). Whether this was the effects of vanity, or whether he was desirous of learning any thing from the marshal, is not very clear; but it is certain this interview was fatal to them both. The Moorish monarch entertained so unjust an opinion of the power of their majesties, that, upon their demanding the usual tribute paid to their predecessors at the time of his renewing the truce, which was probably a matter of form, and intended only to keep alive their pretensions, he sent them word, that, in the same place where they coined money at Granada, they forged arms likewise to prevent its being taken from them. That inability which hindered their expressing their resentment at that time, made it pierce the deeper. As for the marshal Sabavedra, he no sooner returned into Spain, than they demanded the strong fortresses of Tarifa, which was in his hands, and which his relations advised him to deliver up, which was the fruit of his journey to Granada (3). We have no distinct lights whether the truce was expired, or not, at the time the marquis of Cadiz made his incursion; in resentment of which, the king of Granada surprized Zabara, instead of complaining to their majesties, or desiring to renew the truce, by which he gave them an opportunity of executing the great design they had formed of subverting that monarchy, and driving the Moors out of Spain, which they afterwards accomplished, and of which he was the first victim, being deposed by his own subjects, as the author of their misfortunes; and dying in such poverty and distress, that his body had remained unburied, if it had not been for the charity of some Christian captives, who carried it to be interred upon an ass (4).

a of the Christian soldiers, who, not satisfied with an immense quantity of gold and jewels, actually proceeded to make slaves of above three thousand inhabitants^t.

THIS, as it might well, alarmed Abul Hossain, king of Granada, who immediately assembled a body of three thousand horse and forty thousand foot, with which he invested the place in the beginning of March, and at the same time his subjects infested the Christian territories on every side, so that the war immediately became general^u. Don Ferdinand, who was just returned from Arragon, took a resolution of relieving this new conquest; and, having ordered his forces to assemble at Antequera with a superior army, Abul Hossain, upon his approach, raised the siege^w. Don Ferdinand, after this, retired into his own dominions, and went to meet the queen at Cordova, when the king of Granada, with a better army than before, invested the place a second time, and was very near taking it. When the news of this came to be canvassed in their majesties councils, the queen Donna Isabella cut the debate short, by declaring, that Albama must be relieved; that she considered it as the first-fruits of their conquests, and that the time was come when the Mohammedans should be driven out of Spain. The king, agreeable to this oracle, marched with eight thousand horse and ten thousand foot, and raised the siege a second time in the month of May. The queen pursued her design with invincible firmness; she raised forces, she filled magazines, she equipped squadrons, that every thing might be in readiness when the operations of the war might require it. In the mean time the king, with the principal nobility, marched to besiege Laja, a beautiful and rich town at the bottom of the mountains, about eighteen miles from Granada. Don Alonso of Arragon, duke of Villa Hermosa, assured the king, and the rest of the nobility, that this enterprize was not so easy as they imagined, and that their forces were not numerous enough to invest the place; but this advice was slighted, till, by a series of losses in a few days, they were obliged to raise the siege, and that with circumstances of dishonour as well as loss. The queen affected a deep concern for this, though, as it agreed perfectly with her design, and kept the spirit of the war in full vigour, it may be her grief was not so great as it appeared^v. The Moors, encouraged by this gleam of success, besieged Albama the third time, under the command of prince Muley Abul Abdali, and were again very near taking the place, when Don Ferdinand, with a royal army, arrived on the fourteenth of August in its neighbourhood, and, the Moors being retired, changed the garrison, and supplied all the magazines^z. This year was fatal to Don Alonso de Carillo, archbishop of Toledo, who had so much obliged and so much offended their majesties; to which see, in virtue of the bull before-mentioned, they appointed cardinal Mendoza. And this year likewise they discovered that Lewis the eleventh was endeavouring to marry his nephew the king of Navarre to the Infanta of Castile, their competitor, whom the new king of Portugal Don Juan had brought out of her convent, and had given her a palace to live in, where she was treated in a manner suitable to her birth^a. But, notwithstanding this, nothing more was done in favour of that most unfortunate princefs.

THE king Don Ferdinand, having sent a minister into Italy, to solicit the princes and states of that country to live upon good terms with each other, and to unite all their forces against the Turk, it was attended with so good effects, that the general tranquility was in a short time restored; upon which the pope sent to compliment their majesties, and, of his motion, granted them very large ecclesiastical supplies for their war against the Moors, that is, powers to levy money upon the clergy^b. The campaign in the spring was by no means favourable to the Christians. They endeavoured to penetrate through a country full of woods and rocks, with which they were little acquainted, where they suffered prodigiously during their march; and being continually exposed to the insults of their enemies, they were at length compelled to retreat with great loss^c. The young king of Granada, Muly Abul Abdali (for at this time there was a schism in that country, his father Abul Hossain reigning at Malaga, and himself in the proper capital) elevated with this success, and willing to signalize himself at the beginning of his reign by some great action, took the field with a large body of troops, and advanced without any considerable resistance as far as Lucena, on the frontiers of Andalusia: having, in this excursion, acquired a prodigious booty, he began to take measures for his retreat; which he had scarce begun, before the count de Cabra with a small corps of choice forces, passed Lucena in pursuit of them. It happened very fortunately that the day was misty, so that when they came up with the Moors, and charged them, their strength could not be discerned: some of the Moors crying out that the whole forces of Andalusia were falling upon them, a sudden panic seized them, and the route began almost as soon as the battle, those in the rear abandoning their booty, and shifting for themselves, without striking a stroke^d. The young king did all he could to encourage his troops, both by his words and his example, but to little a purpose, till at length, his horse being killed, he endeavoured to make his retreat on foot; but two soldiers following him, and attacking him with pikes, he was quickly overcome and taken. They were on the point of killing him for his rich arms, when some of the officers came up and rescued him out of their hands; and the nephew of the count Don Diego de Cordova, without knowing his quality, sent him prisoner to Lucena^c. As soon as the king Don Ferdinand arrived at the city of Cordova, he sent to the count of Cabra to bring his royal prisoner thither, which he immediately obeyed; and the Moorish prince made an entry into that city very magnificent, and with all the circumstances of respect that he could desire; after which, the king sent him to the fortress of Porcuna, where he was likewise treated with all possible lenity. The king Don Ferdinand made an autumn campaign with a great army, with little effect, b except burning all the flat country about Granada, and taking and destroying the town of Taxara. Upon his return to Cordova, a treaty was set on foot for procuring the liberty of the captive monarch; upon which the council of Castile were much divided, some, for various reasons, which they alleged, were for rejecting all proposals of that sort. The marquis of Cadiz and the count de Cabra were of the contrary opinion. They said, if the king was detained, the Moors would restore his father, and act with unanimity and vigour; whereas, if he was released, there would be a divided title, and the division of the Moors was the advantage of the Christians. The king referred both opinions to Donna Isabella, who thereupon decided in favour of the latter. By the treaty with the king's mother, the Christian princes in Granada were to be released, the king was to become vassal to the crown of Castile, to pay an annual c tribute of twelve thousand crowns, and give hostages for the due performance of them. When the terms were settled, the king of Granada had an audience of Don Ferdinand; he bent his knee as he entered the room, and a second time about the middle of it, with which the king of Castile was displeased. He would have knelt to him when he came up, and have kissed his hand, which is the manner of doing homage; but Don Ferdinand prevented it, and told him, that he had treated with him as with a king, and that he was free from every thing but the engagements he had entered into in that character. He embraced, complimented him, and, after making him magnificent presents, sent him home^e. The war, however, continued with Abul Hosssein, who soon after drove out his son, and obliged him to retire to Almeria. The marquis of Cadiz, by a well-conducted enterprize, recovered the town and fortress of d Zabara, upon which the king created him duke of Cadiz and marquis of that place^h, tho' the Spanish historians seldom stile him duke.

THEIR majesties sent their ambassadors into France, to demand the restitution of the county of Roussillon; and that not being granted, they were to renew their alliance with Charles the eighth, who was just come to that crown. The new king assured them that matter should be settled by ambassadors he had sent into Spain, and would have persuaded them to renew the treaty; which they declined, and insisted strongly that the late monarch Lewis the eleventh, being convinced of their majesties right to the county in question, had actually dispatched orders for its restitution, which the regents had stopped upon his demise; and, as they refused to renew these orders, they desired leave to return home. Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella e were then in Arragon, where they held an assembly of the three estates at Tarragona, and demanded supplies for the recovery of Roussillon, as well as for the war of Granada. The king Don Ferdinand remaining there longer than he expected, the queen set out for Toledo, and the campaign of the spring was made without any event of importance. But Donna Isabella took care to provide every thing necessary for continuing the operations against Granada with effect; and laboured more especially to provide artillery, with such provisions and beasts of carriage as would enable the troops to keep the field till winter; she took care also to have a good fleet at sea, to prevent any succours that might arrive from Barbary; and from hence it plainly appeared, that she had in view an absolute conquest. These preparations demanded a very large expence; but she managed things with such frugality, that there was a very f considerable saving out of what had been granted for these services, which she caused to be refunded, that the people might be sensible, though she desired the crown might be supported, she was very far from intending that the people should be impoverishedⁱ. In June Don Ferdinand arrived at Cordova, attended by the cardinal of Spain, his brother Don Alonso, the marquis of Villena, and the flower of the Spanish nobility; and, having entered the enemies country, took Alora, Aloyzana, Sentenil, destroying all things up to the gates of Granada; after which, the winter drawing on, he retired to Cordova^k. The war was now carried on in a manner very different from what it was formerly. The operations of the campaign were a settled by a general council of war, and the like councils were held frequently in the field; so that every step was taken with some design, the ultimate view of their operations being to facilitate the siege of Granada. Abul Hosssein was sensible of this, and sent to desire peace almost upon any terms; to which Don Ferdinand returned such answers, as shewed plainly enough that he would grant none¹. A. D. 1484.

THE queen Donna Isabella applied herself all the winter with her accustomed diligence to provide every thing that was necessary for continuing the war, and the fruits of her precaution quickly appeared. The monarch of Fez found himself so incommoded by the Spanish fleets that were cruising upon his coasts, as to judge it necessary to try whether, by an embassy, he might not procure some ease to his subjects: accordingly he sent ambassadors with rich presents and their majesties readily consented to a peace, upon his obliging himself not to give any succours to the king of Granada. The first enterprizes in the spring were not attended with much success; but the grand army, which assembled at Cordova, made a very different appearance from what it had done formerly. It consisted of twelve thousand horse and twenty thousand foot, but these were all choice troops, and a numerous train of artillery, with tents, carriages, and all other necessaries requisite for a long campaign; and their majesties saw with pleasure almost all the nobility of Spain ready to attend their monarch. The king's equipage was remarkably plain, and consisted but of a few persons: the king and queen took notice of this to some of the most sensible of the grandees, who immediately reduced their own. This had the desired effect, and, without the formality of the law, frugality became the fashion; and about the middle of April this army, the least pompous and the most formidable that had been seen in Spain, took the field. The true design was the siege of Malaga; but, before this could be made, the king found it necessary to reduce Coin, Cartama, Ronda, and a multitude of other places, which cost a great deal of time, treasure, and blood. The Moors saw their destruction was coming on, and defended themselves like brave men who were become desperate. Don Ferdinand, with his usual prudence, granted favourable capitulations, and executed them with great punctuality, insomuch that multitudes of the Moors desired leave to settle in the heart of his dominions. He caused them to be sent thither at his own expence, and gave them houses, land, and money in their pockets. There were many more who desired to be transported to Barbary; which was also granted, and many ships were employed in this service. Some of their captains threw the poor wretches overboard, to get possession of their effects. Their majesties, informed of this, caused a strict enquiry to be made, executed the criminals, confiscated their estates, and transmitted the produce of them to the relations of those they had murdered, in Barbary. At the close of the campaign the king took the castles of Cambil and Albabar, besides many more that were demolished; and tho' it was found impracticable to besiege Malaga, yet the reduction of seventy good towns, and a vast extent of country, rendered this campaign very glorious². The Moors, tired of their old king Abul Hosssein, deposed him, and seated his brother Mohammed Al Zagel upon the throne, who had before forced his nephew Muly Abul Abdali to fly into Murcia, after murdering most of his family³. There was this year an insurrection at Saragossa against the inquisition, and, in the tumult, the principal inquisitor was murdered, who on that account was considered as a martyr and a saint, and the people persuaded that miracles were wrought through his intercession. 1485.

THE war with Granada was now so famous throughout Europe, that several persons of high quality, and of martial disposition, repaired thither from foreign countries, to have a share in so memorable an enterprize; and amongst these was an English lord, to whom they give the title of earl of (E) Elscalas, who brought with him one hundred esquires, and a number of private men in proportion⁴. The army assembled at Cordova in the month of April, and consisted of twelve thousand horse, forty thousand foot, six thousand pioneers, two thousand carriages and waggons for the service of the artillery, and fifty thousand horses and mules for the baggage, and other services. As soon as they took the field they marched directly towards Loja, which was now become the seat of Abul Abdali's sovereignty, who, out of zeal for his religion, had concluded an agreement with Mohammed Al Zagel, and renounced his alliance with their majesties of *Castile*⁵. He behaved himself very bravely upon this occasion, gave the Christians great disturbance by perpetual sallies, till he was confined to his bed by his wounds, and at length capitulated upon very honourable terms, except that he became once more a vassal to *Don Ferdinand*⁶. The Christians proceeded next to besiege Yllora, and to block up Mochin, places that were requisite towards forming the new frontier; by which the Moors were to be shut up within a very small district; and, when these places were reduced, fortified, and sufficient garrisons left in them, the army proceeded once more into the plain of Granada, in order to burn and destroy the harvest; which in a great measure they performed, notwithstanding they met with a vigorous opposition, and that the operations of the whole campaign cost a great deal of blood. We may add to this, that the expence of the war was by this time risen so high, that it must have terminated here, at least for some years, if the queen had not found resources in the reputation she had acquired by her prudent management of the finances, which enabled her to raise the necessary supplies for the next campaign by loans from her own subjects¹.

As the war against the Moors became every campaign more and more serious, the nobility were very careful in recruiting their respective corps in the winter, that they might be in a condition to attend the king early in the spring; and the great diligence of their majesties in procuring and providing all things effectually, prevented their losing any time when they were once assembled. The heavy rains that had fallen prevented any excursions in the winter season; but by the five-and-twentieth of March, which was the time appointed, their majesties, who were at Cordova, assembled their army of twenty thousand horse and fifty thousand foot, with a corps of eight thousand pioneers, and other persons belonging to the artillery, and on the seventh of April they opened the campaign². But before we speak of the military operations of the Christian army, it will be proper to observe, that Abul Abdali, after the loss of Loja, had been obliged to retire to the frontiers of Murcia, where he lived under their majesties protection. At first he had a great number of adherents, who followed his fortune; but, as his funds grew low, the number of his subjects lessened, till at length he saw himself in danger of being totally abandoned; and this made him so desperate, that he resolved to hazard himself, and the few that he had left, in an attempt upon Granada, in which city he knew he had a strong party. As desperate as this scheme seemed to be, it was nevertheless successful; he found entrance into the city, seized a part of it, and, being supported by a strong body of horse from Murcia, obliged his uncle to retire³. In this situation things were, when the king Don Ferdinand invested Velez, or Velez Malaga, a well-built, pleasant, and strong town, seated in a plain surrounded by mountains, within little more than a mile of the Mediterranean. The Moors of Mohammed Al Zagel's party advised him by all means to attempt the relief of this place; the reputation of which, if he was so happy as to achieve it, would not fail to restore to him the possession of Granada without a blow. He assembled, with this view, a good corps of horse, and about twenty thousand foot, with which he entered the adjacent mountains, and from thence continually harassed and disturbed the Christian army; and once made a bold attempt to seize their artillery, but without effect; so that at length the place capitulated, and the greatest part of the inhabitants submitted to their Catholic majesties. It was next resolved to besiege Malaga, one of the strongest and best peopled places still remaining to the Moors; but an attempt was first made to corrupt Hamet Zegri, who commanded a large body of Barbary Moors, in the strong castle of Gibralfaro, which commanded the town; but Hamet answered, that he was hired to defend the place, and he would never betray it; and that he hoped this answer would procure him favourable treatment, in case he should be compelled to surrender, after the best defence he should be able to make⁴.

The siege and surrender of Malaga, with the wonderful consequences which attend it.

THIS city was invested completely both by land and sea on the seventh of May, not without very considerable loss on both sides. The Christians continued the siege with vigour for a long time, and the Moors defended themselves with great spirit and patience. In the mean time Mohammed Al Zagel collected all the troops he could, in order to afford them succours; but he had scarce marched them out of Guadix before they were attacked by Muly Abul Abdali, by whom the best part of them were cut in pieces⁵. Upon this he sent a present of several horses with rich furniture, with some pieces of cloth of gold and silk, to their Catholic majesties, advising them to be very careful in preventing any sort of provisions from being carried into the place, where famine would soon force them to yield; and assured them, that when they were masters, as some say, of Almeria, Baza, and Guadix, they might depend upon his putting Granada into their hands⁶. A desperate Moor, however, was very near snatching this conquest out of their hands. He came out of Malaga in the night, and going to the first guard of the Christian army, demanded to be carried to the marquis of Cadiz. When he was brought to him, he pressed to see their majesties, to whom he said he would discover the means of entering the town. The marquis did not regard him much; but those who were about him carried him to the king's quarter, and brought him to the tent of

- a Donna Beatriz de Bobadilla, who was playing at draughts with Don Alvaro of Portugal. The Moor, seeing Donna Beatriz very richly dressed, made no doubt but she was the queen, and that the person playing with her was the king; upon which, drawing his scymitar, he discharged a blow with all his force on Don Alvaro's head: Donna Beatriz fainting and falling down, another blow, that he aimed at her, reached no farther than her sleeve; and, before he had time to strike a third, he was dispatched by those who were in the place^c. The king was asleep; but the queen, being in the next apartment, hearing the noise, came out, and was an eye-witness of this shocking scene. At length Malaga would have capitulated; but the king refused any other terms than surrendering at discretion, to which they were at last forced to submit, and the town was accordingly surrendered on the eighteenth of August^d.
- b By this means many thousands were made slaves, some of the nobility having an hundred, others fifty, for their share, besides those that were sent as presents to the kings of Portugal and Naples^e. About the close of September their majesties returned to Cordova, and went A. D. 1487. afterwards to spend their winter at Saragossa.

- AFTER obtaining from the states of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, considerable supplies, A new scheme of making war, by creating another frontier, by conquests of several places. their majesties went into the kingdom of Murcia, where the army was to assemble, and which was far from being so considerable as it had been two years before, but numerous enough for the intended operations of the campaign^f. The king began by investing Vera, to the inhabitants of which he offered very fair terms: the terror they were under of being treated with the same severity that the inhabitants of Malaga had met with, induced them to submit, and their example was followed by many of the adjacent places. Mohammed Al Zagel, apprehending that Don Ferdinand meant to besiege Almeria, shut himself up in it with a thousand horse and two thousand foot; which saved that place indeed, but left the rest of the country open, so that Don Ferdinand reduced Huescar, Galera, Orie, Tijola, Cuellar, Benaumarel, and many other places of less consequence; into which having put proper garrisons, the army marched into the plains of Baza, where the scene was changed; the Moors, instead of submitting, making a most vigorous resistance; insomuch that the army suffered great loss, and, amongst other persons of distinction, Don Philip of Navarre, natural son to Don Carlos, prince of Viana, was killed upon the spot. The king Don Ferdinand, judging it proper to retire, after giving the necessary directions for the security of the frontiers, returned to Valladolid. 1488.
- d After his departure, Mohammed Al Zagel recovered several places, and laboured all that was in his power to revive the spirits of his nation, and to prevail upon them to unite firmly in defence of their religion, their country, themselves, and their posterity, though to little effect.

- It was the great prudence of the queen to observe an exact proportion between the means she employed, and the ends which she proposed from them. This appeared very conspicuously in the difference between the army assembled in this and the preceding year; the former was full seventy, the latter did not exceed twenty thousand men. The king joined them as soon as they were formed, and directed his march towards Baza, which, though not the greatest, was by far the strongest and best situated place in the possession of Mohammed Al Zagel. The siege and reduction of Baza, and the submission of the Moor of Al Zagel.
- e That prince, being very sensible of this, threw into it two of the best officers he had, with three thousand horse and five thousand foot; besides, the fortifications were in perfect good order, and their magazines of all sorts well supplied. As the alcaide knew the importance of the place, and had an army rather than a garrison under his command, he defended the suburbs and the posts beyond them as long as it was possible, so that a great many men were lost before the place could be invested, or the siege formed. When these difficulties were overcome, the ground was found so uneven, and the lines of so great extent, that they could not avoid several unlucky impressions made by the vigorous sallies of the besieged, notwithstanding that the king, by posting an ambuscade, cut off five hundred Moors at once. The summer advancing, and the heat being very intense, the men were much dispirited, and diseases prevailed in the camp; however, a large supply arriving from the queen revived them for the present, and her majesty having caused a track to be cut through the mountains, for the mules that were laden on one side, and another for those that returned empty on the opposite side, the convoys arrived regularly¹. The grand sultan of Egypt having sent ambassadors to the pope, to threaten retaliation on the Christians settled in his dominions, if their majesties continued the war against Granada, the pope sent them to the king; upon which a great party in his council advised him to raise the siege. This he deferred till he had the queen's opinion; which being directly contrary to that advice, the ambassadors were dismissed with presents^m. But, after all, it would have been certainly raised, from the obstinate resistance of the Moors, if the queen had not gone to the camp in person with a great reinforcement. This had a double effect; it raised the spirits of the army, which were sunk to a great degree; and it made such an impression on the besieged, that the alcaide offered to capitulate^a. The king gave him as good terms for his garrison as he could desire, and still better for himself; so that he entered into his service, and undertook to negotiate with Mohammed Al Zagel the surrender of Guadix and Almeria without the fatigue of sieges, in which, to the great astonishment of Moors and Christians, he prevailed^b. In this transaction the Moorish prince behaved with great prudence and magnanimity. He had consented to the surrender of Baza, upon a representation that it was impossible to defend it longer: he knew that Guadix and Almeria were not near so tenable; and he knew also that he had no succours or assistance to expect. He made, therefore, the best terms possible for his people, but he refused to make any for himself; all the favour he desired was, that he might have the honour of presenting the keys of Almeria to Don Ferdinand in person, which was very readily granted. The king, having appointed his uncle Don Henry Henriquez governor of Baza, marched from thence with part of the army over the mountains; while the queen, with the other part, took another route. When they drew near Almeria, Mohammed Al Zagel marched out to meet them at the head of a corps of cavalry. Some of the nobility in the Christian army advanced officiously to receive him, and persuaded him, when the king was in sight, to dismount, and to present the keys on foot; for which Don Ferdinand reprimanded them severely, called them a parcel of ill-bred clowns, desired the Moorish monarch to remount his horse, and, having placed him by his side, rode with him into the city, and treated him with all possible kindness and respect. He granted the inhabitants the same terms that had been given to those at Baza, kept his Christmas there with great solemnity, and, reviewing his army on the last day of the year, found that he had lost twenty thousand men in a campaign of seven months^c. But of these the Spanish historians would have us believe the far greater part died of diseases.

Another campaign against Granada, in which the whole country adjacent is destroyed.

In the beginning of the succeeding year, Mohammed Al Zagel put the king in possession of Guadix, and prevailed upon a multitude of other places to submit, particularly the country of Alpujarros, which otherwise from its situation it would have been very difficult, if not impracticable to reduce. The king, in return, made him a present of the best town and one of the finest districts in that country, with a promise, that if the two thousand peasants, who occupied his villages, did not pay him four millions of marvadies annually, the sum should be made up out of the royal treasury; and he farther added, that if at any time he desired to retire into Barbary, he should have free licence, with all his family, and have the full value of his estate given him in ready money^d. The alcaide of Baza, and other Moors, who had deserved well upon this occasion, were rewarded with like generosity^e. The next great affair that came upon the carpet was summoning Muly Abul Abdali to surrender Granada, according to his promise. His answer was, that their majesties had put it out of his power; that the number of the inhabitants were swelled to three times what they were at the time of his making that promise, by their reducing all the places round about, and they would destroy him upon the least suspicion of such a design^f. Their majesties then returned to Seville, where they consented to the marriage of Donna Isabella to the Infant Don Juan of Portugal; and, as soon as their domestic affairs would permit, Don Ferdinand took the field with a considerable army, with which he ravaged the plain of Granada, where the Moors gave him great opposition, and behaved very gallantly^g.

AMONGST those who distinguished themselves in this expedition were Mohammed Al Zagel and the marquis de Villena; the former by a stratagem surprised a very strong castle; the latter, seeing his servant attacked by six Moorish cavaliers, advanced alone to his assistance, killed two of them, put the other four to flight, and brought off his wounded servant, though he was himself disabled in his right arm^h. The king was recalled from this campaign by the total revolt of the Alpujarros, and by commotions in almost all his new conquests; so that he was forced to turn the Moors out of Baza and Guadix, and, with great difficulty, pacified the people in the *Alpujarros*ⁱ. Towards the close of the year, Mohammed Al Zagel came to him, and, having kissed his majesty's hand, desired his permission to retire to Barbary with such as were content to follow his fortunes. The king complied with his request, gave him a ship with a passport, and though it was very inconvenient to him, since he borrowed the money, paid him the full value of his estate^j. After his departure, he gave the government of Alpujarros to the marquis of Villena^k. Before the expiration of the year, their majesties received two mortifications; one was the recovery of several places out of their hands by Muly Abul Abdali, king of Granada; the other, that the republic of Genoa having a offered to submit to them, the situation of their affairs would not allow them to receive that state under their protection².

THE queen having taken the necessary care for an ample supply of every thing the ensuing campaign might demand, the king Don Ferdinand took the field before the end of the month of April with an army of upwards of 70,000 men; and finding, that, in spite of their late chastisement, the inhabitants of the Alpujarros had supplied the city of Granada with vast quantities of provisions, he transferred the war thither, and punished them indeed very severely, but not without great loss, the king of Granada sending into that mountainous country a numerous corps of troops³. He next sacked all the plain of Granada, and completely invested the place, in which there were not fewer at this time than one hundred thousand souls. The queen Donna Isabella repaired to the camp, with the rest of the royal family, and were very conveniently lodged in the tent of the marquis of Cadiz, which stood next to the king's^b. One night the queen complaining to one of her maids, that the candle offended her eyes, and hindered her from sleeping, she removed it into a corner, and both of them falling asleep, the tent took fire, by which the lives of the whole royal family were endangered, and the camp thrown into the utmost confusion. The king, half-naked, mounted on horseback, and having collected a great body of cavalry, posted them in the avenues leading from the city, and so covered the camp till the fire could be extinguished^c. The queen reflecting upon this accident, and resolving to prevent the like for the future, formed a very extraordinary project. She caused, in a convenient place, two long and broad streets to be drawn in the form of a cross, and as there were great quarries in the neighbourhood, the pioneers quickly constructed low but very convenient houses of stone. As soon as the army comprehended the queen's design, they assisted in it so cheerfully, that there quickly appeared a regular and very considerable town, to which they would have given the name of Isabella; but the queen expressly commanded it should be called Santa Fé, that is, Holy Faith; and it has been since honoured with the name of a city^d.

THE construction of this place, if it did not occasion, at least it accelerated, the reduction of Granada; for the court and the principal nobility being perfectly well lodged, provisions of all sorts were brought in great abundance to the new town, while famine raged in the city^e. One must be void of humanity not to feel for these unhappy people, who perceiving plainly, by this disposition of things, that they had nothing to hope, abandoned themselves to all the frantic expressions of despair, sometimes crowding their mosques, and, with loud exclamations, imploring the assistance of their prophet; at others running in troops to the burial-places of their ancestors, weeping and lamenting over their tombs, and regretting that a fate worse than death was appointed for themselves. Sometimes flocking about the Alhambra, or palace, they loaded their king with execrations, and imputed to him a calamity of which none had so deep a sense as himself; at others rushing out upon the Christians with a fury that took from them the sense of danger, and the capacity of avoiding it. At last, like wild beasts in the toil, they sunk, through very weariness, into a kind of calm, of which their chiefs taking advantage, proposed, and obtained their consent, to make the best capitulation they could; which, after some time spent in negotiation, was at length signed by the plenipotentiaries on both sides, on the 25th of November^f (F). It was no sooner signed, and the hostages given, than the people repented, and mutinied. Their king, who suspected this, had fortified him-

After a tedious siege and gallant defence, the king and people capitulate.

(F) The kingdom of Granada was already shrunk within the walls of that city, which had formerly occupied a large proportion of the south of Spain, and was for a time the most flourishing of all its numerous principalities, as having under its jurisdiction thirty-two cities and ninety-seven walled towns, exclusive of innumerable villages, the inhabitants of which paid an annual tribute of 700,000 crowns in gold. In its most flourishing state, the city itself contained upwards of 60,000 houses, and 400,000 inhabitants (1). In the low condition to which it was then fallen, it was still formidable; and therefore their majesties very prudently granted easy and moderate terms, that they might once gain possession of this last fortress of the Moors, knowing well that time and accident, the passage once opened, would accomplish all their purposes (2). The substance then of the capitulation was (3), that the king and commons of Granada should deliver that city, with all its gates, fortresses, towers, and other dependencies, with the arms and captives then in their possession, on the 6th of January; the inhabitants to continue in possession of their houses, goods, and inheritances, and to preserve the free exercise of their religion, with permission to live under their own laws, and to have their differences decided by their own judges; those who were desirous of retiring to Barbary, were to have passports for that purpose, with free licence to dispose of their effects, or, if they made it their choice, to carry them with them. As to the king, he was to have an ample seignory in the Alpujarros, and a certain number of vassals; but if this should not prove satisfactory, he might also demand leave to pass into Africa, and likewise receive the value of the territory which he left behind him. The Jews were absolutely excluded from this capitulation, because their majesties were determined to have the houses they occupied for Christian inhabitants, and the Moors had no such affection for them as to insist upon their being comprehended; tho', as the reader will see in the text, it would have been of little consequence if they had.

self so strongly in the Alhambra, or palace, that he could not be forced; and having given a notice to Don Ferdinand of his situation, his majesty immediately sent a letter, directed to the people, in which he told them, that if they did not disperse, and behave themselves quietly, the four hundred hostages they had given should be instantly put to the sword, the provisions they received daily with-held, and themselves sold for slaves, as the people had been at Malaga; and upon this, and the persuasions of their king, they retired dejectedly to those which they still called their houses^b. However, to prevent any thing of the like nature, the king gave their majesties notice, that, instead of the 6th of January, fixed by the capitulation, he would deliver up the place on the second^a. This year the Infanta Donna Isabella returned a widow from Portugal, her husband the prince Don Juan dying of a fall from his horse in the sports celebrated on occasion of their wedding, to the inexpressible sorrow of both courts^c. Their majesties also concluded an alliance with the emperor Maximilian, and a treaty of marriage for their daughter Joanna with the archduke Philip, and another alliance with king Henry VII. of England, and a like treaty of marriage between Arthur prince of Wales and the Infanta Donna Catalina, or Catharine; both which important transactions passed in the new town of Santa Fé, to the inexpressible satisfaction of their catholic majesties, who, about this time, understanding that the president and counsellors of the chancery at Valladolid had admitted an appeal in a temporal cause to the court of Rome, dismissed them all from their employments^d.

ON the second of January, pursuant to his own proposition, the king of Granada disposed all things for delivering up that capital to their catholic majesties, who, on their parts, gave the necessary orders for taking possession of it, with all the precautions, as well as all the solemnity possible. For this purpose, the count de Tendilla, with cardinal Mendoza and Don Gutierrez de Cardenas, were sent with a strong body of troops into the city, to take possession of the Alhambra, where they first elevated the banner of the cross upon the principal tower, and then the standard of the king and St. James on the other two; after which their majesties entered the place, and received the submission of the inhabitants^e. Thus Granada returned into the possession of the Christians, after it had been held by the Moors 779 years, two months, and nine days. As for the unfortunate monarch of the Moors, he retired to Pulchena in the Alpujarros, where the king gave him a very considerable estate^f. While their majesties resided at Granada, they published an edict, requiring all the Jews, who were not disposed to embrace the Christian faith, to quit their dominions in six months; and notwithstanding all possible methods were used by that unfortunate nation to prevent the execution of this law, they were obliged to quit Spain at the time^g. Mariana has carried the calculation of those who retired into foreign countries to 800,000 souls^h. Those who speak with greater moderation fix them at thirty thousand familiesⁱ; and it is said, that they carried with them immense riches, of a great part of which they were plundered in the countries to which they retired. Politicians are much divided in their sentiments upon this measure. At this juncture, Christopher Columbus, after many difficulties and unwearied applications, signed the contract with the queen Donna Isabella, in the city of Santa Fé, on the 17th of April, for the discovery of new countries, which he accomplished with so much glory to himself, and with such advantages to the crown^j of Castile, the whole expence of his armament amounting to no more than 17,000 ducats; for obtaining which sum the queen would have pledged her jewels, if the comptroller of her household had not advanced it without taking any such security. On the death of pope Innocent VIII. who had solemnized with great magnificence at Rome the reduction of Granada, the famous Don Rodrigo Borgia, who was a native of Valentia, ascended the pontifical throne, and assumed the name of Alexander the Sixth^k. In the autumn their majesties made a tour into Arragon, and from thence into Catalonia, where, in the city of Barcelona, Don Ferdinand ran an unexpected and imminent danger of losing his life; for having, according to his custom, given a long audience to all who desired it, on Friday the seventh of December, as he was passing down the stairs from his apartment, an idiot, whose name was Juan de Canamares, attempted to stab him with a knife over the shoulder, but luckily cut only his ear, and penetrated a little way into his chest. Those who were about the king would have dispatched him; but he prevented it; and understanding the truth, that the poor creature fancied he should succeed him in the throne, he added to the sentence passed upon him, importing that his body should be torn to pieces with pincers and then burnt to ashes, that he should first be strangled^l.

- a of the counties of Roussillon and Cerdagne; and upon this a treaty was signed and sworn to on the 19th of January^c. The monarch, however, had no real intention to restore these territories, but endeavoured all he could to frustrate and elude the engagements he had taken; but when Don Ferdinand began to assemble troops on the frontiers, and shewed a resolution to attempt the recovery of them by force, Charles thought fit to deliver them up; so that their majesties had the satisfaction of entering Perpignan in splendor, which had been withheld from them many years^d. The duke of Cadiz having breathed his last in the preceding year, their majesties thought it more expedient to give the title of duke of Arcos to his son Don Rodrigo Ponce de Leon, together with a certain number of vassals, and an annual pension, than to suffer the port and island of Cadiz to remain in the hands of that or any other family^e.
- b From the same principle the king Don Ferdinand prevailed upon the pope to fortify his title to the new discovered countries as far as was in his power, and, in virtue of his own, united to the crown the grand masterships of several military orders, which was a seasonable and important acquisition^f. The nobility and commons of the kingdom of Naples sent over deputies to propose to the king the uniting that to his other crowns; and they were very desirous of remaining under the dominion of the house of Arragon; declaring, that they were quite tired of their present monarch, and had no hopes at all of his son; but the king, having heard patiently all they had to say, told them, that the ties of blood restrained him from attempting any thing to the prejudice of their sovereign, even supposing it might be done with justice; and that wherever they applied, they might possibly find a change of masters, without any alteration of circumstances^g. Muly Abul Abdali, unable to remain a private man, and as unable to attempt any thing with success against their catholic majesties, resolved to retire into Barbary; and the king not only permitted him freely to transport himself and his family, but paid him also the full value of his estate in ready money^h. A. D. 1493.

THE king Don Alonso of Naples, who had lately succeeded his father Don Ferdinand, demanded and received assurances of succour from the king Don Ferdinand, in case he was attacked. The last-mentioned monarch having received ambassadors from the king of France, to desire that he would grant some ports in the island of Sicily, for the war he intended to make against the Turks, and for asserting his right to the crown of Naples, Don Ferdinand promised to send an answer by ministers of his own. He did so, and suggested to him, that the war against Naples was very unjust, as being grounded on a very indifferent title bequeathed to him, and not to punish any insult against himself, or to assert any claim either of his own or from his ancestors; and that he would find, whatever it might be in the beginning, this war would prove fatal in its progress, and ruinous in its consequences. But notwithstanding these remonstrances were supported by some of the ablest ministers in France, Charles would not desist from his expedition; upon which Don Ferdinand made the necessary dispositions for assisting his alliesⁱ. About this time, perceiving that, from a spirit of ease and luxury, the nobility began to leave off the use of horses, and ride mostly upon mules, he forbid the use of those creatures for the saddle by any, except ecclesiastics and women, under very severe penalties; otherwise the valuable breed of horses in Spain had been very near lost^j. 1494.

THE king of France having made a public entry into Rome, and obliged the pope to submit to him, Don Antonio de Fonseca, ambassador from their catholic majesties, presented to him their letter; upon which he promised to give him an audience at Veletri^k. There, in a very full assembly of the princes and nobility, Fonseca declared to him, in the name of Don Ferdinand, that having reserved to himself, in the peace of Roussillon, the right of taking up arms, in case the dominions of the church were attacked, and knowing nothing at that time of any claim pretended by him to the crown of Naples, he looked upon himself as absolved from all engagements, and would not fail to repel his unjust pretensions by force of arms; and, to convince the French king that his master was in earnest, he pulled that treaty out of his bosom, and tore it before his face; for which some of the French lords would have killed him, but the king prevented it^l. Don Alonso of Naples, perceiving that a strong spirit of disaffection prevailed amongst his subjects, who, at the same time, pretended to have a high esteem for his son the duke of Calabria, resigned the crown to him, and retired into Sicily^m. This did not prevent the reduction of the best part of the kingdom by the French; but, while they pushed their conquests, Don Ferdinand negotiated a league, and formed such an army behind them, under the command of the marquis of Mantua, as obliged them to a precipitate and hazardous retreatⁿ. He likewise sent over to Naples the famous Don Gonzales de Cordova, with a good fleet and a strong body of forces, with which, though unable to meet the French army in the field, yet, being bred in the Moorish way of fighting, he made use of so many stratagems, and laid so many ambuscades, that the French were afraid to stir out of their garrisons². The king went in person into Arragon, in order to obtain the necessary supplies for attacking France through Biscay and *Roussillon*³. This year proved fatal to cardinal Mendoza archbishop of Toledo, who was succeeded by father Francis Ximenes, who will make a great figure in the future part of this history; and, towards the close of the year, died Don Alonso king of *Naples*⁴.

The double marriages between the archduke Philip and the Infanta Donna Joanna, and the Infant Don Juan and the princess Margaret.

THE war with France on the side of Roussillon continued, though the operations of it were not very remarkable. However, Don Gonzales de Cordova having expelled the French out of the kingdom of Naples, and thereby acquired the glorious title of The Great Captain, induced Charles VIII. to propose a suspension of arms to Don Ferdinand, which was readily accepted⁵. The reciprocal marriages, which had been some years before proposed to their catholic majesties, now took place; and the Infanta Donna Joanna was sent on board a strong squadron into Flanders, to espouse the archduke Philip; which squadron was to return with the archduchess Margaret, who was to espouse Don Juan prince of *Asturias*⁶; and the other marriage was also perfected between Arthur prince of Wales and the princess Catharine; but it was agreed that the consummation of the marriage should be put off till his royal highness had attained the age of fourteen⁷. On the seventh of October died Don Ferdinand II. king of Naples, who was succeeded in the throne by his uncle Don Frederic; and that prince immediately demanded the assistance of Don Ferdinand, assuring him that his dominions and his person should be always at his devotion; with which the king was extremely pleased⁸. About two months before Don Ferdinand died, Donna Joanna, the widow of Don Juan the second, king of Castile, and the mother of queen Isabella, likewise departed this life, in a very advanced age, after having been subject for many years to great infirmities⁹. At this time, as Zurita assures us, pope Alexander VI. bestowed the title of Catholic upon Don Ferdinand and Donna Isabella, though the Spanish writers make no scruple of bestowing on them this appellation throughout their whole reign¹⁰. The king Don Ferdinand, notwithstanding the French had taken some advantages upon the expiration of the last truce, which he found himself in a condition to have made them repent, yet, at their motion, the king thought it more convenient for his affairs to suffer a new suspension of arms to take place, which might afford him an opportunity of taking the proper measures to bring the great designs he had formed in his own mind to bear; yet he was not so much taken up with these political meditations as not to have his eyes open to all that happened in the countries adjacent, or not to improve any event that might be turned to his advantage. An instance of this appeared in Africa, where the kings of Fez and Tremecen, after a long war for the acquisition of the city of Melilla, which had extremely weakened both their forces, at length agreed that it should be, with all its district, left uninhabited, and serve in that respect as a common boundary to both their territories. The king Don Ferdinand had no sooner intelligence of this, than he sent orders to the duke of Medina Sidonia to use the utmost secrecy and dispatch in surprising that place; which commission, notwithstanding the difficulties that attended it, he executed with so much spirit and address, that, landing 5000 men, he took possession of the place, and, having put it in a state of defence, took such effectual measures for repeopling it, that it was in a very little time out of all danger of being recovered by the *Infidels*¹¹.

Death of the Infant Don Juan, and marriage of the Infanta Donna Isabella.

THE pleasure which the king received from hence was in some measure, however, qualified, by the news of a dispute that had happened between the garrison and the inhabitants of Perpignan, in composing of which the governor Don Henry Henriquez received a blow upon the temples, of which he immediately died upon the spot¹². As to the family-affairs of their catholic majesties, they suffered, in the compass of this year, very considerable alterations, and such as might have affected them alternately with the warmest sensations of pleasure, and with the deepest anxiety and regret. The return of their fleet from Flanders brought the princess Margaret of Austria into Spain, who was conducted in great ceremony to Burgos, where their catholic majesties then were, in order to her marriage with the prince of Asturias, and where, on the 4th of April, they received the nuptial benediction from the hands of the archbishop of Toledo, which filled the court with joy¹³. The king of Portugal not long after discovered the reason of his declining to accept the Infanta Donna Maria, with which their majesties were somewhat offended, by demanding the Infanta Donna Isabella, who, during her widowhood, had passed her time in acts of piety and devotion. Their majesties readily yielded to his request; but it was with some difficulty that the Infanta could be brought to hear of a second marriage. At length, however, the treaty was concluded, and the king and queen conducted a her towards the frontiers^a; but, before the marriage was concluded, they received advice that the prince Don Juan was fallen ill at Salamanca, to which city the king his father returned, in whose arms that hopeful prince expired on the 4th of October^w. His death being concealed from Donna Isabella, the marriage was celebrated between the king of Portugal and the Infanta. Those who pretend to penetrate the decrees of Providence have suggested, that Don Ferdinand received this severe stroke at the very time that he had formed that unjust project of dividing the dominions of the king of Naples with the king of France. Whatever truth there may be in this conjecture, certain it is, that the princess dowager of Asturias, being left big with child, miscarried soon after of a daughter, by which all the remaining hopes they had of that marriage were totally extinguished^x. A. D. 1497.

b In the succeeding year the king and queen of Portugal made a visit to their parents at Toledo, where they were entertained with equal affection and magnificence, and received the homage of the states of Castile; after which they proceeded to Saragossa, and were in like manner acknowledged by the states of Arragon^y. If this, in some measure, consoled their catholic majesties for the death of their only son, their satisfaction lasted not long; for, on the 23d of August, the young queen, being brought to bed of a son at Saragossa, expired an hour after^z. This year the king concluded a peace with Lewis XII. soon after his accession to the throne of *France*². He likewise sent, in conjunction with his son-in-law the king of Portugal, ambassadors to Rome, to admonish the pope of his duty, to require him to mind his family less and his pontifical dignity more; but the motives to, and the consequences of, this extraordinary proceeding, will appear in their proper place, when we come to speak of that pontif, and his scandalous administration^b. The death of that princess, then queen of Portugal, on a visit to her parents. 1498.

The first care of their catholic majesties was to cause the young prince Don Michael to be acknowledged heir of Castile; and the like care was taken in Portugal^c. About this time it was that king Ferdinand concluded with Lewis XII. a secret treaty for the division of the kingdom of Naples between them; the motives to which are not clearly expressed by any of the Spanish historians. What they deliver upon this subject, may be reduced to this; that Don Frederic had refused to marry his son to the princess Joanna, his catholic majesty's niece; and that having made overtures of an alliance to the king of France, he had transmitted to him Don Ferdinand's letters, which the latter could not forgive. The former conjecture seems to be in some measure confirmed by the return of the queen-dowager Donna Joanna of Naples, with her daughter, into Spain, where the king appointed them the city of Valentia for their residence, with an establishment suitable to their rank and near relation to him^d. Their majesties being informed, during their residence in the kingdom of Granada, that the greatest part of the inhabitants held secret intelligence with their countrymen in Barbary, invited them to make descents upon the coast, favoured them in these predatory expeditions, and shared with them in the booty; upon which it was thought a necessary resolution to oblige these people to embrace the Christian religion, or to embark for Africa. The archbishops of Toledo and Granada were charged with the execution of this project, in which they both laboured with equal diligence, though by very different methods. The primate had a high and hasty spirit, though with very great abilities; the other prelate, not at all inferior to him in the last-mentioned quality, was remarkably mild and gentle, applying himself chiefly to the conversion of the more learned among the Mohammedans, upon whom he made great impressions by the strength of his arguments and the smoothness of his conduct. Between both, and by the assistance of the civil arm, the people in general were converted, or said to be converted; insomuch that on the 18th of December the principal mosque was consecrated, and turned into a Christian cathedral^e. General conversion of the Moors in the new conquests by the archbishops of Toledo and Granada. 1499.

f THE next year it plainly appeared, that these sentiments were not so general or sincere as they had been represented; for the greatest part of the inhabitants of the Alpujarros threw off the Spanish yoke, and sent agents into Barbary to demand the assistance of their countrymen, in support of a war grounded solely upon religion; but, before they had time to bring their affairs into any tolerable order, the king Don Ferdinand arrived at Granada, and, marching from thence with a formidable army, quickly reduced these unhappy people, notwithstanding the natural strength of that country which they inhabited; so that, on the 8th of March, they made a solemn submission, consented to pay the sum of 50,000 ducats, by way of fine, for their late insurrection, and to give thirty-two hostages for their future obedience^f. The king Don Frederic of Naples, having some intelligence of the storm that was ready to burst upon himself and his dominions, addressed himself with great humility to Don Ferdinand, offered to conclude the marriage which he had before refused, and to put his dominions under his protection; This appears to be but insincere, from a general insurrection. 1499.

tection; to which the king, for reasons that will hereafter appear, returned only general answers^a. In the month of May, the Great Captain, with a strong fleet, failed to Sicily, under pretence of defending that island from the Turks, but in reality to execute the treaty of partition concluded with the crown of France; towards which, even in the compass of this year, he made no inconsiderable progress^b. The archduchess Donna Joanna being delivered on the 24th of February of a son, who was baptized by the name of Charles, in respect to the memory of the duke of Burgundy, his grandfather, the news was received with great joy in Spain^c, where, on the 20th of July, the young prince Don Michael breathed his last; which did not hinder the conclusion of the marriage of Don Manuel king of Portugal with the Infanta Donna Maria, who was offered him, the sister of his former wife, and aunt to the young prince whose death we have just mentioned^d.

Another revolt in those parts much more dangerous and troublesome than the former.

THE disturbances that had hitherto happened in the new conquests were of little consequence in comparison of those that broke out this year, either from the chagrin and obstinacy of the Moors, or from the avarice and severity of those appointed to govern them. The places that revolted were chiefly castles in the mountains, where the people depended partly on the advantages arising from their situation, and partly on the strength of those forts. As to the latter, they were quickly convinced of their error, by their being almost as quickly reduced as they were invested. However, they began to entertain strong prejudices in favour of the former, from several advantages they gained over the Christian troops, and particularly one in which Don Alonso de Aguilar was cut to pieces, and with him almost all the detachment he commanded^e. To repair these mischiefs, the king Don Ferdinand gave orders for disposing his troops in such a manner, that all intercourse with the people in the Alpujarros was rendered impracticable. He then marched against them in person with a formidable army, and opened the passages as he went, so as to render the entrance of troops into it much more easy than before. This took from the Moors all courage; and therefore they offered to submit, if the king would permit them to retire into Barbary. A great part of the council thought this dishonourable, considering them as just objects of the king's resentment; but those, upon whom the king chiefly relied, insisted that the true point of honour was to accomplish his design, and to do it in the speediest and safest manner. The king, therefore, consented to their demand, provided they paid him ten pistoles a family; and, by this expedient, he raised 60,000 pistoles, which was a great sum in those days, and got quit of at least as many people, who never would have been quiet^f. This year the pope gave his consent to the treaty of partition, by which Lewis XII. of France was to have Naples and Abruzzo, with the title of king, and Don Ferdinand the two Calabrias, with the country of Apulia^g. The Great Captain soon put him in possession of his share, and the unfortunate Don Frederic king of Naples made it his choice to retire into France, there to expect a subsistence from the generosity of that prince who had despoiled him of the other half of his dominions^h. On the 21st of August, the princess Catharine embarked for England; but, meeting with a violent storm, was forced to put back, and did not sail again till the 21st of *September*ⁱ. Donna Isabella, by the advice of Ximenes archbishop of Toledo, engaged, or rather obliged, Don Ferdinand to concur with her in a solemn invitation of the archduke Philip and the princess Joanna to come into Spain, in order to be acknowledged the legal successors of their dominions; a thing she had just reason to desire; but the king, who was sixteen years younger, had other notions in his head, which rendered this expedient not very acceptable; but as those objections could not be avowed, he complied with her request, and prudently concealed them^j.

AMONGST other things, their catholic majesties were extremely careful in recovering to the crown those places which, through the easiness of their predecessors, had been granted from it, and which it was not either honourable or safe to leave in the hands of subjects. The important fortress and port of Gibraltar was very justly esteemed of this number; and therefore their majesties, by giving, no doubt, a proper equivalent, obtained it from the duke of Medina Sidonia, by whose ancestor it was retaken, and annexed it to the crown^k. The archduke Philip, and the princess Joanna, his consort, arrived in Spain, having travelled through France pretty early in the year; but as many precautions were necessary in an affair of so delicate a nature, it was the 21st of May before they received the oaths of the states of Castile in the cathedral church of Toledo; and it was the latter end of September before the like ceremony was performed at Saragossa, where the states of Aragon swore to them conditionally, in case the king Don Ferdinand left no heirs male^l. Affairs in Italy were still in a critical situation: the French monarch sent an ambassador to complain of the ill usage his subjects had received from the Grand Captain. Don Ferdinand answered, like a great politician, that he was very desirous, if possible, of being upon good terms with his brother of France;

a and therefore, if he thought the treaty of partition unequal, he would accept his share, or he would leave the points in dispute to arbitrators, or even to the decision of a certain number of learned persons, who should be appointed judges to hear and determine all disputes; but, notwithstanding this seemingly pacific disposition, the war continued in Italy, where the Spaniards under the Grand Captain encroached daily upon the French.

THE war breaking out also between the emperor and France, put the archduke Philip upon returning into his own dominions, for the safety of which he was very apprehensive. It was in vain that Don Ferdinand hinted to him, that this sudden return was what he did not expect, after the pains that had been taken to secure to him the succession of so many kingdoms; in vain the queen, who was but just recovered from a dangerous illness, represented that his quitting Spain would have bad effects upon a nation by no means inclined to submit to foreigners; in vain the Infanta Donna Joanna put him in mind that she was big with child, and that the depth of winter was a very improper season for travelling. The archduke persisted in his first resolution, nor would he be diverted from going through France; and accordingly set out from Madrid the 19th of December, leaving the people displeased, their majesties amazed, and his consort inconsolable^u. This year also the princess Catharine, who had espoused Arthur prince of Wales, became a widow, and, by consent of their majesties, was afterwards married to his younger brother Henry, and became afterwards queen of England, and mother of another queen^w. This year also died at Rome Andrew Paleologus, despot of the Morca, and the nephew of the last emperor of Constantinople, who, by his last will and testament, dated the sixth of April, transferred all his claims to their majesties, and their successors^x.

As soon as the archduke Philip could procure a passport for that purpose, he went to Lyons, in order to have an interview with the French king, with whom he entered into a negotiation; of which Don Ferdinand having intelligence, he sent father Bernard Boyle to admonish him not to depart from the instructions which he had given him; notwithstanding which, he signed such an accommodation as he judged expedient; of which his father-in-law being apprehensive, he dispatched an order to the Grand Captain in Italy to pay no obedience to any commands he received but from himself; and, as soon as he was informed of it, disavowed the treaty; which so irritated king Lewis, that he not only invaded Roussillon, but attempted to penetrate into Arragon, though with no great success; whereas Don Ferdinand, having obliged him to raise the siege of Salces, carried the horrors of war into France, and compelled Lewis to demand a truce for a few months; to which he consented^y. The war still continued in Italy with various success; but, upon the whole, was favourable to the Spaniards, the king taking care to send, from time to time, great supplies and strong reinforcements by sea. On the 10th of March, the princess Donna Joanna was delivered at Alcala of a son, whom the archbishop of Toledo baptized by the name of Ferdinand^z; and, in this lying in, it is believed that the Infanta, by some accident, had her understanding impaired; at least soon after she gave very visible marks of an alienation of mind, from which she could never be recovered.

IN the beginning of the succeeding year, it was found absolutely necessary to send the Infanta Donna Joanna to her husband in Flanders, as her malady chiefly arose from her excessive passion for the archduke^a. A truce was likewise concluded in the spring with his most Christian majesty. On Good Friday, the 5th of April, there was a terrible earthquake, which was felt through the greatest part of Spain, and which the common people esteemed ominous, more especially as both their majesties fell dangerously ill^b. However, the king recovered; but the profound melancholy of the queen strengthened her disease. The loss of her son Don Juan first seized her spirits; the misfortunes of the Infanta Donna Isabella increased her affliction; and her sense of the Infanta Donna Joanna's incapacity, and the apprehension she was under as to its consequences, rendered the load of her cares too heavy for her to support. By her testament she called her daughter to the succession, and, after her, the prince Don Carlos; but appointed her husband Don Ferdinand regent of the kingdom till her grandson should attain the age of twenty; directing her body to be interred at Granada, and forbidding any public mourning upon her demise. In this disposition of mind, universally bewailed and regretted, died this great queen, on the 26th of November 1504^c, about half an hour before noon; and as soon as a scaffold could be erected in the square of Medina del Campo, where she died, the king caused the archduchess Joanna to be proclaimed with the usual solemnities^d. The Great Captain was now in a manner the peaceable possessor of the kingdom of Naples; and as, in the achieving and maintaining that conquest, he had been obliged to take some extraordinary steps, there wanted not those who did him ill offices with the king Don Ferdinand, which induced that monarch to restrain his authority; and as, upon the death of the queen, he might have found means to have retorted this ill usage, the king was not altogether free from apprehension; but Don Gonzales quickly convinced him, by his steady attachment, that all which had been reported to his prejudice was but calumny ^c.

Jealousies and uneasinesses arise between Ferdinand and the archduke.

THE affairs of both courts, and the councils of both kings, were in a short time equally embarrassed. Don Ferdinand found that the greatest part of the nobility were by no means satisfied with his regency, but were rather desirous of having their young king Philip, who, they flattered themselves, would be more tractable, and who, they were sure, would be less capable of managing public affairs. The duke of Najara, and the famous Don Diego de Pacheco, marquis of Villena, were at the head of the malecontents, and they sent Don Juan Manuel into Flanders, to fill the mind of their new master with such notions as might best answer their purpose ^f. On the side of his catholic majesty were the constable and the admiral of Castile, Don Bernard Mendoza, and, above all, the archbishop of Toledo and the duke of Alva, who adhered to him steadily, when visibly abandoned by all others, and seemingly by his good-fortune ^g. The archduke, king of Castile, had conceived very high prejudices against his father-in-law, and affected to treat the queen's testament as a supposititious piece, and as invalid, if it was not so; neither did he make any scruple of declaring that no throne could admit of two kings; and that he meant to maintain his right to govern without an associate, to those who had sworn to his succession ^h. An accident happened, which provoked him to carry things still farther: one of his catholic majesty's ambassadors had prevailed upon queen Joanna to corroborate her mother's act, by sending Don Ferdinand full power to govern Castile, and its dependencies; upon the discovery of which, the archduke dismissed all the queen's servants, forbid any Spaniard to speak to her, and threw the ambassador into a dungeon ⁱ. In Spain, whatever passed in his mind, Don Ferdinand behaved with all the temper and condescension of a prince absolutely at his ease. He held an assembly of the states at Toro, and brought thither an excellent code of laws, that had been digested with great deliberation before the queen's death; and the desire of having these enacted, made such an impression, that the king and queen were proclaimed, and Don Ferdinand acknowledged as administrator, almost without any opposition ^k. His jealousy of the power of the Great Captain in Naples had induced him to recal part of his army from thence, which might have proved a dangerous measure, if the archbishop of Toledo had not immediately suggested employing them in a war against the Moors, of which he bore the whole expence; and the army being transported to Africa, reduced the port and town of Mazalquivir ^l. Having exact intelligence of all that passed in Flanders, and knowing that his son-in-law was on the point of engaging with Lewis XII. to support him in his pretensions, Don Ferdinand broke all his measures, by proposing a marriage with the niece of that monarch, and entailing upon the heirs of it, male or female, the kingdom of Naples. The name of this young and beautiful princess was German de Foix, and the marriage was very speedily concluded ^m. Upon this the French monarch declared for Don Ferdinand, which obliged the archduke to conclude a kind of treaty of pacification by his ministers at Salamanca, in which it was stipulated, that the queen and the two kings should govern with equal authority, with various other articles, which it is unnecessary to mention, since this pacification never took effect, and was concluded only to gain the archduke a peaceable admission into Spain, where his intention was that his faction should set it aside, which they did very effectually ⁿ. In the mean time the queen was delivered of the Infanta Donna Maria; on which Don Ferdinand sent a person of distinction to compliment the king and queen, who was received with respect, though Philip persisted in his first resolution, and was taking at that very time such measures as he thought most expedient for its execution ^o, and for undermining the authority of his father-in-law.

The archduke Philip goes to Spain, and dispossesses his father-in-law of the regency.

ON the tenth of January the archduke, with the queen his consort, embarked at Middleburgh for Spain; but being forced by a tempest to take shelter in an English port, Henry the seventh would not suffer him to depart till they had an interview at Windsor, where himself and his queen were received with all possible magnificence and respect, the two kings entering into a close alliance, and the queen being extremely delighted with the conversation of her sister the princess of Wales; but, however, his stay of six weeks is reported not to have been altogether voluntary, and what seems to give some colour to this suggestion is, that the English monarch engaged him, before his departure, to deliver up Edmund de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, who had been kept prisoner in the citadel of Namur from the time that Arthur, prince of Wales, had espoused the Infanta; with a promise, however, that his life should be

- a safe^p, as it was during that reign, though he was beheaded in the next^q. This affair settled, which did no great honour to either of the kings, the archduke continued his voyage, and landed safely at Corunna. The first step he took was, to declare he would not be bound by the treaty of Salamanca, and that he expected his father-in-law should abdicate the regency, and retire into his own dominions. Don Ferdinand, finding himself abandoned by every-body except the primate of Toledo and the duke of Alva, resolved to yield to the torrent, and sent the archbishop to his son, to prevail upon him to consent to an interview, which was obtained with great difficulty, and upon the strangest terms imaginable. The young king advanced to it with six thousand men, in order of battle. Don Ferdinand had his ordinary retinue of about two hundred men, mounted upon mules with cloaks, but without swords, accompanied by
- b the duke of Alva, in whose single person was comprised his whole court. Philip looked very grave, and put on an air of state and majesty; Don Ferdinand, on the contrary, appeared very open and gay, and, while his son presented one by one the nobility who had deserted him, he received them smiling, and rallied every one of them; so that the scheme of mortifying him was totally defeated.

- THEY conferred in a hermitage, to which they were attended by Ximenes and Don Juan Philip dies unexpectedly, and thereby throws Castile into great confusion. Manuel. The presence of the latter disconcerted the old king; but the primate of Toledo delivered him from his perplexity, by desiring Don Juan to leave the kings alone; and, he going out first, the archbishop shut the door, and returned to the two princes^r. The conference produced nothing; but a treaty was afterwards concluded, by which Don Ferdinand
- c consented to retire into his own dominions; and the archduke, with some difficulty, allowed him to keep the three grand masterships, and assigned him the profits of a silk farm in the kingdom of Granada, amounting to fifty thousand crowns. They had, before Don Ferdinand retired, another interview, in which Don Ferdinand gave his son a great deal of good advice, and particularly recommended to him the archbishop Ximenes, as one of the best men and the ablest minister that Spain had ever bred^s. When the old king returned with his young wife to Saragossa, the duke of Alva would have accompanied him, but he absolutely forbade it. In the month of July Don Philip held an assembly of the states at Valladolid, where they swore to the queen Donna Joanna in her own right, to the king as her husband, and to the prince Don Carlos as the heir apparent, and gave him a subsidy for the war against
- d the Moors^t. It was not long before the new government became universally odious; for, not content with treating his wife harshly, and with contempt, he laboured to persuade the nobility to deprive her of the government, and to shut her up as a mad woman, which was prevented by the firmness of the admiral and the duke of Benavente. He quarrelled with the inquisition, changed all the governors and magistrates throughout Spain, and suffered his Flemish favourites to sell every thing^u. Upon this, great troubles were like to ensue; some of the nobility entered into a league for setting the queen at liberty; and the people universally exclaimed, that they knew not the value of Don Ferdinand's administration till they were deprived of it; but the consequences of this universal discontent were averted by the king's sudden death, occasioned by violent exercise after a full meal, and then drinking cool liquor,
- e which produced a fever that carried him off in six days, on the 25th of September, in the twenty-eighth year of his age^v. He left the queen big with child, having had by her the prince Don Carlos, his successor; the Infant Don Ferdinand, afterwards emperor; the Infantas Donna Eleonora, Donna Isabella, and Donna Maria, who, with his posthumous daughter Donna Catalina, were all queens, the first of Portugal and afterwards of France, the second of Denmark, the third of Hungary, and the last of Portugal^w. A.D. 1506.

- THE affairs of Castile, by the unfortunate and unexpected death of the king, were thrown into the utmost confusion; the great lords, to preserve some form of government, appointed a committee of seven, with the archbishop of Toledo at their head. That prelate went to the queen, and desired her to sign the necessary instruments for calling an assembly of the states; which she absolutely refused, repeating continually, "The king my father will come, and settle all things"^x. His catholic majesty was at that time in Italy; and, though he received the news of his son-in-law's death, in the Genoese territories, yet he persisted in his resolution of going to Naples. This increased the confusion in Castile, where there were two parties formed, at the head of one of which was the archbishop of Toledo, in favour of Don Ferdinand; and into the other, the duke of Najara, the marquis of Villena, and others, entered, who were for calling in the emperor Maximilian. The committee of regency assembled the states, and, by the great address of the archbishop of Toledo, the party of the catholic king prevailed^y. The queen in the mean time took away her husband's corpse, under pretence of carrying it to Granada, and wandered with it through the country, travelling by night only, and giving frequent signs of outrageous distraction; but withal had some lucid intervals, in which she expressed a great jealousy for her authority; and in one of these she forbade the deputies of the states from going to invite her father, notwithstanding she desired nothing so much as his return^a. In the mean time some of the grandees were for marrying her again. The marquis of Villena proposed Don Alonso of Arragon, son to the Infant Don Henry, the last heir male of the royal family; others were for Don Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, some say with her father's consent; Gaston de Foix, his brother-in-law, was named; and some mention there was of Henry the seventh of England^b. All these projects, however, were vain and fruitless, for the queen would never suffer even the most distant proposal of another marriage. The king Don Ferdinand settled every thing in Naples to his satisfaction; and, in pursuance of his treaty with the king of France, he restored such of the nobility to their estates as had been in the French interest; but it was observed, that, in holding the general assembly of the states, he took care that the queen should be absent, that the succession might be open for his grandson Don Carlos^c. This year died the famous admiral Columbus, one of the ablest men in every respect of that or indeed of any other age, whose capacity was only equalled by his virtues and by his good fortune^d.

He returns from Italy into Spain, and resumes the regency of Castile.

THE malecontents in Spain, who were numerous and potent, but who thought themselves more so than they were, invited the emperor Maximilian to assume the government of Spain, as tutor to his grandson Don Carlos. They caballed likewise with the king of Navarre, to grant him a passage through his dominions with an army; to which he willingly assented, and for which he afterwards paid dear; and with the king of Portugal, to support the measure; to which he listened, till he saw it was a chimera^e. Maximilian, however, sent ambassadors to Don Ferdinand at Naples, to demand the regency of Castile; but the king answered, there was no regency: that his daughter queen Joanna governed in her own right; and that it might prejudice, but could never turn to the benefit of the emperor's affairs, to intermeddle with those of Castile. Maximilian made another attempt, and offered Don Ferdinand the title of emperor of Italy, which he refused; and, upon this, the ambassadors protested against his returning to Spain till the dispute about the regency was determined. The king told them, there was no such dispute, and set out for Savona, where he had a conference with Lewis the twelfth, at whose request the Grand Captain made the third at their table^f. In the mean time the queen was delivered at Turquemada of the Infanta Donna Catalina, on the 14th of June; and the plague raging in the town, and the queen not being to be persuaded to leave it, the archbishop of Toledo permitted all who would to depart, but remained with her himself, and at length prevailed on her to go to the village of Hornillos^g. The catholic king landed in the kingdom of Valentia on the twentieth of July, went from thence into Castile, and conferred with the queen his daughter, who had always some degree of sense in his presence, and who immediately gave him full powers to govern the dominions of Castile in her name; and two years afterwards, at his request, retired to the castle of Tordesillas, a very pleasant place, six leagues from Valladolid, where she spent the remainder of her days^h. The kingdom was in great confusion, and the greatest part of the nobility discontented; but the king having procured the dignity of a cardinal for the archbishop of Toledo, and, of his own motive, adding the office of inquisitor general, vacant by the death of the archbishop of Seville, secured by his means the clergy, and, by his own equity and moderation, the lesser nobility and the people, governed with his usual firmness, and was, generally speaking, well obeyedⁱ. The emperor Maximilian could not be persuaded that he had no title to the regency of Castile, the revenues of which were so considerable, and to which the Indies were a valuable appendix; but as he was unable to give the catholic king much disturbance himself, he proposed the marriage of the queen Joanna to the king of England; and spread a report, that he had lately concluded a treaty with that prince, in consequence of which he was fitting out a fleet to invade Spain. Don Ferdinand knew this to be a fable; but, pretending to believe it, raised forces, fitted out a fleet, and secured the coasts so effectually, that the malecontents in the emperor's interest were caught in a net of their own weaving, since, without this colour, Ferdinand could not have procured the means to put his kingdom in a state of defence^k. The king proceeded next to arrest the bishop of Badajoz, who had entered into some treasonable practices against his person; and upon the emperor's sending Andreas del Burgo, whom he had banished as a disturber of the public peace, with the title of his ambassador, he ordered him to depart his dominions. In this situation of things the malecontent lords

a laboured to revive the old factions in great towns, which by degrees would have raised a flame through all the territories of Castile.

THE first insurrection happened at Cordova, where a great deal of mischief was done. The king sent the provost of his household to inquire into the tumult, and to punish the authors of it. Upon his arrival, the marquis de Priego sent him an order in writing to quit the place, as a disturber of the public peace. The provost copied his own order, subscribed it, and directed it to the marquis; who was so incensed at this insult to a man of his quality, that he seized and sent him prisoner to one of his fortresses. The catholic king, as soon as he was informed of it, marched with an army towards Cordova, notwithstanding the constable, the duke of Alva, and almost all the Spanish nobility, interceded for the marquis. The Grand Captain, who was that lord's uncle, advised him to surrender himself, and all that he had, into the king's hands; which he did, but without obtaining pardon. The king, however, would not restrain his person, but assigned him a pleasant village for his prison; after which, he sent a commission to Cordova, where the first authors of the revolt were hanged, some others banished, the marquis of Priego forbid to enter the city of Cordova, or the country of Andaluzia, without the king's leave, all his fortresses taken from him, and that of Montilla, in which he had imprisoned the king's provost, razed to the ground¹. This increased the discontent of the nobility, but it kept them very quiet. The emperor sent Don Pedro Guevara and Alonso Romero, who was servant to the marquis of Villena, with secret instructions to his partisans, who entered the kingdom in disguise, and, being apprehended, were put to the torture; the former disclosed all he knew, but the latter would not speak a word^m. The Moors having taken from the Portuguese the town of Arzile, count Pedro Navarro and Ramiro de Guzman, by order of his catholic majesty, assisted them to recover it; which gave the king Don Emanuel such satisfaction, that he sent each of them a present of six thousand crusadoes, which they refused, as having only executed their master's order. Don Emanuel, upon this, sent a person of rank to thank his catholic majesty, but at the same time to complain, that Pedro and Ramiro had taken the island and fortress of Pegnon de Velez, which depended upon the kingdom of Fez, a part of Africa the Portuguese had a right to conquer. Don Ferdinand answered, that from this island the Moors made descents upon the kingdom of Granada; that the taking it had cost some blood, and the keeping it would be attended with a great expence, which, if Don Emanuel was inclined to defray, it was at his serviceⁿ.

AT the time the king had inflamed the malecontent lords to the highest degree, cardinal Ximenes undertook to mediate for them, and, by a dexterous application to their passions, drew from each the secret cause of their dislike to the king, which, as he acted by his direction, he communicated to him; and Don Ferdinand, sending for them singly, and as it were by accident, gratified each in his demand, or gave him an equivalent, upon which the emperor quickly found that in Spain there were no malecontents^o. The league of Cambray, which had been concluded the year before against the Venetians, by the pope, the emperor, the king of France, and the catholic king, for himself and his daughter, was in the beginning of this proclaimed in Spain; and the king having referred the dispute between himself and the emperor to the cardinal of Roban, he pronounced that the catholic king should govern Spain till Don Carlos was of the age of five-and-twenty; that the latter should not take the title of king while his mother lived; and that the catholic king should give them each a pension of fifty thousand ducats, and assist the emperor against the Venetians; which decree he accepted and ratified^p. On the third of March was born the infant Don Juan of Arragon, who died within a few days^q. About this time Ximenes procured the king's leave to undertake the conquest of Oran, from whence it was evident that great advantages would arise to the nation. The troops to be employed were ten thousand foot and four thousand horse; the cardinal was to name his own officers, and command in person; the king was to furnish nothing except a fleet to transport them; and Oran, which was at that time a very flourishing place, and a kind of republic under the protection of the king of Tremecen, was to remain, if conquered, to the cardinal, and his successors in the see of Toledo, till the king should repay the charges of this expedition^r.

THE cardinal employed under him count Pedro Navarro, and signor Vidnelli, his intimate acquaintance, who both proved false and ungrateful, and, by their emissaries, excited a mutiny amongst the troops before they embarked, which the cardinal quieted by his presence. They differed again before they debarked; Navarro and Vianelli, with most of the officers, were for deferring it till the morning, esteeming it dangerous to enter the port of Mazalquivir in the night. However, the cardinal would be obeyed, and entered the port without the loss of a shallop. Upon the landing there was a third dispute; for they insisted, that, considering the nature of the ground, cavalry would be useless; but two thousand horse were landed, and the vessels with the other two thousand on board, were ordered by the cardinal to proceed directly for Oran. In the morning the cardinal, having harangued his army, and given them his blessing, retired at their earnest request to the fortress of Mazalquivir. The Moors were surprized to find the Christians in order of battle at break of day, and much more so when they found themselves terribly cannonaded from the fleet. However, from the advantage of ground, and superiority of numbers, they defended themselves gallantly till they saw the Christian colours flying upon the towers of Oran; for the cardinal, had secret intelligence in the place, which he never discovered, by whom a thousand of the horse dismounted were let in at one of the gates; and another body of horse, in conjunction with those first landed, dissipated and destroyed the Moorish army, when it once began to break. The cardinal, having completed his design before one half of the provisions and ammunition which he had provided were expended, made a present of the whole to the army, and left the command to Don Pedro Navarro, who assumed the title of general of his catholic majesty's forces, and, with that character, conquered the city and kingdom of Bugia, forced the kings of Tunis and Tremecen to become tributaries, as also the city of Algiers, and performed other great exploits, till, pushing his conquests too far, he suffered a defeat, and lost the best part of his troops. As for the cardinal, he retired as privately after his return as he could to Alcala, where he was then founding a university; and not only refused applause, but declined appearing in public, in order to avoid it. It was this year that the king prevailed upon his daughter to remove to Tordesillas, himself residing for the most part at Valladolid, from whence making her frequent visits, and carrying persons of the highest quality with him, he obliged her to quit the indecent habit she wore, and, having placed several ladies of great rank about her, brought her to live in quite another manner than she had done.

King Ferdinand daunts the spirit of the malecontents, and governs peaceably.

THE king Don Ferdinand went the next year into Aragon, to hold the states of that kingdom at Moncon, and in the mean time left the administration in Castile to cardinal Ximenes. Upon his return in the autumn, several of the grandees of Castile, who had disputes with each other, which they durst not decide after the old method, by arms, and which they thought it beneath them to leave to the law, went of themselves to the king, and desired that he would decide them, which he did, not as regent, but as an umpire, voluntarily chosen by the parties; and, which is very singular, generally contented both sides; and by this expedient many feuds were extinguished which had lasted through several generations. On the sixth of October he opened an assembly of the states at Madrid; and there, in pursuance of his composition with the emperor, swore well and faithfully to administer the government; and likewise obtained a considerable subsidy for defraying the expence of the war against the Moors. In Italy, the king and the pope, having received satisfaction from the Venetians, detached themselves in effect from the league of Cambray; and, tho', by this measure, they deserted their allies, yet they certainly preserved that republic, which must otherwise have been destroyed. As the pope durst not have taken this step but in concert with the king, so, to fix him absolutely to his party, he declared the French monarch had forfeited all title to the kingdom of Naples; and, upon the twenty-third of July, granted the investiture to Don Ferdinand, with the tribute reserved from king Charles of 8000 ounces of gold, to be paid annually into the apostolic chamber; but, on the seventh of August, this was changed into a present of a white horse decently equipped, which is all the tribute that has been paid ever since. Count Pedro Navarro was this year routed before Tripoli, with the loss of several thousand men; and Don Garcia de Toledo, eldest son of the duke of Alva, through the rashness, or rather rapaciousness, of the count; and this year also Vianelli was killed; but the king, notwithstanding, persisted in his resolution of carrying on the war.

By making a great armament obtains many advantages without a blow.

THE catholic king went in the month of January to Seville, in order to hasten the vast military preparations that he had caused to be made on the coasts throughout his whole dominions; and declared publicly, that the war he intended was against the Moors, and that he meant to go himself into Africa. His subjects in general, and more especially the nobility and people of Castile, were very much alarmed at this project, and applied themselves to him in the most dutiful manner to divert him from that design. In France, however, they had other notions; and Lewis the twelfth said publicly, "I am the Moor and Saracen against whom they arm in Spain." He acquired the reputation of a great politician by the event; but this armament, notwithstanding, had all the effect which Don Ferdinand intended; it brought the Moors to submission, obliged them to restore all the Christian slaves in their hands, to become his vassals, and to pay him large sums annually by way of tribute;

a it had also a good effect in Italy, into which country, when the king condescended to lay aside his expedition into Africa, he sent many thousands of his old troops, and at length declared his resolution to support pope Julius the second against all who should adhere to the council of Pisa, whom he treated as heretics. He entered into a league with king Henry VIII. A. D. 1511. of England against France; and sent to admonish the king of Navarre not to have any thing to do with schismatics; and to be very careful that the French did not make an irruption through his territories into those of Aragon. To which he received a civil return; tho' it is scarce to be doubted that all the parties, even at this time, had taken their measures, and were determined how to act^b.

THE king of France had great ambition, if not to be the master, yet at least to be the Conqueror; Nab arbiter, of Italy. Maximilian, who saw no great advantages that could redound to him from varre, in con-the war, was willing enough to get out of it. As for the pope, he was so provoked with sequence of a Lewis the twelfth for procuring and protecting the council of Pisa, that he first called in the league benefi-Swiss to drive his subjects out of Italy, and took a resolution next of excommunicating that cial only to king. To bring so great a design to bear, he entered into a league with his catholic majesty himself.
 and the Venetians, and the former laboured to bring the king of England to declare himself also for the league^c. The army of the allies opened the campaign with the siege of Bologna, which they were obliged to raise. A battle ensued not long after, in which they were beat, but in which, notwithstanding, the Spanish infantry acquired great honour, and killed the French general Gaston de Foix, brother to queen Germana^d. This success of the French increased the c confused state of things in Italy, and was the true cause of a new revolution in that country before the close of the year; for the allies in general, knowing that it is the genius of the French to push their victories, used so much diligence, and acted with so much diffidence of each other, that, with the assistance of the Swiss, they carried their point almost every-where.
 In the mean time the catholic king, who had brought over the English monarch Henry the eighth, with a great army, into France, and procured potent succours from thence, under colour of recovering Guienne, judged it a fit opportunity to let his neighbours see what were his true designs, and who in reality were the Moors and Saracens he intended to humble^e.
John de Albret, who, in right of his wife, was at that time king of Navarre, was supposed to have an attachment to the crown of France. Upon this foundation the duke of Alva was d sent with a small army of choice troops, to demand a passage through that kingdom into France; and that the prince of Viana, and three of the best fortresses in the kingdom, should be put into his hands by way of security, that the king did nothing against the interests of Ferdinand. These terms being rejected, Pampeluna was besieged and taken, and the better part of the kingdom reduced. The French made some efforts to recover it, but without success; and, after they were repulsed, the duke of Alva completed his conquest^f. Thus while other great powers were wasting their blood and treasure about they knew not well what, and wearied each other into peace with little or no advantage, Don Ferdinand acquired, or, as many authors say, usurped, a kingdom that lay very convenient for him, and so became a greater gainer by the war than any, or indeed than all the other powers together. At this e juncture the catholic king was in the zenith of his glory; and though, without question, he was one of the most potent princes in Europe, yet his superior reach in politics made him more respected than the terror of his arms; so that the penetrating his mysterious measures was the constant aim of the ablest statesmen in most of the courts of Europe^g.

THE French monarch, by the advice of cardinal Carvajal, demanded a truce of Ferdinand Falls into a for a year in Spain, while the affairs of Italy were left to the chance of war. The catholic low and lan-king gave so much countenance to this, as brought a French ambassador to his court; which guishing con-so much alarmed his allies, that they were very silent on several topics upon which they had dition, with been troublesomely solicitous before. The king's subjects also reaped all the benefits of the little hopes of f truce during the continuance of the treaty; and the king was at liberty to act as he thought recovery.
 proper, if he had seen a favourable occasion; but, except repulsing John Albret, king of Navarre, who endeavoured to recover his kingdom, and an expedition or two of no great importance against the Moors in Africa, there passed nothing remarkable this year, at least on this side; for as to the war in Italy, it belongs to another place^h. As to civil concerns, the king proceeded in deciding, or rather compromising, disputes among the nobility; and acted with some rigour against Don Pedro Gironne, who seized the best part of the duchy of Medina Sidonia, under pretence that he was heir to the duke, as having married his sister of the whole blood, notwithstanding he left a brother Don Alonso, to whom the king decreed itⁱ. A little before Easter the king went from Valladolid to Medina del Campo, and from thence to Carrioncillo, an exceeding pleasant place, where a French cook belonging to queen Ger-

mana made him a strengthening soup, which he flattered him (for what monarch is there so wise as not to be flattered?) would enable him to beget an heir to his hereditary dominions, of which he was very desirous. But it had a quite different effect; for, upon retiring, as his custom was, into a convent, during Passion-Week, he fell into a languishing condition, and was thenceforward afflicted with a deep melancholy, so that he took no other diversion than hunting, which afforded him an opportunity of riding by himself in forests and deep vallies, which served only to nourish that humour, which, while it preyed upon his spirits, reduced his body to a skeleton, and wasted him with a slow disease, from which he could obtain no relief by physic^k. This revived the hopes of those who, though they had been long forced to dissemble it, were enemies to his person and government, and excited a spirit of intrigue in others, who laboured to recommend his grandson Don Ferdinand, to the prejudice of the archduke Charles; which created such a prospect of future troubles, as gave all, who had a just concern for the public welfare and tranquility, infinite anxiety and terror.

His declining state of health did not hinder Don Ferdinand from attending to affairs of state; neither did it impair, at least in any discernable degree, his faculties for business. The death of the queen of France gave occasion to his consort to send the bishop of Tripoli with compliments of condolance to her uncle, as well as to put him in mind of her right to the inheritance of her brother the duke of Nemours. The king charged this prelate with a commission of much greater importance, which was, to get the truce lately renewed for another year converted into a solid peace; to facilitate which, he offered that the infant Don Ferdinand should espouse the second daughter of the most Christian king, and proposed a marriage between that king and the infanta Donna Leonora his daughter^l. This, however, came to nothing; for Henry the eighth of England, being equally offended at his renewing the truce with France, and at the delay of the archduke Charles's marriage with his sister the princess Mary, resolved to make both him and the emperor sensible of his displeasure, by concluding a peace with the French, and giving his sister to their king; both which measures were quickly carried into execution, notwithstanding all the pains his catholic majesty's daughter, queen Catherine, could take to prevent them^m. The war continued hot in Italy, where the king could not depend so much on pope Leo the tenth as he had done on his predecessor. However, he laboured, and with success, to free the Genoese intirely from the French yoke; but his endeavours to procure a peace among the Italians were ineffectual, notwithstanding Selim, emperor of the Turks, threatened Italy with an invasion, which gave Don Ferdinand, who never let such opportunities slip, a pretext for arming by land and sea, in Catalonia, Sicily, and Sardinia, as well as in Castile, under colour of providing for the defence of Christendom against the infidels, but with an intention, as it was generally believed, to make use of them where-ever his interest might require. This armament, however, had a great effect; it awed the Turks, kept all his neighbours in suspense, preserved his conquests in Africa, and procured fresh submissions, and presents to a very great value, from the Moorish princes in that countryⁿ.

A. D. 1514.

Is extremely offended with the behaviour of the states of Arragon.

On the accession of Francis the first to the French throne, the catholic king began to apprehend that he would go in person into Italy; and upon his sending an ambassador, with high professions of esteem and friendship, and strong assurances that he would observe the peace concluded by his predecessor, the king answered, that he would observe it punctually, provided it was extended to Italy^o. He knew that this was not what the French king intended, and consequently the war would break out afresh; he summoned the states of Castile, Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, in order to raise money for the execution of his great designs. In the assembly of the states of Castile at Burgos, he carried his point to the full extent of his wishes, by annexing Navarre to the kingdoms of Castile and Leon for ever^p. He had not, however, the like success in his hereditary dominions; the queen, whom he sent to hold in his name the states of Arragon, meeting with a very warm and obstinate opposition^q. On the twenty-seventh of July, while he was at Burgos, he was taken with such a violent fit of vomiting in the night, that he was very near dying without assistance. This induced him to make his will, his physicians assuring him that he had not long to live, by which he left the regency of Spain, and the grand mastership of all the orders, to the infant Don Ferdinand. He recovered, however, and gave audience to the deputies from the states of Arragon, who came to offer him whatever supplies he judged requisite, provided he would repeal the law which gave vassals a right to sue for redress in the king's courts. To this Don Ferdinand answered roundly, that he would not purchase a supply at the expence of the liberties of his subjects: that, before his reign, the vassals of the nobility were their slaves: that he had made them free, and would keep them so; and, having said this, he ordered them to quit his presence^r. He sent for cardinal Ximenes to

- a preside in the royal council of Segovia, and then went in person to the states of Arragon. He found them in a very ill temper; and though he had the clergy and the deputies from cities on his side, yet the greater and lesser nobility persisted firmly in their first opinions; which threw the king into such a rage, that he reproached them bitterly with want of duty to their sovereign, and of affection for their fellow subjects¹. He then ordered his son, the archbishop of Saragossa, to go to that city (for the states were held at Calatayud), and to demand in his name a free gift from the inhabitants, which they very cheerfully and readily granted, and most of the great towns followed their example, to the no small regret of the nobility. He next undertook to restore a perfect understanding with the court of London, to which he sent his agent Gilibert, with very rich presents for the king, and with as valuable, though perhaps not quite so magnificent, to cardinal Wolsey, by which that monarch was induced to renew his treaties. The cardinal acquainted him with all the intrigues of the archduke, who was just declared of age in Flanders, and of his design to send the dean of Louvain with a formal compliment to his majesty, but with secret instructions to pry into every thing, and send him an exact account of his measures; which piece of secret intelligence Don Ferdinand received with secret satisfaction².

- THIS year the Turks had a considerable fleet at sea, or rather a Moorish fleet in their service, under the command of the famous pirate Barbarossa. The places, however, that were held by the catholic king upon the coast of Barbary, were so well fortified and provided, that they were not able to give them much disturbance, except besieging Bugia, which they would certainly have taken, if it had not been relieved by a fleet from Majorca, which the viceroy fitted out without waiting for the king's orders³. The king Don Ferdinand removed from Valladolid, with an intent to pass the winter in Andalusia, in hopes that air and exercise would do him good, and, in his way thither, stopped at Placentia. There he received the dean of Louvain, who came from the archduke; and, treating him with great civility and kindness, drew from him many things. He engaged him to use his interest with his master, that Chievres, his first minister, might have nothing to do with Spain; and, when he had made what use of him he could, he ordered him to go to Guadalupe, there to wait his return⁴. The war in Italy this year was very warm, Francis the first being there in person, who gained a great victory over the Swiss in the neighbourhood of Milan, and soon after became master of that city. In the progress of the war, he derived great advantages from the military skill of count Pedro of Navarro, whose ransom he paid, and whom he engaged in his service, by affording him various instances of his generosity⁵. Towards the close of the year died Don Ferdinand Gonçales de Cordova, surnamed the Great Captain, who had rendered such eminent services to the catholic king, and whose intrigues with the emperor, the king of France, the archduke, and other potentates, had given him inexpressible inquietude to the very last, so that he considered his death rather with satisfaction than regret⁶.

- THE king having advanced in his journey as far as Truxillo, and having ordered his son the infant Don Ferdinand, with his governor Don Pedro de Guzman, to Guadalupe, he set out for the same place, and, hunting by the way, came to the village of Madrigalejo, so poor and inconsiderable, that finding himself extremely ill, he was obliged to take up his lodgings at an inn, as it was the only tolerable house in the place. He called immediately for his confessor father Matienzo, and received the sacraments of church. He then sent for the counsellors Zapata and Carvajal, of whom he demanded what they thought of his disposition of the regency of Castile in favour of the infant Don Ferdinand. They told him honestly, that it would prove very prejudicial to Spain, as it was impossible that he should discharge that trust himself; and therefore, as it must pass into other hands, his majesty was the best judge to whom it ought to be confided. The king then declared, by his last will and testament, the queen Donna Joanna his daughter the sole heiress of all his dominions; and, after her, his grandson Don Carlos. He left the queen Germana a pension of thirty thousand florins per annum, and the infant Don Ferdinand a revenue of fifty thousand ducats, charged on the revenue of the kingdom of *Naples*⁷. He declared cardinal Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, regent of *Castile*⁸, and his natural son the archbishop of Saragossa regent of Arragon, and also of the several kingdoms dependant upon that crown⁹. He signed his will on the twenty-second of *January*¹⁰, the queen arriving from Lerida the same day; and the next morning, Mariana says between twelve and one, Zurita between one and two, Ferreras between two and three, he expired, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and in the forty-second year of his reign over Castile, and in the thirty-seventh over Arragon, that is, at the very entrance of the year, his father dying on the nineteenth, as he did on the twenty-third, of January. Besides his legitimate children by his two queens, who have been already mentioned, he had by Donna Aldonca Iborra, before his marriage with queen Isabella, Don Alonso of Arragon, archbishop of Arragon and Valentia, and Donna Joanna of Arragon, whom he married to Don Bernard de Velasco, constable of Castile; and by two other women, one a native of Biscay, and the other of Portugal, he had two daughters, who were nuns^c. Besides his hereditary kingdoms, which he bequeathed to the heiress of Castile, he added, by conquest, those of Granada, Naples, and Navarre. He directed his body to be interred in the capital of the first-mentioned, near that of Donna Isabella^f. In its passage thither, under the care of the marquis of Denia, master of his household, it was received with great marks of respect by the nobility, but with much warmer tokens of affection from the people, who lamented their loss with great sincerity, and called him with great justice their father and their deliverer^g. His panegyrists would have us believe him a perfect prince^h; his enemies allege, that he was not heroically brave, and by no means a slave to his wordⁱ. He had his virtues, he had his imperfections; but, take him all together, he was, properly speaking, the founder of the Spanish monarchy, and one of the greatest and wisest princes that ever sat upon a throne.

The reign of Charles I. king of Spain, commonly stiled (by his superior title) the emperor Charles V. from his assuming, to his abdication, of the regal titles.

Accession of the archduke Charles, who immediately assumes the regal title.

THE royal council, of which the archbishop of Granada was president, gave immediate notice to the cardinal archbishop of Toledo of his being declared regent, and then removed to Guadalupe, where the infant Don Ferdinand was with the dean of Louvain, who, upon the cardinal's arrival, disputed with him the regency, as having himself received full powers, in case of the king's death, from Don Carlos. To this the cardinal answered roundly, that the archduke had no power to vest that authority in any, since, by the will of queen Isabella, he was not called to the succession till of full age: he added, that, if he had any such power, he could not constitute the dean regent, because he was a foreigner, and, as such, excluded by the laws. Upon this, the dean offered to act subservient to the cardinal, which he readily accepted, and the council removed to Madrid^a. Things were carried somewhat higher in the kingdom of Arragon, where the chief justice refused to acknowledge the archbishop of Saragossa in quality of regent^b. As soon as Charles received the news of his grandfather's death at Brussels, he dispatched a commission, confirming Ximenes in the regency, and at the same time acquainted him with the reasons that had induced him to assume the title of king, which were, that pope Leo and the emperor Maximilian, in their letters, had given him that title, which therefore he desired might be confirmed in Spain^c. The cardinal, for this purpose, called an assembly of the principal nobility of Castile, where the point was warmly debated; and in which it is highly probable the nobles would have put a negative upon the king's request, if the cardinal had not suddenly cut the thing short, by saying, the king did not stand in need of their authority to confirm his title, but had asked their assent from a spirit of decency and complaisance; at the same time he ordered the officers to display the royal standard for Don Carlos the first^d. This proclamation was made on the thirteenth of April, and, while he was proclaiming, the council unanimously confirmed the measure. They saw opposition was in vain, and concurred with a good grace in what they could not help. Some of the most considerable would have had recourse to their old method of a confederacy; and applied themselves, with this design, to the duke of Infantado, who assured them, that he thought himself as ill used as any by the cardinal, but advised them first to send a deputation, to demand of him a sight of the powers in virtue of which he acted. The cardinal received the deputation very obligingly, and promised him satisfaction the next day; and, when they came again for that purpose, shewed them a corps of two thousand old troops, and a train of artillery, that were drawn out before his palace, adding, "These are the powers by which I mean to govern Spain till the king shall arrive^e." This was so much the cardinal's opinion, and he had so little notion of authority being respected without force, that, observing the govern-

a ment of king Ferdinand had thrown a great weight of property into the hands of the citizens and commons throughout Spain, he granted commissions of array, that, whenever it should be necessary, they might be in a condition to defend themselves; and, by this stroke of policy, created a standing army of thirty thousand men in a short time, well disciplined, who were content to serve, without putting the crown to the expence either of pay or quarters^f. John de Albret, the dethroned king of Navarre, with a considerable army which he had raised in France, endeavoured the recovery of his dominions, in which he was prevented by the vigour and vigilance of cardinal Ximenes, who sent a small body of old troops, under the command of Don Ferdinand Villalva, an old officer, to secure the passes into that country, by whom the king's forces were defeated, and the marshal of Navarre taken prisoner; which so afflicted the king and queen, that neither of them survived long after^g. The cardinal then ordered all the numerous fortresses in Navarre to be demolished, leaving the fortifications only of Pampeluna; which raised a great clamour, as the title to that kingdom was none of the clearest; but the cardinal thought Don Ferdinand was to answer for the acquisition; and that, in quality of regent, it was his business to keep it^h. A. D. 1516. In Naples, queen Joanna and her son Don Carlos were proclaimed with little opposition; but in Sicily, the people revolted, not against the king, but the viceroyⁱ. The corsair Barbarossa beat the Spaniards before Algiers, and made himself master of that place, and strangled the Moorish prince who had called him to his assistance^k.

c THE Flemish ministers who were about king Charles, perceiving how great a capacity the cardinal had, with what superior abilities he governed the dominions of Castile, while the archbishop of Saragossa, though the son of king Ferdinand, and a native of Aragon, could not persuade the states to proclaim their master king, or to acknowledge him for regent, advised him to send the cardinal orders to regulate the debts of the crown, to resume what had been unjustly usurped from its domains, and to call those to an account who had been intrusted with the revenue; that these necessary but difficult parts of government might be regulated before his majesty's arrival, and the blame of any severity that might appear in it be rather charged on that minister than on themselves. The cardinal, on receiving the king's orders, demanded letters patent in full form, and with an augmentation of power, and on that condition undertook to execute what was enjoined^l. At first this created some uneasiness at Brussels; but at length they advised the king to gratify the cardinal, and to intrust him with the power of bestowing governments, places of judicature, and offices of the revenue; but at the same time they increased the number of his colleagues, which gave him the less uneasiness, as he suffered none to share in his authority. The cardinal went through this difficult work with great dexterity, recovered several considerable lordships to the crown, but without requiring any account of the profits; and, as often as there was any pretence for doing it, gave those from whom they were taken money, or some other equivalent. Such as had been guilty of fraud or oppression in collecting or managing the public revenue, he punished severely, and, out of their fines and confiscations, discharged the debts of the crown. The great governments he bestowed upon the principal nobility; the less upon such as had raised themselves by their merit; in which he had a particular regard to old officers who had served long in the army, and, above all things, he was circumspect in the choice of those whom he raised to judicial offices. By this method he so qualified the rigour of his administration, and made his disinterested zeal for the public so apparent, that it began to rise above that envy which his grandeur had excited^m.

YET all he did was not equally pleasing to all men; for his removing the governor of Tordesillas, and a great part of the queen's household, was ill taken by many, though he did it because they soothed the queen in her melancholy; and those whom he placed near her did all they could to amuse and divert her, and even to awake her ambition; which they did so far, as to engage her to dress in a manner suitable to her quality, and even to go out of the castle to hear mass, when people were placed in the street to cry, Long live the queen! and to give other testimonies of joy, with which she was extremely pleased; and this the king approved so much, that he writ him a letter of thanks for it with his own handⁿ. He prevented likewise the Jews from obtaining an exemption from the penal laws, for which they offered a large sum of money; and, upon the pope's demanding a great sum of money from the clergy, under colour of a war with the Turks, he prevented that likewise, being persuaded, that, if such a precedent was once made, it would be frequently followed^o. But there were some other mischiefs which he could not prevent, such as the quarrels amongst the nobility, the tumults in Valladolid, and other great cities, and the great sums of money that were sent out of the kingdom to purchase the favour of the Flemish ministers^a. In the month of August the king landed at St. Andero, and immediately sent a courier to acquaint the cardinal and council with his arrival, who thereupon set out from Madrid to meet him, and to execute some orders he had before received by an express dispatched from the king when he embarked^a. On the road, he was poisoned in a trout upon which he dined, though the effects did not presently discover themselves^a. When he arrived at Aranda, where he found the infant Don Ferdinand, he suddenly posted guards about his palace, shut the city gates, and then signified to Don Pedro de Guzman his governor, and the bishop of Astorga his preceptor, the king's orders to withdraw, which afflicted the infant extremely^a. Advancing as far as Roja, to meet the king, his distemper began to shew itself with such violence, that he found he had not long to live; and therefore, laying aside all concern for worldly affairs, b he applied his thoughts to the means of making such an end as might be suitable to his life, and so expired on the eighth of November^a (G). Some say his death was hastened by his disgrace;

(G) The reputation of cardinal Ximenes is so great, and we find him so frequently mentioned in other histories, as well as of Spain, that we shall probably do the reader a pleasure in taking notice of a few particulars relating chiefly to his private life. The greatest part of the Spanish writers agree, that though his father was in low circumstances, yet the family of Cisneros was of antient nobility (1): if so, the cardinal took care not to discredit them by the addition of any modern titles, of which he bestowed some upon men of merit, but left his relations nearly in the same state in which he found them. In all probability this proceeded from a settled persuasion that it was the best for them. In the midst of his greatness, he went one summer to the village where he was born, visited his kindred, and entertained them with all the marks of kindness and affection possible. Amongst the rest, there was an old man who lived very decently upon a narrow income, and took great pains in breeding up his children. He was baking his bread in little cakes when the cardinal came, on which he ran up stairs to change his cloaths; but he made him come down immediately: "Your dress, and your business, said he, very well become your station; take care that your bread don't burn, we can discourse together while you are turning it." He inquired afterwards into the number and circumstances of his family, and, when he took his leave, gave him wherewithal to provide for them (2). His humility was very unaffected, and broke out sometimes very unexpectedly; he was present once when doctor Nicholas de Pax was explaining the philosophy of Raymund Lully; and, in speaking to the question, whether that famous man had the philosophers stone, or not, he took notice of a passage in the Psalms, which has been thought to look that way: "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill, that he may set him with the princes, even with the princes of his people." That portion of Scripture, said the cardinal may be much more naturally interpreted; for instance, in my own case; and then ran out into a long detail of his own meanness, and the wonderful manner in which he had been exalted, and this in so pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from all who were present. Those who lived in and near his time believed that he had the gift of prophecy, which arose chiefly from the two brothers, Charles and Ferdinand, saying frequently, on the great events of their life, "This was foretold me by cardinal Cisneros." It is very certain, that he advised Charles to send his brother out of Spain, and to divide his dominions with him. "This, said he, will constitute two great houses, and in your turns you may be both

"emperors;" which, as he took his advice, actually came to pass (3). But what came nearer to this point was, the agreement he framed between Ferdinand the Catholic and his son-in-law Philip. He took the oaths of each of them, and, at the time he took them, he said, "Remember what I tell you, if you break this oath, you will not long survive it;" which was actually the case with respect to Philip, who broke it, and died soon after (4). He had a great contempt for what were stiled the arts of a court, and would never use them. Don Pedro Portocarrero, who was with king Charles in Flanders, wrote to him, that he had many enemies there, and advised him to make use of a cypher. He thanked him for his intelligence and his friendship, but rejected the expedient. "I have nothing, said he, that I desire to conceal; and, if I write any thing that is amiss, I will not deprive my enemies of their evidence." He behaved sternly himself to the nobility, but he advised both Ferdinand and Charles not to treat them with rigour. "Ambition, said he, is their common crime, and you will do well to make submission their only punishment (5)." His coadjutor Adrian was miserably disturbed at the libels that flew about; but Ximenes, who was as little spared, bore them with great temper. "We act, said he, and we must give others leave, to speak; if what they say is false, we may laugh; if true, we ought to mend." However, he sometimes searched the printers and booksellers; but, as he gave previous notice, it may be presumed he did not often meet with things that could give offence (6). The great object of his care was the revenue of his archbishoprick; with which, however great, he did such things as could scarce have been expected from it, more especially as one half of it was constantly distributed in alms, about which he was so circumspect, that no fraud could be committed. He was very plain in his habit and in his furniture; but he knew the value of fine things, and would sometimes admire them. He once looked upon a rich jewel, and asked its price; the merchant told him: "It is a very fine thing, said he, and worth the money, but the army is just disbanded; there are many poor soldiers, and with the value of it I can send a couple of hundred of them home with each a piece of gold in his pocket." All his foundations, and others acts of generosity, were out of the other moiety. His university of Alcala was a most stupendous foundation, begun and finished in eight years; he endowed there forty-six professorships, and at his death left it a settled revenue of fourteen thousand ducats per annum. His regulations must have cost him at least as much thought as his buildings and endowments. He saw

- a disgrace; the bishop of Badajos, who had many obligations to him, and whom he intended to have made his coadjutor, having, to please the king's minister Chievres, induced that prince to write him a letter of dismissal, which others say he did not receive till in his last agony, so that he never knew its contents^u. The king went with his sister Donna Leonora to Tordesillas, to pay his duty to his mother, and thither came the archbishop of Saragossa, to make a report of the affairs of Arragon; but Chievres, being apprehensive that he might demand the archbishoprick of Toledo, which he intended for his nephew, prevailed upon the king not to see him, and to refuse him an audience of the queen Donna Joanna for the same reason^v. This was the first disgust given to the Spaniards by the king; and perhaps would never have happened if cardinal Ximenes had once seen him, and had given him the lessons he intended;
- b to prevent which, those who dreaded their effects had recourse to that detestable expedient which has been before-mentioned. There were some commotions this year in Sicily, though the king had changed the viceroy, and the Moors also began to infest the coasts of Granada and Andalusia^x.

In the month of January the Cortes, or assembly of the states, met at Valladolid, in which it was proposed, that the king should promise to observe the laws made at Burgos seven years before, that no foreigners should be capable of any dignity or employment either in church or state, in Castile, and that no money should be sent out of the kingdom; but the bishop of Badajos having represented to them, that they ought not to suspect their monarch, and assured them he would grant all they desired, they took the usual oaths, and granted him a free gift of six hundred thousand ducats, payable in three years; after which, he promised to observe the laws, and more especially those on which they most insisted^y. The king caused his sister Donna Catalina to be privately taken from her mother; but, the queen refusing to eat or drink for two days, there was a necessity for sending her back^z. After this, the king having appointed a council of regency, went to hold the states of Arragon, and, in his passage, had an interview with his brother, whom he persuaded to go to Flanders, being jealous of his remaining in Spain, where he was infinitely beloved. About this time he named William de Croy, Chievres's nephew, to the archbishoprick of Toledo, which was highly disagreeable to the people of Castile^a. He arrived at Saragossa in the beginning of May, where, though he confirmed all their privileges, yet they made a difficulty of owning him for their king while the queen his mother lived; but at last they were prevailed upon by the archbishop of Saragossa not only to proclaim, but also to grant him a free gift of two hundred thousand crowns^b. His kind usage and respect so wrought on queen Germana, that she made a voluntary cession of her rights to the kingdom of Navarre, not, as Ferreras, tho' otherwise an exact historian, says, as the heiress of the house of Albret, but of the house of Foix^c; and here also he consented, for reasons of state, to the marriage of his sister Donna Leonora to the king of Portugal.

clearly that ignorance was the bane of religion, and the only thing that made the inquisition necessary; for, if men understood the Christian religion, there could be no need to fear either Judaism or Mohammedism. Cardinal Granvelle, when he came into Spain, and had attentively considered this foundation, delivered his opinion in these words: "Time delights in hiding the origin of things; though we know it not, this man must have been of royal race, or at least the soul of a prince lodged in his private bosom." His granaries were likewise so amazing, so well built, that they are not yet in decay; so well contrived, that they are always full: those at Toledo hold twenty thousand measures of corn, those at Alcala ten thousand, those at Tordelaguna, where he was born, five thousand, those at Cisneros, where his family was settled, the same quantity. His hospitals and his nunneries, in conjunction with these granaries, have banished want from his diocese. It was supposed that he would have left the direction of all these to his own order, and it was intimated to him. "By no means," said the cardinal: out of the revenue of the see of Toledo have I done all this, God forbid I should deprive the prelates my successors of their right, or their reward for seeing them duly applied." He was, however, no flatterer of prelates; for, upon visiting his diocese, and finding in the church of the Franciscans at Toledo a marble tomb near the altar, for Don Troilo Carillo, the son of his predecessor, he ordered the inscription to be effaced, and the tomb to be removed. "It is better," said he, that the remains of this child of sin should lie in some obscure place, than this mark of a bishop's incontinency should stare here mankind in the face." He was very learned himself, and the great patron and protector of learning; he wrote several pieces of divinity, that were never printed, as also the life of king Wamba, and some notes upon the scripture, which are yet preserved. He caused the works of Tostatus to be printed, at a vast expence, at Venice. The Complutensian edition of the holy Scriptures, which was the first polyglot ever printed, cost him a prodigious sum, besides the maintenance of all the learned persons employed in it, the manuscripts he purchased at immense rates, and the pains he took himself in revising and correcting. He was also at great charge in publishing the Mezarabic liturgy, for which he had so high a veneration, that he established a chapel with twelve canons for reviving this office; and, with regard to other foundations, we have no room to enumerate them. Upon the whole, we have great reason to believe that he spoke truth when he said, upon his death-bed, that, to the best of his knowledge, he had not misapplied a single crown of his revenue. Philip the fourth was at great pains to have procured his canonization with the popes Innocent the tenth and Alexander the seventh; but we have never been let into the reasons why they did not succeed.

tugal, who had married her two aunts before, which was a new subject of distaste ^d. Towards ^a
 A. D. 1518. the close of the year the great cities in Castile began to form a confederacy for the redress of grievances, and sent an agent into Arragon, to make remonstrances to the king. In Africa the Spaniards restored the Moorish king of Tremecen, and killed the famous corsair Barbarossa, who was succeeded by his brother; but a fleet that was fitted out for the recovery of Algiers was dispersed by a tempest, and most of the vessels of which it was composed lost ^e. This year also the king was elected, in the dyet at Augsburg, king of the Romans, though his grandfather was more inclined to his brother Don Ferdinand, and the French king Francis the first had also a party who favoured his election ^f.

*Is elected emperor on the

In the beginning of the ensuing year the king went into Catalonia, where he met with the like difficulties as in Arragon, but at length they were got over. He was at Barcelona when ^b he received the news of the death of his grandfather Maximilian, and remained there till he had advice of his own election, which was made on the 28th of June ^g, and accepted by his ambassadors. Pope Leo having granted him the tenths of all ecclesiastical revenues for the support of his war against the Turks, he ordered an assembly of the clergy to be held at Barcelona, in which Adrian, formerly dean of Louvain, now cardinal bishop of Tortosa, presided; but, notwithstanding all he could say, the clergy refused to gratify the king, or to obey the pope; which so irritated Leo the tenth, that he put Castile under an interdict; but this being their own case, the clergy found out, that, when the pope's censures were without any just cause, they ought to have no effect; and the king thereupon interceding with the pope, it was recalled ^h. In the month of November the duke of Bavaria arrived in character ^c of ambassador from the empire; and, at his first audience, did homage to Don Carlos, who now first assumed the title of majesty, in which he was imitated by other kings ⁱ. We shall conform to the common usage, and stile him hereafter emperor, though the Spanish writers never gave him any other title than that of king ^k. Towards the close of the year there was a dangerous insurrection in Valentia, in which the emperor acted a strange part. The commons, that is, the several incorporated companies of tradesmen in that city, entered into a solemn confederacy, under pretence of redressing the grievances they laboured under from the nobility; and the emperor being informed that the nobles and clergy were determined to oppose his demands in the assembly of the states, encouraged them, and actually put the government of the city into their hands ^l. This year the famous Ferdinand Magellan received ^d the emperor's commission to sail in quest of a new passage to the Moluccas, and departed from the port of Seville, with a squadron of five vessels, on the 8th of August; but the history of this expedition belongs to another place.

At the time the troubles broke out in Valentia, the city was so much afflicted with the plague, that most of the nobility were absent; but, as it ceased in the winter, they began to return to their houses in the beginning of the year, but met with a very bad reception from the populace, who gave their confederacy the title of Germania, implying the confederacy of patriots, or true friends to their country. The nobles sent a deputation to the emperor, to represent to him the inconveniencies that attended his concessions. The emperor promised them fair, and, having sworn to observe the laws and privileges of the kingdom, sent cardinal ^e Adrian to open the states; but upon their refusing to consent to any thing, unless his majesty was present, he confirmed all that he had formerly done in favour of the Germanats, which augmented the troubles ^m. As he was resolved to return into Flanders, and from thence to proceed into the empire, he appointed an assembly of the states of Castile at Compostella in Galicia; a step never taken by any of his predecessors, and which increased the discontent that reigned throughout that kingdom. He went from Barcelona to Saragossa, and from thence to Valladolid, where the deputies of Toledo and Salamanca met him, and desired an audience, which he put off, on pretence that he was in a hurry to set off for Compostella. The next day, going to visit his mother at Tordesillas, a rumour prevailed that he was going directly to embark, and would take the queen with him; upon which a general insurrection ^f was raised at Valladolid, in which his person was in some danger, and the court extremely alarmed. This provoked him exceedingly; but when he came to know the truth, he was appeased, and only a few of the seditious were punished ⁿ. At Compostella the states fell into such confusion, that, after banishing the deputies of Toledo, the king adjourned them to Corunna, where, partly by threats, partly by promises, he obtained a subsidy of two hundred millions of marvadies, notwithstanding the cities of Toledo, Salamanca, Toro, Murcia, Madrid, Cordova, and others, protested against it ^o. He then appointed cardinal Adrian regent of Castile and Leon, and the governors of other parts of his dominions; after which he embarked, on the 21st of May, with a few Spanish lords and all his Flemish ministers, who carried away a an immense sum of money, and in six days arrived in the port of Sandwich, where he was received by cardinal Wolsey, to whom he promised the bishopric of Badajoz; but, instead of it, gave him a pension of two thousand five hundred ducats, and who was much more in his secrets than his master. However, king Henry met him, and conducted him to Canterbury, A. D. 1520. where he passed the Whitsun holidays, and where, if we may believe a certain historian^p, he fell in love with the king's sister, the queen dowager of France; and, after remitting the disputes between him and the French monarch to the decision of king Henry, he embarked on the 30th of May for Flanders, and landed safely at Flushing^q.

THE city of Toledo had revolted before his departure, and soon after most of the great cities in Castile followed its example; and those who entered into this league stiled themselves Los Comuneros, or the commons^r. Don Juan Padilla, excited chiefly by his wife Donna Maria Pacheco, daughter to the count of Tendilla, was at the head of those malecontents, and quickly assembled a great army, in which they carried a black standard. On the 2d of September they seized Tordesillas, where Don Juan had an audience of the queen, and told her, that her son Don Carlos having quitted his dominions precipitately, and a civil war being likely to arise, they had brought her the forces of Toledo, Segovia, and Madrid, for her security. The queen said, if she had known her father was dead, she would have provided for the government of the kingdom, and the due administration of justice, and desired them to transfer their assembly thither, which they did, and displaced the marquis of Denia, who was governor of the castle, and several others of her attendants, with whom the queen was displeased^s. The president and royal council dispersed, and fled in disguise, and the cardinal regent retired with some difficulty from Valladolid. In the mean time dispatches arrived from Flanders, by which the constable and admiral of Castile were associated with the cardinal in the regency, who, in the month of November, established the council at Burgos, notwithstanding the assembly of the commons at Tordesillas forbid them to assume the government^t. The regents raised an army, and appointed the count de Haro to command it; and, on the other hand, Don Antonio de Acunha, bishop of Zamora, who had joined the commons, engaged them to give the command of their forces to Don Pedro Gironne, which disgusted Don Juan Padilla, and their former chiefs; and it soon appeared that Don Pedro was not thoroughly in their interest, for he suffered the count de Haro to surprise Tordesillas, and, fearing their resentment, retired; upon which they appointed Don Juan Padilla to command their forces^u. In the mean time, the Germanats committed as great disorders in Valentia; and the like disturbances would have infallibly happened in Arragon, if it had not been for the prudence of the archbishop of Saragossa^w.

THE coronation and other proceedings of his imperial majesty in Germany, where, at this time, the dawning of the reformation gave him full employment, as they belong properly to another part of this work, shall not interrupt us here. We shall content ourselves with observing, that, pretty early in the spring, William de Croy, archbishop of Toledo, was killed by a fall from his horse; and that, a short time after his death, followed that of his uncle Chievres, who, though a minister of consummate abilities, yet was himself so avaricious, and had a wife who so much exceeded him in that vice, as not only to draw great odium upon themselves, but to create many inconveniencies to the emperor^x. The civil war in Castile was continued with great violence on both sides; that of the commons deriving great advantages from the intrigues of Donna Maria de Padilla, and no less from a long letter written by the cardinal regent to the emperor, which they intercepted and published. In this letter he told him, that the commons did not act so much from a spirit of rebellion, as from a desire of being governed with justice and moderation, as in the days of his grandfather; and that it was not from a sense of loyalty that he was supported by the nobles, but from a regard to the interest they had in breaking the power of the commons, and making themselves so much the more necessary to the crown; that while he had corrupt and rapacious ministers about him, no effectual remedy could ever be applied; and therefore, if he would act prudently, he should immediately remove all such from about his person, and restore the public tranquility, by giving just satisfaction to his subjects^y. The nobility, having thoroughly quieted the city of Burgos, strongly reinforced their army with old troops; and having prevailed upon such of their brethren as had countenanced the commons, to withdraw from them, sent express orders to the count de Haro to fight. The army of the commons were also inclined to put all upon the issue of a battle; but their general Don Juan de Padilla, a young man, and of no great experience, though personally brave, endeavoured to avoid it, being very sensible of the enemies superiority in all respects; but not being general enough to manage that design with success, the count de Haro charged his army in its retreat, broke and routed it without difficulty, and made the three principal officers who commanded it prisoners ^a. The battle was fought on the 23d of April, near Villabar; and as the victory was gained with courage, it was improved with conduct; for the very next day, Don Juan de Padilla, Don Juan de Bravo, and Don Francisco Maldonado, were beheaded; but Don Pedro Maldonado was spared, out of respect to the count de Benavente ^a. Upon this almost all the cities submitted, except Toledo, where the bishop of Zamora took upon him to be primate by the choice of the people, and Donna Maria de Padilla kept up their spirits with great address, and would have been truly worthy of the character of a heroine, if she had not also been guilty of some inexcusable acts of violence. The forces commanded by the bishop of Zamora being beaten in the field by the prior of St. John's, who commanded the army of the nobles, was at length forced to capitulate, except the alcazar, where Donna Maria, with her adherents, had intrenched, and defended themselves with great intrepidity ^b. The troubles of Castile, great as they were, fell short of those in Valentia, where the Germanats made open war upon the nobility, who at length were obliged to arm and defend themselves. Several sieges were made on both sides, several battles fought, but in the end, chiefly through their want of moderation and conduct, the Germanats were subdued ^c. The same humour also prevailed in Majorca, where the viceroy was forced to take shelter in the island of Yvica ^d. The French, during these disturbances, had twice attacked, and once conquered, the kingdom of Navarre; but, as all the strong places had been demolished by cardinal Ximenes, they were very speedily driven out again; yet they made themselves masters of Fontarabia in the bay of Biscay ^e. In Italy also the war was hot between the emperor and Francis I. the pope siding with the former, and the Venetians with the latter. By the emperor's intrigues with cardinal Wolsey, Henry VIII. concluded a treaty on the twenty-fourth of November, by which he engaged to assist the pope and the emperor, and promised the latter his daughter princess Mary, whom he had before betrothed to the dauphin; but the views of this alliance were broken by the death of Leo the tenth, which happened on the second of December ^f.

The emperor, in his return to Spain, comes into England, and concludes a treaty with Henry VIII.

THE cardinal bishop of Tortosa being chosen pope in the beginning of the year, after receiving the compliments of all the Spanish nobility, set out for Arragon, and afterwards embarked at Tarragona for Italy. Being seated on the pontifical throne, he retained his own name, and was stiled Adrian VI.; and, before his departure from Spain, had the pleasure of hearing that the alcazar of Toledo had been forced, upon which Donna Maria de Padilla had made her escape. She fled in disguise into Portugal, where it is said she lived but meanly upon a small pension granted her by the archbishop of Braga ^g. The emperor, resolving to return into Spain, appointed his brother Don Ferdinand vicar of the empire, and Donna Margaretta, his aunt, governess of Flanders. He then proceeded by land to Calais, and so passed to Dover ^h. He was received in England, where he landed about the end of May, with all possible marks of esteem and kindness. He was installed knight of the garter at Windfor ⁱ, and, which was the principal intent of his visit, he pacified Wolsey, who had taken some offence. He granted him a pension of 9000 gold crowns, and promised him an equivalent for his former pension, which pope Adrian had revoked: he renewed his promise of marriage to the princess Mary, and, having taken leave of the king, and of the queen, his aunt, passed over to Calais, and embarked on board his fleet, consisting of 150 sail, on the sixth of July, and landed safely at Port St. Andero on the 16th of the same month ^k. The admiral and constable went thither to pay their respects, and to give an account of their regency. They were extremely well received, as were all the rest of the Spanish nobility, who had distinguished themselves during the troubles ^l. Four thousand Germans, and two thousand Flemish foot, which he brought on board his fleet, were sent into Biscay, to serve against the French. He went from St. Andero to Valentia, and from thence to Valladolid. After he had reposed himself there a few days, he went to Tordesillas, to see his mother, and found her, notwithstanding the reports to the contrary, not at all wiser than when he left her ^m. On the 28th of October, a magnificent theatre was erected in the square of Valladolid, with a throne for his imperial majesty, and benches for the nobility, in whose presence the general pardon was read, which was as full as possible; but about fourscore persons, many of whom were ecclesiastics, were excepted by name; of whom Don Pedro Pimentel de Talavera was executed at Palentia, and ten or twelve more in other places. The council told him that few examples had been made; to which the emperor answered, there are enough. A person, who expected a reward, informed him where one of the most considerable persons lay hid, and, believing that he had forgot it, put him in mind of it again; upon which the emperor said, smiling, You had better let him know I am here, than tell me where he is ⁿ. The Germanats were a intirely dissipated and subdued in Majorca, as well as Valentia; and the queen dowager of Portugal, Donna Leonora, the emperor's sister, returned into Spain °.

THE French, who had been long blocked up in Fontarabia, were relieved in the beginning of the year by a small army that entered Biscay for that purpose; and the emperor being apprehensive of an irruption into Catalonia, sent thither the prior of St. John, with the title of vice-roy, and a considerable body of troops °. In the month of July he held an assembly of the states of Castile at Palencia, from whom he obtained a free gift of four hundred thousand ducats, and, in return, assented to several good laws; after which he went in person into the kingdom of Navarre, and sent the constable of Castile to the prince of Orange, to make an irruption into France ¹. There happened this year a dreadful plague in the kingdom of Arragon ². Pope Adrian VI. dying on the twenty-fourth of September, was succeeded in the papacy by Julius de Medicis, who assumed the name of Clement VII.; and this year count Pedro Navarro, who had been long prisoner in the castle of Simencas, having been taken in Italy fighting for the French, put an end to his captivity by stabbing himself with a knife ³.

IN the spring, Fontarabia was besieged and taken by the Spaniards ⁴. The Shah of Persia sent an ambassador, or at least a person charged with his letter, to invite the emperor to an alliance against the Turks. The disputes that had arisen between the crowns of Castile and Portugal, with respect to the Moluccas, were terminated, or at least suspended, in consideration of a sum of money, and the marriage of the king Don Juan with the Infanta Donna Catalina, the emperor's youngest sister, who still resided with the queen at Tordesillas ⁵. In Italy, the imperialists obliged the French to repass the Alps; and soon after, the duke of Bourbon, who was then in the service of the emperor, made an irruption into Provence, and besieged Marseilles; which, however, he was obliged to abandon. Before the end of the year, Francis I. entered Italy with a powerful army, recovered Milan, and besieged Pavia ⁶.

THE marquis de Pesquaira, who commanded the Spanish army in Italy, marching to the relief of that city, defeated the French army, and made the king Francis I. prisoner. The emperor, when he received this news, is said to have retired into his closet, to give God thanks before he divulged it ⁷. This extraordinary success once more changed the face of affairs in that country. In Spain they were desirous of making the most of their royal prisoner, and the emperor held a council of state how it might be best done. His confessor the bishop of Osma advised him to set the king at liberty without ransom, which he thought would bind him more than any treaty; but the duke of Alva proposed that he should restore the duchy of Burgundy, and all that he had taken in Flanders; and that he should give the county of Provence in sovereignty to the duke of Bourbon. Adrian de Croy was sent to him into Italy, to propose to him these terms, with which that king was so much enraged, that, if it had not been for the Spanish lords who were about him, he would have dispatched himself with his dagger. At length growing somewhat calm, he said he would perish in the vilest prison in Spain rather than dismember from his dominions the smallest province ⁸.

THERE were many of the Italian princes, who, upon this victory, began to be apprehensive of the emperor's power, and of that facility with which he might, at this juncture, make himself master of Italy. To prevent this, they secretly negotiated a league against him, and at the same time concerted, with the utmost privacy, how to procure the liberty of the French king. The first they in some measure brought to bear, but were absolutely disappointed in the latter; since, notwithstanding the immense advantages they offered to Don Ferdinand de Alarcon, in whose custody the king was, he absolutely refused to betray the trust that was reposed in him ⁹. Mr. Launoy, viceroy of Naples, took occasion from hence to suggest to the king, that the most secure and speedy way of obtaining his liberty would be to pass over into Spain, and negotiate it with the emperor himself. Francis was extremely pleased with this project, as believing that his eloquence might make some impression on the mind of his imperial majesty. With this view, the design being conducted with great secrecy, the king embarked for Naples, as it was given out, but in reality for Spain, and landed at Palamas in Catalonia, from whence he was conducted by Valentia to Madrid, and there lodged in the alcazar, or castle, under the care of Alcaron ¹⁰. He found very soon that he had deceived himself; for, notwithstanding he was received every-where with great solemnity and magnificence, and treated by all the nobility admitted to his presence with great respect, yet he was very strictly confined; and, when he pressed for an audience of the emperor, was told, he was not to expect it till the terms on which he was to obtain his liberty were adjusted^b. The point chiefly insisted upon was the restitution of the duchy of Burgundy, which the king absolutely refused, but offered an equivalent; and, finding the treaty drawn into a great length, fell dangerously ill; of which the emperor, who diverted himself in making a tour to the principal places in Spain, being informed at Toledo, resolved to make him a visit, and set out immediately for the castle of Madrid^c.

As soon as he came into the room, he uncovered, and embraced the king, who sat upon his bed; after which they were for some time silent. At length the king said, "You see your slave and prisoner." "I see," said the emperor, "a free prince, who is my dear brother and my true friend." Francis replied, "No, he is your slave." "Not so," added the emperor, "but my friend and my brother; your recovery is the thing in the world which I have most at heart: at present think of nothing but to regain your health; all the rest shall be settled afterwards just as you please." "No," said Francis, "but in the manner you prescribe." After an interview of half an hour, the emperor retired^d. The next day he made him another visit in the evening, and, while he was with him, the king's sister, madame d'Alençon, arrived from France, whom the emperor himself introduced into his presence, and treated with all imaginable respect^e. After this he returned to Toledo. The king grew worse after his departure, and was once in such an agony that his sister covered his face, believing him dead; he received also the sacraments of the church, but, by the care of the emperor's physicians, he at length recovered, though very slowly^f. Madame d'Alençon, at the king's request, followed the emperor to Toledo, but returned without success; and she was not happy in a scheme which she projected for his escape, and which was discovered by his valet de chambre^g. To push things to the utmost, the king sent the emperor word, that as he was determined never to part with the duchy of Burgundy, he had only to regulate the place and manner in which he should be confined during his life. The emperor answered, that would be soon done; but that he was sorry to find he was so unwilling to give, as a ransom, what in point of conscience he was bound to restore^h (H).

(H) There is a necessity, in order to make this part of our history understood, to say something here of the two countries of Burgundy, and of the titles by which Charles the fifth held the one, and claimed the other. These two countries, taken together, are of a very great extent, and, by their situation, fertility, and products, of an immense value. They lie on the east side of France, being bounded on the north by Champagne, Lorraine, and Alsace, on the west by the Nivernois and the Bourbonnois, on the south by Beaujolais, la Bresse, and the county of Geneva, and on the east by the country of the Swiss, and part of Alsace (1). The duchy of Burgundy was united to the crown of France with great solemnity, and with an oath that it should never after be separated, by king John, Anno Domini 1361; but, notwithstanding this, he gave it to his fourth son Philip, September the 6th, 1363, to be held by faith and homage, and to revert to the crown upon failure of issue in lawful marriage (2). Charles the fifth of France confirmed this donation, adding only these words in the investiture, without lawful heirs descended in the right line. This Philip, surnamed the Hardy, was the father of John, who, by Margaret of Buravia, became so of Philip the Good, who instituted the order of the Golden Fleece, and who, by Isabel daughter of John I. king of Portugal, had Charles the Bold, who was killed in the battle of Nancy, January 5th, 1477 (3). As for the county, it made part of the ancient kingdom, which was called Upper Burgundy, and sometimes the principality beyond the Soane. Rainald, the first of that name, and the second count of Burgundy, was compelled to do homage for it to the emperor Henry III.; but Rainald III. being summoned, refused to do homage, and held it as a free sovereignty, from whence it derived the name of Franche Compté (4). This noble and fruitful territory was enjoyed, in right of his marriage with Margaret countess of Flanders, by Philip the Hardy, the founder of the last ducal family, which ended, as we have before observed, in Charles the Bold, who, by Isabel of Bourbon, left only one daughter Mary, who espoused Maximilian of Austria, by whom she had Philip, the father of Charles the fifth (5). Upon the death of her father, Lewis XI. then king of France, annexed the duchy of Burgundy to the crown, pretending that, by the general word heirs, heirs male were only intended; and this construction was allowed and confirmed by the states of the duchy (6). This, however, was considered by Maximilian, who was afterwards emperor, as a flagrant act of injustice, because king John, who re-annexed it to the crown of France, and gave it afterwards to his son Robert, actually came to it by inheritance from his mother, and might be presumed to grant it upon the like terms to his son. However, as the reader will see in the text, France, whatever her title might be, still kept the duchy of Burgundy; tho' the county of Charalois, which was a fief of this duchy, was yielded by Lewis XI. to the archduke Philip, and from him descended to his son Charles the fifth, from whom it was taken under pretence of felony, but was again restored by the treaties of Chateau Cambrensis and Vervins, afterwards seized again by the crown of France, and re-

- a In the mean time the duke of Bourbon arrived in Spain, and went to wait upon the emperor at Toledo, who, when he heard of his approach, went out to meet him, though it rained, embraced him, and shewed such high testimonies of esteem, that madame d'Alençon resolved to return to *France*¹. Francis, not long after, changed his mind, and offered to restore the duchy of Burgundy, provided the emperor would give him his sister the queen dowager of Portugal in marriage, and the duchy of Milan in dowry; adding, that he would give one of his sons, and twelve of the first nobility in France, as hostages for the performance of it. The emperor was a little embarrassed, having promised the queen, as he afterwards did the duchy, to the duke of Bourbon; but that princess disengaged him, by declaring she would marry the king, and not the duke^k. The Italian states, before the end of the year, had brought their scheme to bear; the pope, the Venetians, and the Florentines, entering into an alliance, which, out of respect to the first of these potentates, was stiled the Holy League; to the support of which it was understood that both England and France would concur; for the emperor having disoblinded cardinal Wolsey, by no longer writing to him with his own hand, and subscribing, as he was wont to do, Your son and cousin, CHARLES, he had prevailed with his master Henry VIII. to change sides, and to promise his daughter Mary to the dauphin; which induced his imperial majesty to conclude his own marriage with the infanta Donna Isabella of Portugal, though they were both grandchildren to Ferdinand and Isabella^l. This was afterwards, notwithstanding, thrust into the reasons of the war, and urged against the emperor as a notorious breach of faith.
- b His confinement growing more and more uneasy, the French king, finding that his solicitations had little or no effect, resolved to indemnify himself, when at liberty, for the concessions he was obliged to make in order to obtain it. The conditions of this famous peace, which, from the place where it was made, is stiled, the treaty of Madrid, were the restitution of the duchy of Burgundy, the renunciation of all rights pretended over the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the city of Genoa, and the town of Ast, the sovereignty claimed over certain states and towns in the Low Countries, the obliging Don Henry d'Albret to quit the title of king of Navarre, giving full satisfaction to Germana queen dowager of Arragon, and to the prince of Orange; restoring his estates and dignities to the duke of Bourbon, and the like favour to be reciprocally extended by the emperor, as well as the king, to all who had suffered in any degree by this quarrel^m. On the 15th of January the peace was published, the king set at liberty, and his marriage with the queen dowager of Portugal celebrated by proxy, her dowry being settled by the treaty; as also that the dauphin should marry her daughter the infanta Donna Maria; and that the king should not only give the dauphin but his brother, and twelve young noblemen, for hostages; all which the emperor insisted that the king should promise upon his oath, taken in the most solemn manner, which he did; but some say he made as solemn a protestation before he took it, that what he did was by absolute constraint; and that his true intention was to perform his promise no farther than it should be reasonable; of which the emperor had some information, or at least a strong suspicion; so that notwithstanding the king solemnly espoused Donna Leonora, yet he would not remit that princess into her husband's possession till the treaty was executed, but sent him soon after, with all exterior marks of kindness, into his own dominionsⁿ, while he went to celebrate his own marriage with the infanta Donna Isabella of Portugal. About this time the bishop of Zamora was executed in the castle of Simencas, where for some years he had been confined.
- c CHARLES DE LANOY and Don Ferdinand d'Alarcon attended king Francis to the frontiers, and received the hostages, whom as soon as they had delivered to the constable of Castile's son, they followed that prince, who very soon acquainted them that it was not in his power to restore Burgundy; but that he was willing to pay two millions of crowns for the ransom of his son and the rest of the hostages; and on the 22d of May he signed the Holy League at Paris^p.

A new alliance, stiled by the pope the Holy League, concerted against the emperor.

The French king at last finds it requisite to conclude the treaty of Madrid.

When at liberty, declares he will execute it so far only as he thinks reasonable.

stored again to that of Spain, as the reader will see, by the treaty of the Pyrenees (7). It was then bestowed by Philip IV. as a compensation for his losses, upon the great Conde, and has remained ever since in his family, and gives at this day the title of a count to one of the princes his descendants (8). As to the Franche Comte, it belonged, without dispute, to Maximilian of Austria, in right of his marriage, and from him descended to Charles V. who annexed it, together with all the provinces of the Low Countries, to the empire, under the title of the Circle of Burgundy (9). Thus the reader sees the true source of that bitter animosity which reigned between these two great princes, and descended, together with their dominions, to their posterity, and proved the cause of so many wars, and so much disturbance, not only to their own dominions, but through all Christendom.

His ambassadors soon after signified as much to the emperor. The ministers of the rest of the allies demanded that he should cause the siege of the citadel of Milan to be raised, and put Francis Sforza into the possession of the city and duchy; that he should renounce the kingdom of Naples, should pay what was due to the king of England, and send no more troops into Italy; otherwise they would declare war against him, and compel him to perform what they demanded^a. The emperor answered, that the French king did very ill not to keep his word as a monarch, and his oath as a Christian; that his parliaments could not dispense with either, since, before they were given, they approved both; that, with respect to the queen Donna Leonora, he ought to behave to her as his lawful wife; that the hostages were in his power, and he would do with them what he pleased; that the duke of Milan was his feudatory, and he meant to punish him as a rebel; that the Spanish troops in Lombardy acted by his orders, and should be recalled when he thought fit; that the kingdom of Naples was his inheritance; that he would come or go, or send into Italy, when he thought proper; and that he meant to pay the king of England out of the ransom due from the king of France; neither was he at all in doubt, that, with the assistance of God, he should defend his own rights, and protect his subjects, when attacked^b. A severe edict was published this year against the Morescoes in the kingdom of Granada, and an insurrection made by them in the kingdom of Valentia was suppressed, and very rigorously punished. In Italy, the imperialists made themselves masters of Milan, and took possession of the city of Rome, which obliged pope Clement VII. to shut himself up in the castle of St. Angelo, where, by dint of prayers and intreaties, he at last procured a truce for three months^c.

THE emperor held in the spring an assembly of the states at Valladolid, where, for the sake of conveniency, his imperial majesty ordered the deputies of the respective orders to hold their assemblies in different places; whereas hitherto the nobility, clergy, and commons, had sat together. He explained to them the motive of his calling them together, which was his want of money; but each of the orders suggested separately a plausible excuse, and agreed unanimously to grant him nothing; upon which they were dissolved about the middle of March^d. On the 21st of May the empress was delivered of the prince Don Philip at Valladolid, and, for the solemnity of his baptism, most prodigious preparations were made; but, on a sudden, the emperor suspended all rejoicings, on account of what had happened at Rome, where the army of the duke of Bourbon had sacked the city, and the prince of Orange, who commanded the army after his decease, kept the pope blocked up in the castle of St. Angelo. For the safety and preservation of his holiness, the emperor caused public prayers to be made at Madrid, disavowing all that his generals did, though he reaped all the advantages from the steps they took, by which they became masters of all Italy, till general Lautrec entered it with a French army, though paid in a great measure by English money, by which the face of affairs was quickly changed, and the pope, being at liberty to speak his own language, declared for the allies^e.

THE new year opened with a very new scene: two kings at arms, one stiled Guienne, from the French king, and the other Clarence, from Henry of England, demanded a public audience of the emperor; which being granted, they first recapitulated the wrongs done to their respective masters, and then the insults offered to the pope, and the cruel plundering of Rome for two months together; in resentment of which they declared war. The emperor ordered his answers to be delivered to them in writing on the 25th of January. In that to the French king he advised him not to put any trust in the promises of Wolsey, whose boundless ambition and inordinate avarice put him upon sowing discord between them. He said that minister had threatened the emperor, for not using his interest to advance him to the papacy, that he would so embroil the affairs of Christendom, that they should not be effectually settled again for one hundred years to come. He also intimated, that he doubted whether his ambassador had repeated to him what he told him when he had an audience of him at Granada; of which Francis having demanded an explanation, the emperor said he told him, that he acted wickedly, and like a coward, in breaking his word, and forgetting his oath, which he would maintain to his face, with his sword in his hand^f. The king of France thereupon sent Guienne with an answer, which was read at a public audience, importing, that if the emperor ever said the king of France behaved otherwise than became a good knight, he lied, and lied as often as he said so; and that he would make this good in single combat. The emperor, by his king at arms, accepted the challenge, and assigned an island in the river dividing their dominions; but all this came to nothing^g. The French tell this story otherwise, and, in its proper place, we shall give their account of the matter. In Spain, the states of the several kingdoms swore to Don Philip as the heir apparent, and gave the emperor moderate supplies^h. In Italy, the fortune of war varied. In the beginning of the year the allies were successful;

a Philippine Doria, then in their service, beat the imperialists at sea; and the French, about Midsummer, besieged the city of Naples; but, before the close of it, they were obliged to raise the siege, were beat in their retreat by the prince of Orange, and a great part of them, who had taken shelter in Averso, were obliged to capitulate there. The city of Genoa likewise revolted from the French, and declared for the imperialists, by the advice and with the assistance of the Dorias^a, who were from thence regarded as deliverers of their country.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the emperor resolved to make a voyage to Italy, leaving his empress regent in Spain. As he was to embark at Barcelona, he summoned an assembly of the states of Catalonia for the first of May. When he arrived in the neighbourhood of that city, the inhabitants sent deputies to know whether he would make his public entry in quality of emperor, or of their count, because of the ceremonial; to which he prudently gave this answer, that he preferred the title of count of Barcelona, made his entry in that quality, and obtained a generous supply from the states^b. While he was there, he concluded a treaty with the pope, by which he consented to give his natural daughter Margaret to Alexander Medicis, the pope's nephew, who was to have the state of Florence, with the title of duke; that the places taken from the holy see should be restored; that Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, should have justice done him; and that, after pacifying Italy, he would go into Germany, and, with the assistance of his brother Ferdinand, who was become king of Hungary, endeavour to reduce the Lutherans. On the other hand, the pope consented to acknowledge him in quality of king of Naples; that he should present to all archbishops and bishops; and that his holiness should grant free passage to his troops whenever he required it. The emperor swore to the due performance of this peace on the 29th of June, in the cathedral of Barcelona^c.

In the mean time madame Louisa, mother to the French king, signified to madame Marguerite, the emperor's aunt, and governess of the Low Countries, that she would be glad to confer with her about a peace; of which the emperor being informed, he sent full powers to his aunt. Madame Louisa having received the like from her son, set out for Cambray, where these two princesses, taking up their lodgings in houses that joined to each other, caused a door to be broke through the wall, that they might confer together when they pleased, without ceremony. The first conference was held on the 8th of July: the peace was signed, concluded, and the princesses swore to the execution thereof on the 5th of August following, in the cathedral church of Cambray; and, three days after, it was sworn to by Francis himself^d. By this treaty he undertook to pay by the first of March two millions of crowns of gold for his ransom, and to withdraw his troops out of Italy in six months. The king of England was likewise comprised in this treaty. On the 12th of August the emperor made his public entry into Naples, where he received, and swore to, the treaty of Cambray. He had afterwards an interview, and was twice crowned by the pope; and, before the close of the year, he concluded a peace with the Venetians, and a treaty of commerce^e. While his imperial majesty was at Bologna, Francis Sforza came thither, and threw himself at his feet, telling him, that he relied upon his clemency, and his own innocence; after which he began to make many protestations of his fidelity; but the emperor, perceiving that he was sick and weak, took him up, embraced him, and promised to restore him his dominions upon very moderate terms, at which all the world was surpris'd^f. This year the younger Barbarossa, who had succeeded his brother at Algiers, defeated a squadron of the emperor's galleys on the coast of Spain, and took or sunk six out of eight, which gave the emperor great displeasure^g.

The spring was spent in Italy in carrying the peace, which was proclaimed in the cathedral of Bologna on new-year's day, into execution, in ceremonies requisite to establish the emperor's authority, and in perfecting the concession of the islands of Malta and Gosa, together with Tripoli in Barbary, with all their castles, fortresses, and other dependencies, to the military order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, of which they were put in possession by Hector Pignatelli, viceroy of Sicily, on the first of April following^h. After these things were dispatched, the emperor, pursuant to the promise he had made the pope, set out for Germany, and, in his passage, was splendidly entertained by the marquis of Mantua. The keys were presented to him in all the cities belonging to the Venetians, by an express order from the senate; and his brother Ferdinand, king of Hungary, met him at Inspruck in *Tirol*ⁱ; but the remainder of this journey, and the consequences of it, belong to the history of the empire, where they will be found. That insult which had been offered to his arms by the corsairs under the command of Barbarossa, affected him to such a degree, that he sent orders to Andrew Doria, esteemed one of the best seamen of that age, to revenge it at all events. Doria had a good squadron of his own, which he not only reinforced with all the Spanish gallies that were ready to put to sea, but demanded also, in the name of the emperor, assistance from Francis I. who sent him ten gallies, well-manned ^k. Arriving at Majorca, he was informed that Barbarossa had sixty gallies under his command, all excellently provided; that, with half of these he was sailed to Algiers, and the other half, under the command of Haly, was at Sargel; to which port he sailed, forced his passage in, plundered the adjacent country, forced the enemy to take shelter in a fortress on shore, and brought away two gallies and seven smaller ones; but George Pallavicini, with three companies of Italians, being sent to recover the Christian captives, after having performed that service, fell to plundering, and thereby gave the Turks an opportunity of surrounding and cutting him and all his people to pieces ^l. The release of the dauphin and the duke of Orleans was postponed from the first of March to the first of July, the French king not being able to raise the money before, and then they were delivered by Don Alvaro de Lugos at Fontarabia, upon the receipt of a million two hundred thousand crowns, the other eight hundred thousand being assigned to the king of England ^m. At the same time queen Leonora was received by cardinal Tournon and marshal Montmorency ⁿ. On the 30th of November died the princess Margaret, who directed that her body should be interred at Granada, near those of their catholic majesties Ferdinand and Isabella, and was replaced in the government of the Low Countries by Donna Maria, queen-dowager of Hungary ^o.

WHILE the emperor was embarrassed in Germany, as well with disputes about religion as with a war against the Turks, the government in Spain found themselves not a little embarrassed with the pope, who sent several bulls thither of different natures, which they directed to be examined as to their compatibility with the laws, before they were carried into execution; upon which some of the inferior clergy began to preach in a very seditious strain, and to infuse into the minds of the people an apprehension that the church was in danger; which, considering the emperor's absence, might have been attended with great inconveniences, but for the vigilance and activity, as well as the loyalty and steadiness, of cardinal Tavera archbishop of Toledo, president of the council of Castile, and the rest of the ministers ^p. The emperor received their remonstrances on this head very kindly, and promised to address himself on this subject to the pope. He directed also, that a collection should be made of the opinions given by the divines and lawyers in their catholic majesty's dominions at the time the marriage was under consideration between the Infanta Donna Catalina and Henry prince of Wales, brother to prince Arthur, her former husband ^q. He farther ordered, that levies should be made for the war against the Turks; and that the frontiers towards France should be put into a proper state of defence, being still under some apprehension of Francis I. The pope, to make court to his imperial majesty, created, towards the close of the year, two Spanish cardinals, Don Alonso Manrique archbishop of Seville, and Don Garcia Loyaza archbishop of St. James of Compostella ^r. This was exceedingly acceptable to that nation.

Solyman the Magnificent, afraid of the emperor's good fortune, leaves Hungary.

THE emperor, who had spent the winter in the Low Countries, returned in the spring to Germany, in order to defend it against the Turks, their emperor Solyman the Magnificent being bent upon attacking Vienna with the whole force of his empire; but he is said to have abandoned that enterprize by the advice of the French and of the Venetians, who represented the fortune of Charles as invincible; and that, if he should be victorious over the Turks, he would give law to all the princes in Europe, and compel the Christian powers to attack the Ottoman empire on every side ^s. In Spain, the empress held at Segovia the states of the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, in which assembly many good laws were made. Andrew Doria had orders to oppose the Turkish fleet, which consisted of ninety gallies and a prodigious number of small vessels, with which they threatened desolation to the coasts of Italy and Spain. Doria had a fleet of equal strength, with ten thousand Spanish, Italian, and German troops on board. Upon the first intelligence of which, the Turks retired into port, which left him at liberty to reduce Coron, and other fortresses in the Morea, after defeating in the field all the forces that could be brought to oppose them. Having left in the place first-mentioned a Spanish garrison, under the command of Don Jerom Mendoza, he returned to Genoa, to wait the arrival of the emperor. Charles, having settled every thing in Germany, returned into Italy with a numerous army; and, having adjusted also the affairs of that country with the pope at Bologna, he resolved to return into Spain, where the state of his affairs, and the natural affection of that people for their sovereign, caused him to be very impatiently expected ^t, as well as some abuses in the government, which naturally spring up in the long absence of the prince.

Andrew Doria defeats the Turkish fleet,

In his journey from Bologna to Genoa, the emperor visited the field of battle, where Francis I. was taken, attended by such of the principal generals that were present in that engagea ment as were yet alive, and heard with great attention all the circumstances they related concerning that glorious victory ^u. On the 10th of March he arrived at Genoa, and lodged in the palace of Andrew Doria; after which he embarked on board the gallies commanded by that famous admiral, and arrived safely at Barcelona on the twenty-second of April, where he found the empress, the prince Don Philip, and the Infanta Donna Maria, with the whole court, who were come thither to meet him ^w. He found likewise an envoy from Muley Houssein king of Tunis, to desire his assistance against the corsair Barbarossa, by whom he had been driven out of his dominions. The emperor heard him very graciously, and promised his master relief. In the month of July he went to Moncon, where he held the states of Aragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, his secretary having explained to them the great things that the emperor had done for restoring the peace of Europe, and the defence of Christendom against the Infidels, the kingdom of Aragon presented him with a free gift of two hundred thousand crowns, and Catalonia and Valentia gave in proportion. Don Alvaro Bazan, who was sent with a squadron of gallies to the coast of Barbary, performed great things there, took several places, and ruined a squadron of corsairs. The Turkish emperor Solyman sent a numerous army to besiege Coron by land, and a fleet with sixty gallies, and a considerable body of troops on board, to cover that siege; but the garrison making a brave defence, Andrew Doria failed to its relief, and, having beat the Turkish fleet, changed the garrison, and supplied the place with all kinds of provision and ammunition, which so mortified Solyman, that he ordered the general who commanded his army to be strangled ^x. He then caused Coron to be blocked up a second time, when the garrison being reduced to distress, the new governor was prevailed upon, against his own opinion, to make a sally with the best part of the troops in the place; but he conducted it with such address, and the Spanish troops behaved with such intrepidity, that it answered the end for which it was made. In his retreat he was furiously attacked by the Turks, who continued the engagement after their general was slain, and pushed it so far, that Don Rodrigo Machicao was likewise killed; but his lieutenant Hermosilla, taking the command, repulsed the Turks with so much spirit, that they were at length glad to permit him and his troops to enter again into the place ^y.

In the spring the emperor held an assembly of the states of Castile at Madrid, in which some beneficial laws were made, and he obtained a large supply for carrying on the war against the Infidels ^z. He considered, however, that his new conquest of Coron could not be maintained but at a vast expence, and was of no real advantage to him, though of great consequence to the pope and the Venetians, who were therefore very pressing in their solicitations for him to keep it. Upon mature consideration, he judged this inexpedient. Having, therefore, first offered it to his holiness, the Venetians, and to the grand master of Malta, with an annual subsidy towards the maintenance of the garrison, and they having refused it, he sent orders to the viceroys of Naples and Sicily to send a fleet to bring away the garrison. This they did, together with the artillery and military stores, and all the Greek inhabitants and their effects; upon the arrival of this fleet in Sicily, lands were assigned to the Greeks for their subsistence, and their posterity continue in possession of them to this day ^a. Solyman the Magnificent, burning with a desire of revenge for the enterprize of Coron, sent for Barbarossa, and, to his own amazement, and to that of all the world, declared him a basha, and general of the Ottoman forces by sea: that these might not appear empty titles, he equipped a squadron of fourscore gallies, and ordered him, after repairing and fortifying Coron, to waste and destroy the coasts of Sicily and Italy; which he punctually performed, and, after having terrified Rome itself, and acquired a great booty, returned in triumph to Tunis ^b. This was extremely grating to the emperor, who was no sooner informed of this expedition than he sent instructions to Andrew Doria to hold his gallies in readiness, ordered the viceroys of Naples and Sicily to prepare theirs, demanded assistance from the pope, the king of Portugal, and other Christian princes, and settled the general rendezvous of the whole fleet for the month of May in the ensuing year. In the mean time he ordered Lewis Presendes, a Genoese by birth, and one of his own domestics, to go with two ships richly laden to Tunis, as a merchant, in order to examine the state of that place, and its fortifications, that he might take measures for his intended enterprize with greater certainty. On his arrival, however, Presendes was betrayed by a Moresco servant; upon which Barbarossa caused his head to be cut off, and his body to be burnt without the city ^c. This year proved fatal to pope Clement the seventh, who was succeeded in the papal throne by cardinal Alexander Farnese, whom, some say, he nominated on his death-bed, and who, after his accession, assumed the name of Paul the third; and this year also was established the famous order of jesuits ^d.

into Africa, and the reduction of the fortress of Gouletta.

THE war of Africa so occupied the emperor's thoughts, that he seemed to have no other view than that of restoring the king of Tunis, and humbling the pride of the Infidels. This coincided so exactly with the interests of his neighbours, that the succours he received very much surpassed his expectations. Don Lewis of Portugal brought a squadron of twenty-two ships of war, besides a large galleon, and two ships of a new construction, and of a size superior to any that had yet been seen. Andrew Doria's squadron of gallies were in every respect complete; and one of them, which was intended for the emperor's person, had four benches of rowers, and the men were all cloathed in silk. The emperor, having made a general review, embarked for Sardinia, where, notwithstanding he met with very bad weather in his passage, he arrived on the 11th of June, and there found the Italian forces; so that when he weighed for the coasts of Barbary he had one hundred and forty men of war and gallies, and two hundred and sixty vessels of smaller size^c. Barbarossa had fortified Tunis in the best manner he was able, and had assembled near one hundred thousand men for his defence. As he foresaw the Christians would make an attempt on the fortress of Gouletta, he posted Sinan basha there with six thousand Turks. He was not mistaken; the emperor, having debarked his army, formed the siege of that place, and took such precautions, that the corsair could not either relieve it, or oblige him to raise the siege. As soon as the artillery had made a breach that was practicable, the emperor caused it to be stormed in his presence by a body of old Spanish infantry, who, notwithstanding an obstinate defence made by the besieged, entered. In the mean time the Italians, who were to have attacked the fortress on the side of the lake, finding that impracticable, marched round with their ladders, notwithstanding they were exposed to all the fire of the enemy's artillery, and entered upon the very heels of the Spaniards; which so intimidated the garrison, who were drawn up in the great square in good order, that, after one general discharge, they threw down their arms, and made their escape through the lake.

THE taking this place was of prodigious consequence, for they found in the arsenal three hundred pieces of brass cannon, and a great number of gallies in the port^f. Many of the general officers advised the emperor, therefore, to be content with his good fortune, and not push things farther, at least this campaign; which extremely alarmed the poor king of Tunis, who was in the camp with a very small body of cavalry, composed of such of his subjects as had followed his fortune. But the Infant of Portugal and the duke of Alba insisted, that it was dishonourable for the emperor to retire without making himself master of Tunis, which was his own opinion likewise; and therefore, as soon as the army had taken some repose, he advanced towards that city. Barbarossa, who had no inclination to be shut up, and who besides had an army much superior to that of the emperor, having secured the city as well as he was able, marched to meet and give him battle; but his forces behaved so indifferently at the first attack, that he altered his sentiments, and resolved to retire again into the place, which at his return he found in a manner empty, the inhabitants of the city being fled to the mountains, and the Christian slaves having surprised the castle, so that he found it necessary to retire to Algiers^g. The emperor, being thus become master of Tunis, which he could not prevent the army from plundering, restored the king Muly Houssein, with whom he made a treaty, dated the sixth of August, by which he became his vassal, and made a cession of the fortress of Gouletta. He returned thither; and, having put into it a garrison of a thousand Spaniards, under the command of Don Bernardin de Mendoza, with a squadron of twelve gallies under Antonio Doria, he dismissed the greatest part of his auxiliaries, and embarked for Sicily^h. On the twelfth of September he made his public entry into Palermo, where he held an assembly of the states, and received a free gift, and then proceeded to Naples, where he was received with all possible magnificence. There he had the news of the death of the duke of Milan, who had left him his heir; and that Antonio de Leyva, with the Spanish troops under his command, had taken possession of that duchy on his behalfⁱ. To moderate, however, this good news, he received an unexpected piece of intelligence, that Barbarossa had attacked Minorca, and, having granted a fair capitulation to the city of Mahon, had broke it, massacred a great part of the inhabitants, and made slaves of above eight hundred persons, most of whom he carried to Algiers; which first excited a resolution in the emperor of attacking and making himself master of that place, as the sole means of abasing the naval power of the Infidels^k; an enterprize, which it had been happy for Christendom he had executed with as much success as he employed skill in the contrivance.

The war

THE death of the duke of Milan induced the French king to revive his pretensions to the duchy of Milan, though even before that event happened he had made an irruption into

- a Savoy; but, knowing that the issue of war is always doubtful, was content to propose an accommodation. The emperor, who had just seen his natural daughter Margaret married to the duke of Tuscany, and found his affairs in Italy in the most flourishing condition, was not very ready to part with so noble a possession as the duchy of Milan, more especially as the Venetians, the most prudent and the most powerful of the Italian republics, offered to enter into an alliance with him for its preservation¹. However, it is pretended, that he proposed to give the investiture of Milan to the third son of the French king, but this was after his father should have discovered his intention as to these three points. First, whether he meant to make a league with the Turks; the next, whether he would concur in reducing the Protestants in Germany; and, lastly, what security he would give that the duchy of Milan should
- b never be annexed to the crown of France. But, whatever propositions he made, it is certain that he took all possible precautions for making war with success; and, having issued his orders for that purpose, went to Rome, into which he made his public entry on the 5th of April. Not content with the interviews he had with the pope, he caused a solemn assembly to be held at the Vatican, where all the foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction in the city, were present, as well as the pope, in which he made a long and eloquent speech in support of his own cause, against the monarch of France^m.
- c AFTER he quitted that city, he went to put himself at the head of his army, in order to execute the design he had formed of entering France, contrary, as is affirmed, to the sentiments of his greatest generals. He arrived at Nice on the twenty-fifth of July, and passed from thence to Aix, where he remained near a month; after which he undertook the siege of Marseilles, on the twenty-fifth of *August*ⁿ. He did not find the reduction of that place so easy as he expected. At the same time Andrew Doria was upon the coast of Provence with a small fleet; and count Henry of Nassau had entered Picardy, from Flanders, with an army of twenty-six thousand men; yet, notwithstanding all these enterprizes were well contrived, and executed by the best troops in Europe, they failed; for the army before Marseilles, being but indifferently supplied with provisions, had recourse to raisins and figs; and these fruits not agreeing with their constitutions, an epidemic distemper broke out, that carried off twenty thousand men, and, amongst them, Antonia de Leyva, and other old generals^o. In the mean time the French army grew every day more numerous, so that on the tenth of September the emperor raised the siege, and began his retreat two days after count Nassau had done the like in Picardy, and for the same reason^p. The troops on board the fleet made some descents, and burnt and plundered the country, but were constrained to retire with loss, and, the weather becoming tempestuous, were forced to return. As for the emperor, he made a good retreat; and, having quitted his army in Piedmont, went to Genoa, where he found the fleet of Andrew Doria, on board which he embarked, and, arriving safely at Barcelona on the sixth of December, proceeded from thence to Castile, where his presence was very necessary^q.
- d IN the space of a few months the emperor found his affairs extremely embarrassed. The French, in their turn, began to act offensively in Flanders and in Italy, while the Turks, apparently in concert with them, made prodigious preparations for attacking the emperor's dominions by sea, particularly the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. Charles gave orders on every side, and employed all his talents to make head against his enemies. Amongst those great qualities of which he was master, his eloquence was not the least useful or the least considerable; and if the French drew any advantage from their alliance with the Infidels, it may be doubted whether it balanced what accrued to the emperor from publishing it in the strongest manner throughout all Christendom^r. It was by the help of this chiefly, that, in the states of Castile held at Valladolid, he obtained a vast subsidy; and, under pretence of providing for the defence of the coasts against the Turks, he caused an exact account to be taken, in Catalonia and Valentia, of the number of men capable to carry arms^s. In the month of July he held at Moncon the states of Aragon and of the provinces annexed to it, where he likewise obtained a great supply, part of which he employed in fortifying the frontiers against the French in the summer. The Turkish fleet, in the absence of Andrew Doria, came, under the command of Lutfi Bey, on the coast of Naples, and took several places, which they burnt and pillaged; but Andrew Doria, in his return, took near twenty galleys, and made slaves of the janissaries on board them^t: however, having intelligence that Chairuddin basha, whom the Turks stiled Barbarossa, was coming down upon him with the whole Ottoman fleet, he retired to Messina. In the spring, and part of the summer, the war continued against the French in Flanders and in Piedmont with some advantage to the imperialists; but queen Leonora on one side, and the queen dowager of Hungary on the other, pressed the two monarchs so earnestly, that a truce was concluded and signed for three months by the two queens at Bonny, on the 30th of July^a. The pope and the Venetians procured also a truce for the like space on the side of Italy; of which when the Turkish emperor was informed, he abandoned his design against Naples, and resolved to revenge himself upon the Venetians. Towards the close of the year, Don Alvaro Bazan, general of the gallies of Spain, taking something amiss, resigned that employment; but the emperor sent him word, that he was not offended even with his demission: that he had occasion for his service; and that he should keep his post, whether he served or not; and the empress sent a person of distinction, in her name, to prevail upon him to do as the emperor desired, which, under various pretences, he declined^w. b The same year Alexander Medicis, duke of Florence, was murdered by his cousin Lawrence, upon which the emperor gave his dominions to Cosmo de Medicis, to whom he intended likewise to have given his daughter Margaret, the widow of the deceased^x.

with the pope at Nice, and with the French king at Aiguesmortes, near Marseilles.

THE pope, by his legates, prevailed on their imperial and most christian majesties to have an interview at Nice, and in the mean time concluded with the emperor and the Venetians a league against the Turks. Setting out afterwards from Rome, he went to Savona by land, and, embarking on board the emperor's gallies, arrived at Nice on the seventeenth of May, and the next day the emperor came thither from Barcelona^y. The French monarch, with his queen, his son the dauphin, and the constable Montmorency, arrived at Villafranca on the twenty-first^z. The pontiff conferred with both princes separately, but could not engage them to meet and confer in his presence. After abundance of interviews, all he could accomplish was a truce for ten years, which was signed on the eighteenth of June; and a promise that they would send their plenipotentiaries to Rome, to negotiate a solid peace. The pope, making use of the emperor's gallies, returned to Genoa, and from thence to Rome^a. His imperial majesty, during these conferences, saw his sister often; and being informed that the French monarch was very desirous of conferring with him alone, and would for that purpose wait for him at Aigues-mortes, he ordered Andrew Doria, when he arrived with his gallies, to steer directly for Marseilles. As soon as the fleet appeared in sight, the cannon of the citadel and town were immediately discharged, the magistrates came in a body to salute him on board his gallies, and, having kissed his hand, presented the keys of the town; with which compliment the emperor was extremely pleased^b. He arrived on Sunday the fourteenth of July at Aigues-mortes, where he was received by king Francis in person, who went on board his gally, and was treated with all imaginable kindness and respect^c. The emperor went on shore the next day, and staid till the sixteenth, and dined with the king, the queen, the dauphin, and the constable de Montmorency. The two monarchs had a private conference of about an hour, and parted with such exterior demonstrations of friendship, that all the world thought the peace concluded; after which, the king conducted the emperor to his gally, and he was no sooner on board than he returned to Spain. These interviews detained Andrew Doria so long, that the Christian fleet was not at sea so early as it might have been. At length it assembled towards the end of August at Corfu, consisting of one hundred thirty-six gallies, two galleons, and thirty-nine frigates, divided into five squadrons, commanded by Francis Doria, general Grimani, general Capello, Andrew Doria, and Don Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily. They went in search of the Turkish fleet under Chairuddin Barbarossa, found it in the gulph of Galipoli, and might have fought, but that Andrew Doria declined it, which brought some imputation upon him. Soon after the Turkish fleet lost by a storm seventy gallies and twenty thousand men^d. The Venetian general and Don Ferdinand de Gonzaga proposed going in pursuit of them; which Andrew Doria refused, alleging, they might meet with the like storm, and share the same fate with their enemies; upon which the fleet separated, and the squadrons retired to their respective ports. There happened this year a sedition at Milan for want of pay, another at the Gouletta, and a third in Sicily by the same troops, f for the like cause, which with great difficulty were appeased^e. On the first of November the emperor held an assembly of the states of Castile and Leon at Toledo, where he endeavoured by all means to have established an excise, to which the clergy consented; but, by the persuasion of the constable of Castile, the nobility and commons opposed it so steadily, that the scheme miscarried^f. The widow of Alexander Medicis was this year married to Ottavio Farnese, the pope's nephew, merely to content the pontif, and to prevent his changing sides, which, at that juncture, would have been attended with great inconveniencies^h.

^a THE emperor kept the states sitting till the first of February, and then ordered the arch-bishop of Toledo to dismiss them, being exceedingly displeased that the proposition which he had made was rejected; and this, notwithstanding that, in their own way, they had granted a free gift of four hundred and fifty millions of marvadies; and gave it as their principal reason for not adopting the new one, that it might have provoked a rebellion in the raising, or have lost him the hearts of his subjects if raised ¹. This misfortune was followed by another; he gave a tournament on the plain of Toledo, where all things passed very well; but in the cavalcade, at their return to the city, one of the emperor's harbingers gave some coarse language to the duke de l' Infantado, and, not satisfied with that, struck his horse upon the buttock. The duke asked him very gravely, if he knew who he was; and, upon his answering in the affirmative, drew his sword, and cut him over the head, but hindered those who were about him from cutting him to pieces, as otherwise they certainly would have done. Upon this, Rodrigo Ronquillo, provost of the household, would have arrested the duke in the emperor's name; but the constable interposed, and said, if the duke had committed an offence, the cognisance of it belonged to him, and thereupon conducted him to his own house, whether all the nobility followed him to a man, leaving nobody with the emperor but the arch-bishop of Toledo, to whom he was talking. This mortified him more than any thing that had happened in his life; and yet he was so prudent as to send to the duke the next morning, to let him know that the harbinger was committed to prison, and that he might prosecute him if he pleased. The duke thanked his imperial majesty, caused the man to be cured at his own expence, and sent him a present of five hundred ducats ². This was immediately followed by another disagreeable event; the empress was delivered on the first of May of a dead child, and expired quickly after, leaving behind her Philip prince of Asturias, and two daughters, Donna Maria, who espoused the emperor Maximilian, and Donna Joanna, who in process of time became queen of Portugal ³. The emperor shewed a real but a silent sorrow. Pope Julius, old as he was, no sooner heard of this event, than, under pretence of condoling, he sent his nephew cardinal Alexander Farnese to propose a match between the duke of Orleans and one of the emperor's daughters, with whom he was to give the duchy of Milan as a portion; and another match between the emperor and a daughter of the French king; which negotiation had no effect ⁴. The deputies from the city of Ghent in Flanders applied themselves to the emperor, to obtain an exemption from a tax imposed by the queen dowager of Hungary, governess of the Low Countries, in violation, as they apprehended, of their privileges, but without receiving the redress which they expected; upon this the inhabitants revolted, expelled the queen's commissaries, and addressed themselves to the French king, as sovereign of Flanders, for protection. As this was a hasty step, it took the French king unprovided, who immediately sent their letters to the emperor, in hopes it would determine him to give the investiture of Milan to the duke of Orleans ⁵. Charles considered this act of confidence in so strong a light, that he resolved to pass through France into Flanders, and sent Granvelle to demand a safe conduct from the French king; which he no sooner obtained, than he set out with a small retinue for St. Sebastians, leaving cardinal Tavera and the commander Cobos regents ⁶. He was received on the frontiers by the duke of Orleans, and at St. John de Luz by the dauphin. The French historians say, that those princes offered to go into Spain as hostages for his security; but the emperor answered very gravely, that he had the faith of a king, which he looked upon as a better security. He made them the companions of his journey ⁷.

It was impossible for a prince to be treated with greater politeness than was shewn to the emperor through his whole journey; the magistrates in every city through which he passed presented him the keys, knelt and kissed his hand, as if he had been their sovereign. The king and queen, though the former was indisposed, met him at Amboise, and conducted him to Paris, where he was complimented by the parliament, all prisoners released, the city made him a present of a silver statue of Hercules as big as the life, and, in the space of a week he staid there, all the honours were paid him that ever had been practised, or could be invented ⁸. It is on all hands agreed, that the duchy of Milan was never so much as mentioned; but some writers assert, that the French king was advised to restrain him till he granted the investiture to his son; but that the constable Montmorency interposed, and put the king in mind of his word. It is also said, that the emperor was not without his suspicions; and that, knowing how great an influence the duchess of Estampes had over the king, he took occasion, as they were talking together by the fire side, to let fall a ring of great value from his finger; which she immediately took up, and presented to him. Upon this, the emperor said, smiling,

He passes thro' the city of Paris, to reduce the city Ghent.

“Madam, it is yours; emperors and kings take nothing which they have once let fall.”^a But the duchess excusing herself, on account of the value of the jewel, the emperor replied, “Keep it, it will put you in mind of my journey through France.” She obeyed, and it is hinted, that the expedient had the proposed effect[†]. At his departure from Paris, the king attended him to St. Quintin; but the dauphin and the duke of Orleans accompanied him to Valenciennes, where he made them rich presents[‡]. The people of Ghent sent four ambassadors to pacify him, whom the emperor treated with great severity, and obliged them to kneel while they were speaking, and dismissed them with this answer, “Tell your companions, that I shall come as their sovereign and their judge, with the sceptre and sword in my hands.” On the arrival of his brother the king of the Romans with twelve thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, he, with the rest of his army, advanced towards Ghent, which he punished with great severity, as will be seen in its proper place. He received not long after the cardinal of Lorraine and the constable of Montmorency as ambassadors from his most christian majesty, to demand the investiture of the duchy of Milan for the duke of Orleans. The emperor told them with great frankness, that there were two reasons why he could not grant it; the first, that it would disoblige all the princes of Italy; the second, that it would cut off all communication between his dominions and the state of Genoa; but, to shew how high a price he set on the friendship of his brother Francis, he was willing to give his daughter to the duke of Orleans, with the Low Countries, and the title of king. This answer being reported to the French king, he is said to have replied, that he did not desire other people’s dominions, but fought only what belonged to him by descent[‡]. In the emperor’s absence, Piali Hamet, one of Barbarossa’s captains, landed with a strong detachment in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar, surprised the place, and made the principal inhabitants prisoners, with whom, and the pillage of the city, he embarked; but, being met by Don Bernardin Mendoza with fourteen galleys from Sicily, the corsairs were all either killed or taken, and the prisoners and booty recovered. There was this year so great a famine and pestilence in Spain, that it is thought the eleventh part of the people perished[¶].

Resolves to put in execution
the design he had formed against Al-

THE emperor, who could never lose sight of a design that he had once formed, meditated, while in the Low Countries and in Germany, the conquest of Algiers, resolving to carry with him a body of German foot into Italy, sending orders at the same time to the viceroys of Naples and Sicily, and to Andrew Doria, to assemble their respective fleets, as well as to the regents in Spain for the same purpose, giving the command to the duke of Alba, with orders to provide every thing in abundance for an expedition of great importance, and to have all things ready against his return[‡]. He had the year before procured the pope’s bulls for raising money upon the clergy, and resolved, in his passage through Italy, to meet and confer with him at Lucca, to which proposal his holiness, though sinking under the weight of years, readily consented, as having several things of moment to offer to his consideration, and more especially to labour the conclusion of a solid peace with the crown of France[†]. The emperor entered Italy from Tirol in the decline of summer, and made some stay at Milan, where he married his niece, the daughter of the queen of Denmark, to the prince of Lorraine; which is generally ascribed to the pique he had taken at the French king’s giving the daughter of Henry d’Albret, though a child, in marriage to the duke of Cleves, who laid claim to the duchy of Gueldres, and might, in consequence of this marriage, disturb the emperor about other pretensions[‡]. He proceeded from Milan to Genoa, and from thence to Lucca. There the French ambassadors made heavy complaints of the breach of the truce by the death of two gentlemen, who were assassinated by persons in masks not far from Milan, by order, as it was said, of the governor, who had intelligence that they were charged with a secret commission and instructions to negotiate with the grand signor. This Francis the first magnified into a breach of faith, and an insult on the law of nations; while the emperor Charles treated it only as a pretence taken by the French to begin the war in concert with the Turks[‡]. While he remained at Lucca, he made three visits to the pope, who returned one. In these visits the emperor pressed the pope to call a general council, and to support the catholic league; and the pope was very earnest with him to preserve the peace of Italy, by making a cession of the duchy of Milan, which he peremptorily refused[‡]. This interview being over, the emperor, notwithstanding Andrew Doria and the marquis del Vasto laboured all they could to persuade him that the season was too far advanced, embarked, in order to execute his enterprise upon Algiers.

- ^a THE weather proved so bad, that he was forced to put into Corfica, Sardinia, and Minorca, ^{Which, however, is attended with the most disastrous catastrophe.} before he reached Majorca, where the rendezvous was to be. He sailed from thence to the coast of Africa with a fleet of two hundred large ships and one hundred smaller vessels; besides a squadron of seventy galleys, having on board six thousand Spanish foot, five thousand Italians, eight thousand Germans, three thousand volunteers, and two thousand horse; exclusive of the ordinary equipage of the galleys, his own, and those of the nobility who attended him. He arrived in sight of Algiers on the 20th of October, and debarked his troops the next day. The siege was long and perilous, the defence very gallant and well conducted; the Christian fleet was for the most part beat to pieces by tempests, so that at length he was forced to rise from before the place with great loss. It is said, that, after the retreat, the famous ^b Hernando Cortes, who conquered Mexico, offered, on the forfeiture of his life, to return with the army, and take Algiers; but, the contrary measure being resolved, his imperial majesty embarked, and landed in the kingdom of Murcia on the fifth of December, extremely mortified at this reverse of fortune^c.

- THE misfortunes of the former year constrained the emperor to act intirely upon the defensive. With this view he went in person into Arragon and Catalonia, and afterwards into Navarre, apprehensive that the French would attempt somewhat in favour of Henry of Bourbon, who had assumed the title of monarch of that country. It is certain that the French designed, in virtue of the potent alliances they had made, and their vast military preparations, to have attacked the emperor on all sides, and almost in every part of his dominions at once, but they met likewise with disappointments; however, the war was carried on with heat in the Low Countries, though with very little advantage, the same places being taken and retaken in the space of a few weeks; so that, except rendering a fruitful country a desert, there happened little alteration on that side^d. In Piedmont things went very much at the same rate; and the duke of Savoy had the misfortune to see his country destroyed by two princes; one of whom was his near relation, and to the other he was closely allied, without having any share or interest in the quarrel^e. In the autumn the dauphin, with an army of between forty and fifty thousand men, besieged Perpignan; but, after having spent a long time before it, and wasted a great many men, he was constrained to retire^f. The emperor called the states of Arragon and Catalonia together at Moncon, where they took the oath of fidelity to the prince Don Philip, and granted the emperor a free gift of half a million of ducats^g. He went from thence to Barcelona, where the prince swore to maintain the privileges and exemptions of that principality; and went afterwards with his father, for the same purpose, to Valentia, where the emperor obtained a large free gift, and the states likewise made a very generous present to the prince his son^h. There was this year a scarcity of provisions, occasioned by vast flights of locusts, that fell more especially in Old Castile, and devoured all the fruits of the earth.

- A DEFENSIVE war, however successful, was by no means acceptable to the emperor, who therefore meditated all this time a war of another kind; previous to which, he found it necessary to conclude the marriage of his son the prince Don Philip with the infanta Donna Maria of Portugal, and a treaty with Henry the eighth of England, which was signed in the month of February at London, and was very explicitⁱ. These points settled, he thought of nothing but passing into Flanders, believing that on that side it was most practicable to distress France. He committed the regency, during his absence, to his son the prince of Asturias, and assigned him the duke of Alba to assist him in military affairs, and his secretary Cobos in all points of another nature. He likewise put into his hands a paper, containing a succinct detail of what might happen in his absence, with his instructions upon every point^k. These necessary measures taken, he embarked at Barcelona, on board the galleys of Andrew Doria; and arrived safely at Genoa. The pope was very desirous of a conference, and sent the cardinal nephew to request it; which the emperor would have declined, but, finding himself so warmly pressed, he consented at length to an interview at Bosetto, a castle between Parma and Placentia; but, as it might have been easily foreseen, it had no effect, for the emperor was bent upon chastising the duke of Cleves, and making his rival Francis sensible of his superiority^l. While his imperial majesty was pursuing this plan, Chairuddin Barbarossa, with the Turkish fleet, having first spoiled Calabria, alarmed Sicily, and insulted Italy, proceeded to the coasts of France, and, being joined by the naval force of that country, the French and Turkish fleets landed a numerous corps of troops, and, in conjunction with them, besieged the town and fortress of Nice. The former they took by composition; but the citadel continued to make a long and brave defence, till the marquis del Vasto approached with an army of twelve thousand men under his command; upon which the allies raised the siege, the French squadron retiring

The emperor was still more successful where he commanded in person, since he compelled the duke of Cleves to have recourse to his clemency, and extended it to him in a high degree, after making him thoroughly sensible of his displeasure. He likewise promised the distressed king of Tunis, who apprehended the great armament Barbarossa then made was to dispossess him of his dominions, his support and protection, and gave him leave to reside at Naples till that could be conveniently doneⁿ.

By his wife

sons.

THE fate of war is ever uncertain; but the issue of negotiations, wisely conducted, is rarely so. The French arms were successful in Piedmont^o; and the imperialists, though commanded by the marquis del Vasto, the best officer they had left, were thoroughly beaten in the neighbourhood of Carignan, on the 10th of April, by which that and some other places fell into their hands; but the marquis del Vasto repaired this loss by his extraordinary diligence, and by his fertility in expedients, which were the result of his great skill and long experience in the art of war^p. In the month of May, Barbarossa sailed for Constantinople, and took the command of a fleet which had been for some time preparing there; with which he ravaged the coast of the kingdom of Naples, and carried many thousand persons of both sexes into slavery. He meditated still greater mischiefs, which were prevented only by his death, that happened soon after by a flux, when he was upwards of fourscore^q. A French fleet, that was sent to ravage the coasts of Galicia, was not so successful; for Don Alvaro Bazan, who had resumed the command of the Spanish gallies, engaged and beat them^r. The greatest efforts, however, in this campaign, were made on the side of the Low Countries and in France; for the emperor, having brought over king Henry of England with a numerous army, which was employed in besieging Boulogne, marched in person with a corps of thirty-six thousand men, and invested Montreuil, while the count de Furstenberg, with a body of German troops, recovered Luxemburgh. The emperor clearly perceiving that his rival was unable to defend himself against two such powerful enemies at a time, pushed the operations of the war with such vigour, that, after taking Chateau Thierry, it was expected he would have marched to Paris; which threw the inhabitants of that great city into such consternation, that many of them retired to Rouen, Orleans, and other places^s. But the emperor, when he arrived at Soissons, made a halt, as if he expected some application should be made to him. Accordingly, father Martin de Guzman, who some say was confessor to the queen of France, and others affirm to have been following his studies there, came thither by direction of their most Christian majesties, and testified how much they were inclined to peace^t. Upon this plenipotentiaries were sent to Chateau de Crespy on both sides, and the treaty concluded on the 18th of September, the principal points of which were, that the emperor should give his daughter the infanta Donna Maria to the duke of Orleans, with the Low Countries and the counties of Burgundy and Charolois; or his niece, the daughter of the king of the Romans, with the duchy of Milan; but he was to retain the citadels of Milan and Cremona till there was an heir male of their marriage; and all places taken since the truce of Nice were to be restored; the French king renewing the renunciations made by the treaties of Madrid and Cambrai^u. The loss of Boulogne to the English hastened this treaty very much. After it was concluded, the emperor went himself to Crespy, where the duke of Orleans met him, whom he treated with great kindness and affection, and called him constantly his son. This year the king of Tremecen was restored to his dominions by the voluntary assistance of some of the Spanish nobility^v.

THE peace being made, both princes concurred in obliging pope Paul the third to summon the council of Trent, which he did by a bull dated in November, and appointed it to meet on the 15th of March^x. The emperor passing the winter at Brussels, the queen of France went thither, and carried the duke of Orleans with her; and the cheerfulness of the court was not a little increased by the news of the princess of Asturias being delivered on the 8th of January at Valladolid of her son Don Carlos; but that satisfaction was extremely lessened by the news of the death of his mother, which immediately followed^y. The great affairs of the empire, more especially those of religion, occupied all the summer; and about the time that it was expected he would have declared the marriage of the infanta Donna Maria, the duke of Orleans died on the 8th of September, much regretted by the emperor, who apprehended that the war would break out afresh; but the French king soon after sent ambassadors to Brussels, with assurances that he meant to maintain that good correspondence which was so lately restored. To which the emperor answered, that the peace would not be broken on his side. The next year was intirely spent in the wars in Germany against the protestants, and in establishing the inquisition at Naples, a which was attended with a popular sedition², and, in consequence of that, a general defection; which lasted, to the incredible loss of that kingdom, several years.

In the beginning of the succeeding year died Henry the eighth of England, and his most Christian majesty Francis the first, which left the emperor at full liberty to pursue his designs in Germany; where he carried on the war against the protestants with his usual vigour, but with a strain of severity that was not natural to him, and which we have reason to doubt proceeded rather from political views than from a mistaken zeal; and the disturbances in the kingdom of Naples still continued³. An attempt was made at Genoa upon the life of prince Doria, by the count de Fiesque, in which the duke of Parma had some concern; and it was not long after retaliated by his assassination: upon which Don Ferdinand Gonsaga seized the city of Placentia for the emperor; which drew some suspicions upon him, and even upon his master^b. The prince Don Philip held a general assembly of the states of Arragon, and obtained a considerable free gift; and afterwards sent his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva to compliment his father at Augsburgh upon his victories, and to acquaint him with the state of affairs in Spain^c. A. D. 1547.

His imperial majesty was every day more and more embarrassed by the religious disputes in the empire, where his notions and his measures were unacceptable to and suspected by both parties, more especially that great measure of the interim, which was properly speaking his own, and to which he was driven by the pope's transferring the council from Trent to Bologna; against which the emperor protested, but to no purpose^d. This embarrassed state of things making his presence absolutely necessary, and as his great point was to preserve all his dignities, as well as to transmit all his dominions to the prince his son, he judged it necessary to have him near his person. Having prevailed upon his brother, the king of the Romans, to let his son prince Maximilian go into Spain, he sent him through the Milanese to Genoa, from whence, on board Doria's galleys, he passed to Barcelona, where he arrived on the fifth of August, and, on his arrival at Valladolid, espoused, in virtue of a dispensation from the pope, the infanta Donna Maria, the emperor's daughter, who had been promised to the duke of Orleans^e. As soon as the rejoicings for this marriage were over, that is, in the beginning of October, the prince Don Philip devolved the administration upon his cousin Maximilian; and set out for Barcelona, with a train so numerous and so splendid, that the Spanish writers assure us nothing like it was ever seen before, or has been seen since^f. The first actions of princes are characteristic; and the same dignity, circumspection, magnificence, regularity, and œconomy; which appeared in this voyage, were discernible in all the great actions of Philip's life. He embarked at Roses in Catalonia, went from thence to Perpignan, and, after having seen and examined it, returned to his fleet, touched twice upon the coast of France, proceeded from thence to Villa Franca, and landed at Savona, from whence he went to Genoa in one of the galleys of the republic^g. He was received there, as he had been every-where, with all possible honours and respect, and gave the Italian princes and states leisure to make their addresses to him. He took a view of the field of battle of Pavia, as his father had done; and, proceeding from thence to Milan, passed his Christmas in that city, and conferred with all the great men in Italy on points of every kind, with a modesty and affability which were not afterwards so conspicuous in his conduct. 1548.

In the beginning of the year prince Philip set out from Milan, and, taking Mantua in his way, arrived at Trent, from whence he went to Inspruck, thence to Salzburg and Munich, and so to Augsburgh, receiving all the princes ecclesiastic and secular of the empire, and from thence to Luxemburgh, from whence by slow journies he repaired to Brussels, where, when he was introduced to his father's presence, he fell at his feet, and kissed his hand. The emperor received him with great affection, and caused the states of the Low Countries to acknowledge him in quality of duke of Brabant^h. About this time died Paul the third, of whom the emperor is reported to have said to his son, that if his body was opened, in order to be embalmed, they would find fleur-de-lis's stamped upon his heartⁱ. 1549.

The cardinal de Monte being raised to the papal throne, assumed the name of Julius the third, and gave immediate notice of it to the emperor and to the prince. Though at first they were well pleased with his election, yet they did not find him afterwards so favourable as they expected; and both the emperor's great projects of subduing the protestants, and procuring for his son the reversion of the empire, miscarried, though they were conducted with all possible address^k. The war was still carried on in the Mediterranean between Andrew Doria, who had now the title of prince, which he very justly deserved, and Dragut, a Turkish pirate, who had been bred up under Barbarossa, and succeeded him in his command; which, as it kept the seamen of Italy and Spain in breath, so it certainly contributed to raise

by the fresh conjunction between the infidels and the French.

As the emperor was firm, or rather positive, in the measures he formed, so, having taken fresh steps for carrying them into execution, he hoped they would have better success this year; and therefore, finding that the presence of Philip made no impression on a German diet, he conceived it more for his interest to return to Spain, more especially as clouds began to gather in several quarters. Henry the second inherited his father's resentments as well as his dominions; he procured an entrance into Italy, by taking the young duke of Parma, Ottavio Farnese, under his protection; he entered into a secret confederacy with the protestant princes of the empire, much oppressed by the emperor, who meant to oppress them more; and, as if he acted in concert, the grand signor equipped a great fleet, and threatened all the emperor's hereditary dominions^m. Don Philip, in the spring, returned to Genoa; and passed from thence to Barcelona; after which Andrew Doria sailed with his fleet to watch the motions of the Barbary corsairsⁿ. However, Sinan basha, with a Turkish fleet, made a descent upon Sicily, attacked Malta, ravaged the isle of Gosa, and took the city of Tripoli from the knights of that order^o. In the autumn, prince Doria returned to Barcelona, where he took on board the prince Maximilian, and his consort the infanta Donna Maria, whom he debarked at Genoa, from whence they continued their journey by land to Flanders^p. Before the close of the year the war was become general; and though at first the pope took part with the emperor in Italy, yet he quickly made peace with the king of France, who, furnishing the German princes with money, rekindled the flame of war in the empire, and, seizing the Flemish vessels that fell into his power, left the emperor no room to doubt that he would find himself attacked on all sides; for which, though he was now grown in years, and found the weight of them doubled by his infirmities, he prepared with great constancy and vigour, and formed new projects for extricating himself out of those new difficulties, with which he found himself more pressed than he had hitherto been during the whole course of his reign^q.

A. D. 1551.

Compelled to make his escape
in the night.

At the opening of the ensuing year the emperor met with the greatest and most unexpected reverse of fortune that befel him in his whole reign; for prince Maurice of Saxony, who owed his electorate to his favour, having in conjunction with other protestant princes assembled a good army, suddenly possessed themselves of Augsburgh, and other places, reduced Clauser, which was thought impregnable, and marched with such diligence to seize Inspruck, where the emperor then was, that, if he had not withdrawn in the night, leaving behind him the best part of his wardrobe and baggage, which were pillaged the next day, they had made themselves masters of his person^r. He retired into Carinthia, where he received deputies from the republic of Venice, who with great respect offered him all the service in their power. As the state was then arming with great vivacity, the emperor, who began to be jealous of every body, demanded the reason of this from the senate; who informed him, it was their custom to put their dominions in a posture of defence when armies were near them, though they had no share in the quarrel; but that his imperial majesty need be in no pain on that head, since the troops they had, and the troops they were raising, were intirely at his devotion, and he might employ them as he thought proper. This well-timed compliment had a good effect, and recovered his spirits; and when he saw that the old elector John Frederic of Saxony, whom in this confusion he released from a long imprisonment, refused to quit his person, and gave the highest marks of unshaken fidelity, he laboured to restore his affairs, and consented to the pacification of Passau, which afforded him time to take his measures^s. He sent immediately to his son prince Philip for men and money, and dispatched Andrew Doria with his gallies to bring both. The prince Don Philip executed his father's orders with such diligence, that the supplies were ready when the gallies arrived, so that the emperor was quickly in a condition to protect his Italian dominions^t. However, the prince of Salerno, to revenge himself for some real or pretended affront that he had received from Don Pedro de Toledo, viceroy of Naples, went over to the French, and, besides a large pension, was declared general of the gallies which were to be sent into the Mediterranean^u. The Turks had sent Dragut, with a very powerful fleet, to act against the emperor, and he sacked many places in the island of Sicily: from the middle of July to the beginning of August he appeared daily before Naples, which threw that city into vast confusion, till at length Andrew Doria arrived with the Christian fleet, and, to put an end to these terrors, engaged the infidels: but, for the first time, he was completely beaten, with the loss of six gallies and seven

^a hundred Germans, with several officers of distinction on board; upon which, with the shattered remains of his fleet he retired to Sardinia^w.

THE consequences of this misfortune might have been terrible, if, by an unforeseen accident, they had not been prevented. Charles Mermila, a Neapolitan exile, who had fled for shelter into France, was intrusted by king Henry with an important message to Dragut. This man, coming to Rome, discovered himself to cardinal Mendoza, to whom he offered, if the emperor would pardon him, and furnish him with a large sum of money, to deliver his country from the impending danger. The bargain was quickly made; and Mermila, going very secretly to Dragut, instead of informing him, as he was commanded, that the French gallies were coming to join him, assured him, in the name of king Henry, that he was unable to act in concert with him that year, but had sent him two hundred thousand ducats towards the expences of the next; which Dragut believing, returned immediately towards Constantinople^z. A few days after arrived the prince of Salerno with the French fleet, who, finding that the infidels were retired, followed, in order to bring them back, which design carried him likewise to Constantinople, so that the emperor's dominions on this side were free for that year. The emperor, in the mean while, having drawn together a potent army, marched to Inspruck, and from thence to Germany, directing his march towards the Low Countries. The design of this expedition was to recover Metz, Toul, and Verdun, which the French king had surpris'd during the troubles; but, not arriving till it was late in the year, his design in a great measure miscarried, which, with the insurrection of the city of Sienna in Italy, in favour of the French, renewed his chagrin, and induced him to question that good fortune upon which he had formerly so much relied. The prince Don Philip procured from the states of the respective kingdoms in Spain very large supplies; and, having received his father's consent, concluded the marriage of his sister the infanta Donna Joanna, with the prince of Portugal^y.

THE distracted state of affairs, the many enemies they had to deal with, and the repeated demands of his father for supplies of money, embarrassed the prince Don Philip, notwithstanding the vast sums he had drawn by repeated free gifts from the states, and obliged him to entertain a project, which, if carried into execution, must have been at the expence of the church; but the Spanish clergy first exposed it so effectually in writing, and opposed it afterwards with such steadiness, that the prince thought fit to desist^z. In Italy the imperialists bent their whole force to the reduction of Sienna; but the subjects of that little republic, being most of them rich, enlisted so many foreigners in their service, and exerted themselves with such spirit and intrepidity, that, though much blood was spilt, there was not much gained^a. In the mean time Dragut and the prince of Salerno arrived on the coast of Sicily with a numerous fleet, where they burnt and destroyed many places on the coast, carrying many of the inhabitants into slavery. Their fortune was different when they came to attack Naples; for the viceroy Don Pedro de Toledo, having had time to prepare for their reception, posted several corps of troops so judiciously along the coasts, that, in several descents they made, they were constrained to retire with loss. At length, by the persuasion of the prince of Salerno, they attacked the island of Corfica, and reduced it, except Calvi and Bastia, in which the Genoese had strong garrisons: the Turks, leaving this in the hands of their allies, returned with their vessels loaded with plunder, and crouded with slaves, to Constantinople. In the Low Countries the emperor carried on the war with vigour, and with success, as long as the season would permit^b. In the winter he formed the project of marrying his son to queen Mary of England; though a very intelligent and accurate writer^c acquaints us, that, old and gouty as he was, he was very desirous to have married her himself; but, perceiving that design could not be effected, he sent embassadors to propose her marriage with his son, and at the same time applied to the pope to use his influence in promoting this scheme, as the only effectual means for enabling Mary to execute her design of re-establishing popery in England^d.

AT the opening of the year died Don Juan prince of Portugal; and in a few days after his decease, which was concealed from his consort the infanta Donna Joanna, she was delivered of a son, who received the name of Sebastian, on account of his being born upon the feast of that saint^e. The treaty of marriage between the prince of Spain and the queen of England being concluded, he received the emperor's orders to prepare for his voyage for that kingdom, and to leave the administration of affairs in Spain to the princess dowager of Portugal, who, having obtained leave from her father-in-law, willingly accepted the charge^f. The prince, before he embarked, settled the household of his son Don Carlos, and went to pay his devotions at the shrine of St. James of Compostella^z. He sailed from Corunna ^a with a very numerous fleet, attended by the principal nobility of Castile and Arragon, and arrived at Southampton on the nineteenth^b, or, as some writers say, on the twentieth of July. He sent from thence his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva, with a present of jewels to the queen, of the value of one hundred thousand ducats. The marriage was celebrated on the feast of St. James, and, when their titles were proclaimed, those of Naples and Sicily were added in virtue of the emperor's resignation, which had been sent a little beforeⁱ. After the rejoicings for the marriage were over, most of the Spanish nobility returned; and the prince sent four thousand Spanish troops, that were on board his fleet, to his father in France^k. In Italy the war was carried on with vigour by the duke of Florence, or of Tuscany, against the French; but in the Low Countries the French king took several places, and wasted the country, notwithstanding the emperor had built two new fortresses, which he stiled Charleroi and Philipville; but the emperor, towards the close of the campaign, forced the king to raise the siege of Renty, and afterwards made an irruption into Picardy^l.

THE vast extent of his dominions, and the multiplicity of affairs which occupied his attention, joined to a precarious state of health, had for some time rendered the emperor thoughtful and reserved. His melancholy was much increased by the news of his mother's death, which happened on the 12th of April, and which put him in mind that it was time for him to execute what he had formerly meditated, and even proposed to the queens of Hungary and France, which was an abdication and retreat^m. The mortification that he daily met with contributed not a little to fix him in this disposition; the death of pope Julius the third, and of his successor Marcellus the second, who sat but three weeks, and the election of cardinal Caraffa, who assumed the name of Paul the fourth, afforded him much disquietⁿ. He laboured to live at least upon good terms with the last-mentioned pontiff; and, sacrificing his resentment against his nephew, who had deserted his service for that of the king of France, he did him the honour to nominate him to a hat, which he received with great expressions of gratitude, as his uncle bestowed it with all the exterior signs of pleasure^o; but in a short time after, this cardinal persuaded the pope, who was very old and suspicious, that the emperor designed to depose him; upon which, in violation of the laws of nations, he seized the cardinal Sforza, the emperor's ambassador, and sent him to the castle of St. Angelo^p. The civil and military affairs in his Italian dominions fell into such confusion, that he was compelled, in conjunction with his son, to name the duke of Alba to be vicar-general there, that he might reduce them into some order^q. The Turkish fleet, at the solicitation of the French, came again upon the coasts of Naples and Sicily, insulted Tuscany, and rode triumphant in the Mediterranean; while the Algerine corsairs made themselves masters of Bugia on the coast of Africa^r. The congress that had been held at Calais, at the solicitation of his daughter the queen of England, proved abortive^s: upon the whole, considering the perplexed state of things, and his own declining condition, he sent for his son Don Philip into Flanders, and, having first resigned to him the grand mastership of the order of the Golden Fleece, he, on the 25th of October, in a full assembly of the states at Brussels, in the presence of the two queens his sisters, and of the duke of Savoy, made a full resignation of all the hereditary dominions of the Low Countries, and of Burgundy, in favour of the king Don Philip^t, after having, in a long speech, declared the motives to this resolution, and recommended in the most pathetic terms the same fidelity and duty to his son which himself had experienced in the great officers of state and nobility who were present; and this with such dignity, and so becoming an eloquence, that the whole audience melted into tears^u. Don Philip, kneeling, kissed his hand, and made a short speech; after which the emperor, being quite exhausted with the fatigue of the solemnity, withdrew^v. After this, king Philip, being persuaded that the most Christian king had sincere intentions of peace, consented to name commissioners to treat of a temporary truce, that might afford them leisure to regulate the various points that were to be settled by it; and with this prospect of tranquillity, which was very acceptable to all parties, this year concluded.

ACCORDING to the best lights that can be obtained from history, we may venture to affirm, that the emperor resigned all his Spanish dominions to his son in the month of January; but it is not easy, perhaps it is not practicable, to fix the day; Ferreras^x says it was on the first, others^y say the sixth, others the tenth, others the fifteenth; but Sandoval^z, who has printed the very act of abdication, shews us, that it was not signed till the sixteenth.

- a As soon as it was known in Spain, measures were taken for proclaiming the new sovereign with all possible ceremony, that, as this was in all respects a new case, the people might entertain no doubts or difficulties about it^a. Accordingly, at Valladolid, where the court then was, a kind of theatre was erected in the most public part of the city on the 28th of March, about five in the afternoon, to which the prince Don Carlos, the ambassador of Portugal, the principal grandees, and the prelates, repaired^b; and the voluntary resignation of his catholic majesty Charles the first being declared; the young prince, with the assistance of Antonio de Roxas, his governor, threw out the standard which he held till then wrapped up in his hand, crying out, “Castile, Castile, for the king Don Philip our sovereign;” which standard was afterwards carried through the principal streets of the city^c.
- b The emperor remained, after his abdication, some months at Brussels; and, upon declaring his resolution to return into Spain, and there to pass the remainder of his days, the archduke Maximilian and the infanta Donna Maria came thither to take their leave of him^d. After their departure, the emperor took leave of his son, and is said to have given him such observations upon government as his great abilities and long experience furnished^e. He wrote also to Mary queen of England, to apologize for the absence of his son; and it is remarkable, that, in this letter, he tells her, that they could not either of them quit the Low Countries before, without running their affairs into confusion^f. When he was informed that the fleet which was to escort him was assembled, he set out from Brussels for Ghent, where he was on the 26th of August, as appears by a rescript of his, directed to the bishop of Osnabrug, president of the imperial chamber at Spire, in which he informs him of his resignation in favour of his son, and of his intention to devolve the imperial authority on his brother Ferdinand, king of the Romans. He went from thence to Sudburg, in the isle of Zealand, where, by a public edict, directed to the electors and other princes of the empire, which in a great measure repeats the former, he commits the government of the empire to his brother Ferdinand; and directs that the same duty and obedience should be paid to him as to himself^g; so that, notwithstanding what some historians have said, these are neither of them resignations. This last is dated on the 7th of September, and ten days after he embarked with his sisters, the queens of Hungary and France, for Spain; but was driven in his passage into an English port, from whence, on the 20th of the same month, he wrote to his daughter the queen of England^h, to excuse his son’s stay, and his not making her a visit, which he ascribes to the bad state of his health, and to the advanced season of the year, which made it requisite for him to lose no time in pursuing his voyage; and it is probable he sailed again either on that day or the day following.
- c He arrived safely at Laredo in Biscay on the 28th of the same month; and, after remaining there some days to recover the fatigue of the voyage, he set out for Burgos. There are some who pretend that he was mortified when he perceived that few of the nobility came to meet him, which, as it must be a conjecture, so, if we consider the character of this prince, we can scarce think it probable^k. He had, upon mature reflection, preferred retirement at his age to the highest dignities; and this supposes, that in a very short time he preferred a croud of courtiers, at least, if not flatterers, to that retirement he had sought. He went from thence to Valladolid, where he saw his grandson Don Carlos^l; and from Valladolid, accompanied by the two queens his sisters, he set out upon a rainy day, which shews how desirous he was of getting thither, for the place he had chosen for his retreat. This was the monastery of St. Justus, belonging to the order of Hieronymites, next in authority to the Carthusians, seated in the Vera de Placentia, which all who have seen it describe as one of the sweetest and pleasantest places in Europe^m. He resided in a little house built near the convent, employed himself in acts of piety and devotion, and practised for his amusement some of the mechanic artsⁿ. It is certain that king Philip consulted him in the beginning of the ensuing year, by his favourite Ruy Gomez de Silva, upon the most proper methods of raising men and money in Spain, and upon the expediency of the prince Don Carlos passing into Flanders: as to the first part of his commission, he gave him the best council in his power, and dissuaded the last^o. He did not actually resign the empire till the beginning of the year 1558; when the ensigns of the imperial dignity were sent to the diet by the prince of Orange, the vice-chancellor of the empire, and his secretary^p. He was so desirous of fulfilling, in the most exact manner, the duties of that station which was the result of his own choice, that he would not permit the two queens to reside at Placentia, as they would have done, that his meditations might be the less disturbed^a. In this state he was found, but not surpris'd, a by that death he had long expected, and to which he submitted with all exterior marks of humility, piety, and patience, on the 21st of September the same year, in the 59th year of his age^r. Donna Leonora, queen dowager of Portugal and France, upon her return into Castile from a visit she had made her daughter in the first-mentioned kingdom, died after a short illness, a few months before him^s; Donna Maria, queen dowager of Hungary, within the compass of the same month^t; and his daughter-in-law, queen Mary of England, within the space of two months^u.

THIS great prince, by his empress Donna Isabella of Portugal, had many sons, none of which survived beyond the age of infancy, except his successor Don Philip, and two daughters, the infanta Donna Maria, who espoused the archduke Maximilian, son to Ferdinand king of the Romans, and who was himself afterwards emperor, and the infanta Donna Joanna, princess of Portugal^v. As to his natural children, there are many doubts and disputes: he had by a Dutch lady a daughter Margaret, first married to Cosmo de Medicis, duke of Florence, and, after his demise, to Ottavio Farnese, duke of Parma, by whom she was the mother of Alexander Farnese, one of the greatest captains of his age^x. By another lady he had a son, who was the famous Don Juan of Austria, who was bred up by the emperor's faithful servant Lewis Quixada, without knowing who was his father, and who considered Margaret Ulloa, the wife of Quixada, as his mother^y. At his departure from Brussels, it is said the emperor acquainted Don Philip that he had a brother, and where he was. Upon this discovery Don Juan discerned that the wife of Quixada was not his mother. He was afterwards told, that a German lady of Ratisbon, Barbara de Blomberg, was his mother, and he thought her so to his death^z. But some modern writers, upon the credit of the jesuit Strada, have surmised, that his birth was not less illustrious on the side of his mother than his father, which, however favoured by great writers, is liable to many difficulties^a. Those who say that the emperor had another natural son, whose name was Priam Conrad, are mistaken; he was the son of Barbara Blomberg by her husband, and therefore Don Juan considered him as his half-brother^b. Some mention^c another Don Juan, who died at seven years of age; but whether this be true or not is scarce worth inquiry.

Reasons for preserving the history intire, and not intermixing it with his son's.

WITH regard to the character of this great prince, the reader will collect it from the facts that have been related. His own historians lift him too high; other writers have visibly laboured to diminish his reputation, and laboured to little purpose^d. There are few monarchs of whom more falsities have been related, and this from his first entrance on the government to his resigning it; which many would make us believe was with a view to the papacy, a thing highly improbable, and absolutely inconsistent with other reports of his dying in protestant sentiments; which is altogether unlikely, since the emperor was serious in his religious notions, and had conversed with divines who had embraced the Christian faith as set forth in the Scriptures, and who suffered for that faith^e. It is also said, that he repented of his resignation, as we have hinted already; but as there is no act of his mentioned to prove it, it is far from deserving credit^f. We have now conducted him from his retreat to his tomb, and shall therefore proceed to the reign of his son Don Philip; having taken this method to render his history clear and connected in all its particulars, and to avoid breaking the thread of the ensuing narrative, by interspersing facts that would have been far less intelligible in that way than when the reader sees them, as he does here, all together.

The history of the reign of Don Philip II.

^a THE first thing done by Don Philip, after his accession to the dominions of Spain by the resignation of his father, was to satisfy the queen of England, his consort, and his subjects in general, by concluding a peace, and, when this was found impracticable, a truce, with the crown of France for five years, which was published at Cambray on the 4th of February, between the emperor and the two kings of France and Spain; the news of which was very acceptable every where, except at Rome^a. Paul IV. persisted in his aversion to the house of Austria, and, to gratify his resentment, shewed very little care either for what he did, or for what was said of his actions. His scheme was to deprive king Philip of the kingdom of Naples, to give it to a French prince, and, by the assistance of that crown, to make such other regulations in Italy, as might gratify his own inclinations, and the ambition of his family^b. This truce, therefore, was very unwelcome to him, who was already in arms, and left the dominions of the church in a manner at the mercy of the duke of Alba, whom he endeavoured to amuse with propositions and treaties, but who was, of all men living, the least to be imposed upon by such artifices. In Spain, the nobility and people were inclined to carry on the war in Africa against the Moors, who, after taking from them Bugia, were disposed to strip them of the rest of their conquests; and it was to prevent this, that the Spaniards were for engaging in an offensive war, which Philip prevented, by sending them positive orders not to proceed therein till his arrival, which they very punctually obeyed^c.

THE pope, having sent his nephew cardinal Caraffa into France, engaged Henry the second to conclude a secret league against the Austrians, in which the Turk was to have a share, tho' that part of the scheme failed^d. The duke of Guise, however, was sent with a potent army to protect the city of Rome from being sacked by the duke of Alba, as it had been by the duke of Bourbon; and, about the same time, the truce was violated by the admiral Coligni's attempting to surprise Doway, in which he failed^e. Upon this king Philip found himself under a necessity of renewing the war; and, at his request, his consort queen Mary prevailed upon her subjects to take part in the quarrel against France. Accordingly a considerable body of troops was sent over, under the earl of Pembroke, to join the king's army; which, under Philibert duke of Savoy, and count Egmont, were employed in the siege of St. Quintin in Picardy^f. The French army, under the command of the constable and marshal St. André, marched towards St. Quintin, to cover a reinforcement they meant to throw into the place, which they effected; but, in their retreat, prince Philibert and the count of Egmont attacked and routed them intirely with great loss. This action happened on the 10th of August^g, dedicated by the church of Rome to the honour of St. Laurence the martyr; and, four days after, the place was taken by storm, the king having then joined the army, which struck the French with such consternation, that they immediately sent their fleet to Civita Vecchia, in order to bring over the duke of Guise's army from Italy; so that the pope, finding himself abandoned, was constrained to submit to such terms as the duke of Alba thought fit to prescribe, to receive him with great kindness and respect when he thought fit to make him a visit in Rome, and to dismiss him with his blessing^h. This year died the cardinal archbishop of Toledo; upon which the king Don Philip advanced to that see father Bartolome de Carranza y Miranda, a Dominican frier, who was constrained to accept of it against his will, and who was afterwards very cruelly treated by the inquisitionⁱ.

In the beginning of the ensuing year, the duke of Guise, having surprised some of the adjacent fortresses, pursued the advantage he had gained so well as to make himself master of Calais, and all its dependencies, by which the English being intirely driven out of France, the deep sense of the loss and disgrace so affected queen Mary that it brought her to the grave^k. The same duke, in the spring, attacked the strong fortress of Thionville, of which he made himself master: soon after which the marshal duke de Termes marched with a great body of forces from Calais, and, after sacking Dunkirk, advanced to Gravelines, where being attacked in front by the Spanish and Flemish horse, commanded by count Egmont, and taken in flank by the artillery of the English fleet, he was thoroughly beaten, and taken prisoner, with the loss of almost all the army that he commanded. In Italy, the duke of Alba being recalled, that his severity might not lose those countries, which by his great military skill had been defended, the Turkish fleet, under the command of the basha Piali, consisting of one hundred and thirty galleys, came in the month of June, and insulted the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and, having done what mischief they could, proceeded to Corfica, to join the French, who treated them that year as they had been treated by them the year before^m. They sailed from thence to Minorca, where they took and plundered Port Mahon, and then, with a large booty and many slaves on board, returned to Constantinople. The French army under monsieur de la Motte gained some advantages in the beginning of the summer, but were afterwards beaten; and, about the approach of winter, the two crowns being equally weary of the war, consented to a negotiation, and a suspension of arms, in order to the conclusion of a stable and solid peace.ⁿ

A. D. 1558. In the beginning of the year the peace was concluded at Chateau Cambresis, in which it was stipulated, that his catholic majesty should marry the princess Elizabeth of France, who, in the life-time of Mary of England, had been thought of for his son the prince Don Carlos. Madame Margaret, the French king's sister, was to marry the duke of Savoy, in consideration of which the French were to restore to him all his dominions. Corfica was to return to the Genoise, the Spaniards quitted all claim to Burgundy, and the French to the Milaneze and the kingdom of Naples. In this treaty Philip did not take proper care of his allies; for the empire lost Metz, Toul, and Verdun, and the English Calais; though, to save appearances, it was stipulated that the French should render it in eight years, if queen Elizabeth did not furnish them within that time with a pretence to keep it^o. The duke of Alba was sent to Paris, to espouse the princess Elizabeth for the king; and the duke of Savoy went thither to wed the princess Margaret himself. The rejoicings for these marriages, and for the peace, were interrupted by the fatal accident of the French king's death, by a splinter of a lance that struck him in the eye; which, however, had no influence on the treaty or the marriages^p. King Philip hastened his return to Spain, and left his sister Margaret, princess of Parma, governess of the Low Countries, keeping her son prince Alexander Farnese at Madrid by way of hostage, under colour of providing for his education. The king embarked in Zealand on the 20th of August, and arrived in Biscay on the 29th^q. He held soon after an assembly of the states of Castile at Toledo, where, according to the desire of his father, he acknowledged Don Juan of Austria for his brother; and is said to have wept when he first saw him, because of the strong resemblance he had to the emperor^r. On the 4th of October the king was present at an act of faith, and, which is singular enough, he is highly commended by the Spanish historians for his want of humanity, and for his attributing to the gospel of peace, cruelties that would have made Mohammedans tremble. But the inquisition were resolved to tear up what they stiled heresy by the roots; and, having persuaded the king to consider this as a point of state, they proceeded without mercy, and he, who should have protected, was present, and looked on the slaughter of his subjects with pleasure^s.

The duke de Medina Celi, with the Spanish fleet, beat by the Turks. THE princess Elizabeth of France, being conducted to the frontiers of that kingdom by the cardinal of Bourbon and the duke of Vendosme, was received there by the cardinal archbishop of Burgos and the duke of Infantada, who conducted her to Toledo, where the marriage was celebrated with great pomp on the 2d of February^t. In the assembly of the states held soon after, the prince Don Carlos was acknowledged successor, and sworn to by all who were present^u. The knights of Malta having solicited the king very earnestly to recover Tripoli out of the hands of the infidels, the command of that expedition was committed to the duke of Medina Celi, viceroy of the Sicilies, who assembled for that purpose a numerous army and a strong fleet. He was assisted also by Doria, by the pope, and other princes and states of Italy, and was very successful at the beginning, making himself master of the island of Gerbes. While he remained there with his fleet, he was surprised by the basha Piali, with the whole force of the Ottoman empire under his command, which threw the Christians into such a panic, that they might with greater propriety be said to be destroyed than defeated. The duke himself escaped with great difficulty; his son, with several other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners, together with twenty galleys, and at least as many were sunk, with all who were on board them. Soon after the fortrefs and island of Gerbes were likewise reduced^v. The king Don Philip was extremely affected by this misfortune, and immediately demanded from the new pope, Pius the fourth, the necessary powers for raising money on the clergy. Antony

- a of Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, endeavoured to engage the pope to procure from his catholic majesty the restitution of the kingdom of Navarre, which he claimed in right of the family of Albret, but without effect; though it is said Philip was not extremely well satisfied with his own title to that kingdom ^x. The city of Toledo appearing to the king less convenient for the residence of his court than that of Madrid, he removed thither this year, and began to lay out those improvements which have since rendered it the capital of Spain ^y. The persecution against the protestants was still carried on with unrelenting severity, and, on the 22d of December, there was an act of faith held at Seville, in which some were put to death, and many were condemned to grievous punishments, of which perpetual imprisonment was amongst the mildest ^z.
- b THE king, sensible of that insolence which prosperity always inspires, more especially Don Carlos amongst the Turks, gave orders for building galleys in all the ports on the coasts of Catalonia, Valentia, Naples, and Sicily, and directed such precautions to be taken for the protection of all the maritime parts of his dominions as preserved them from any insult. The jealousies and heart-burnings, that afterwards produced such terrible consequences in the Low Countries, began about this time, not through any fault in the dukes of Parma, but from the rigour and haughtiness of the bishop of Mecklin, so well known to the world by the title he acquired next year of cardinal Granvelle ^a. The great danger that Spain was in of being attacked by the infidels, and the repeated intelligence which the court received that the Morescoes in Granada held secret correspondence with the Moors in Barbary, induced the king to cause them all to be disarmed; which was done with great dexterity and address, but at the same time it so terrified those poor people, that it has been thought the most probable cause of their subsequent insurrection; from whence it appeared of how much greater consequence it would have been to have left their arms, and by good treatment have taken away their disaffection ^b. The Moors threatening Oran with a siege, the king ordered Don Juan de Mendoza to sail from Malaga with a squadron of twenty-four galleys, with a body of troops on board, for that fortress; but they met with such a storm at sea, that twenty-two galleys, four thousand men, and amongst them the general himself, and several other persons of quality, were lost ^c. The emperor Ferdinand, making peace about this time with the grand signior, obtained the liberty of the Spanish noblemen, who were made prisoners in the fight at sea before-mentioned, except
- d Don Gaston de la Cerda, son to the duke of Medina Celi, who died at Constantinople ^d. This year an accident befel the prince Don Carlos, which was very near being fatal to him. The king had sent him, together with his brother Don Juan of Austria, and his nephew prince Alexander of Farnese, to the university of Alcala de Henares, to pursue their studies. The prince, who was then about seventeen, and very sprightly and active, unluckily tumbled down stairs, by which he received such a blow on the head, that for some time he scarce gave any signs of life, but by degrees came to himself, and continued for some days tolerably well, when on a sudden he was attacked by a fever, attended with such violent symptoms, that the physicians acquainted the king that his life was in the utmost danger, who thereupon immediately repaired to Alcala, where he shewed the utmost tenderness and concern for the prince, who is said to have recovered, when at the very point of death, by laying his hand upon the head of a dead monk, afterwards highly revered in Spain by the name of St. Diego ^e.
- e IN the spring of the ensuing year, the king Don Philip, after having maturely considered the plan offered him by Juan Baptista de Toledo for building a most magnificent edifice, or rather a group of elegant and magnificent structures, made choice of a great extent of rough, barren, and heathy country, at a small distance from the village of Escorial, which lies about seven leagues from Madrid, where the first stone of the monastery was laid with great solemnity on the 23d of April; and, on the 20th of August following, the first stone of the church was likewise laid with equal solemnity, and dedicated to the honour of the holy martyr St. Laurence, who is said to have been broiled alive at Rome in the third century ^f. The best Spanish authors say, that in this the king executed the will of his father, who was very desirous of erecting a monastery for the burial-place of himself and his family, worthy of those vast dominions over which they ruled while living; and, as a proof of this, they allege the placing Geronymites in the monastery; but at the same time it is agreed, that the dedication of the church, and indeed the whole form of the structure, which is that of a gridiron, is to be referred to the victory of St. Quintin, which was gained upon the feast of St. Laurence ^g. In the spring, the project of Hassan, son of Barbarossa king of Algiers, for the recovery of Oran and Mazalquivir out of the hands of the Spaniards, began to discover itself. He had a formerly treated with his catholic majesty, of which, as they had some suspicion at Constantinople, he framed this design to recover his credit, and employed in it the whole force of the infidels in Africa, as well as a great naval armament, which was furnished by the grand signior.

ABOUT the middle of March he took the field with a numerous army, invested both fortresses, and so stationed his squadrons, that they could obtain little or no relief by sea. The count de Alcantete commanded in Oran, and his brother Don Martin de Cordova in Mazalquivir, who having an intire affection for, and perfect confidence in, each other, made all the necessary dispositions for a long and gallant defence, for which, by their having very numerous garrisons, they were the better enabled. As there were many strong forts and outworks detached from the body of both places, the two brothers took care to put these in the best state of defence possible, because they might be defended with a small force, and their garrisons frequently changed. This had a good effect, for though, in Oran and Mazalquivir, the allowance of provisions was very sparing, yet, in the forts, the soldiers were allowed to fare well; and when they were either wounded, or fatigued beyond measure, the garrison was changed. By these methods the Turks suffered extremely, and paid very dear for every yard of ground they gained; but at length they came to attack Mazalquivir by sea, and notwithstanding they were repulsed in several general assaults, as they persisted obstinately in the pursuit of their point, the place had been probably taken, if the Christian fleet had not arrived, under the command of Don Francisco de Mendoza, upon which king Hassan was obliged to retire, after a fruitless siege of three months. The king immediately declared the count de Alcantete viceroy of Navarre, and gave his brother Don Martin de Cordova, and all the officers who commanded under them, particular marks of his favour^b. This war engaged the king to cause the Moors of Valentia to be disarmed, which was done throughout that kingdom in a single hour, and six thousand sabres, that were taken from them, sent to the militia in the island of *Sardinia*ⁱ. The king made a tour in the winter to Saragossa, where he was treated with great splendor and magnificence; however, being informed that great acts of injustice were committed by magistrates, and other persons in power, upon the lower sort of people, he caused many to be put to death, and their estates being confiscated, he made full restitution out of them to all who had been injured. He went from thence to Monçon,^d where he held the states of Arragon, Catalonia, and Valentia, where he obtained very liberal supplies, and immediately issued his orders for assembling a very numerous fleet in the spring, as well as for finishing all the gallies upon the stocks^k. The king, still neglecting to recall cardinal Granvelle, the troubles in the Low Countries daily increased. The council of Trent being closed this year, the Spanish prelates and divines, who had assisted there, returned home^l. and the king, who had been the principal support of that council, received them with much respect.

As the king had been informed that some of his subjects in America were apprehensive that they might some time or other be divided from Castile, he caused a solemn instrument to be drawn up, by which all the countries the Spaniards possessed, or which might be conquered by them, in that part of the world, were irrevocably annexed to that crown; for the due performance of which he, for himself, his heirs and successors, pledged his royal faith to them and their posterity; which act was transmitted thither for their satisfaction^m. As the succession depended at this time solely on the life of the prince Don Carlos, the king sent for his nephews the archdukes Rodolph and Ernest, the sons of Maximilian king of the Romans, who soon after became emperor, and received them with great kindness and affection. The vast preparations that had been made, as well in Italy as in Spain, for assembling a great naval power, were in some measure relaxed, upon the king's having certain intelligence that the Turks had laid aside their design of sending their fleet into the Mediterranean; but, however, as the expence had been very great, as many gallies were assembled at Carthage,^f and as the squadrons of Portugal and Malta were arrived, it was determined to employ them. The king judged no expedition so proper for that purpose as the reduction of Penon de Velez, a fortress which the Moors had recovered out of the hands of the Christians, and under the cannon of which their corsairs took protection whenever they were chased by the gallies of Spain. There had been an attempt made upon the place the year before, but without effect, chiefly through a misunderstanding amongst the general officers employed in that service. The command was now given to Don Garcia Toledo, viceroy of Sicily, who, with a numerous army and a potent fleet, failed in order to execute his master's orders. Notwithstanding the place was very strong from situation, as well as the effects of art, covered by several good

- a forts, and defended by a numerous garrison, it was, after a very gallant defence, abandoned A. D. 1564. by the infidels, and, the Spanish troops taking possession of it, was fortified in a better manner, and rendered much stronger, than before^a. The king ordered the decrees of the council of Trent to be published, enforced, and obeyed, throughout all his dominions. It was this that determined the inhabitants of the Low Countries to defend liberty of conscience by the sword, and to prevent the introduction of the inquisition amongst them; and they began to dispose every thing for throwing off the yoke of Spain, notwithstanding the king had at length, to comply with their desires, made use of an honourable pretence to remove cardinal Granvelle; a condescension that, two years before, might have restored the public tranquillity^o, but was then considered as a testimony that the king saw he had been in the
- b wrong.

- THE corsairs of Barbary, notwithstanding their loss at Penon de Velez, continued still to disturb the commerce, and to make frequent descents upon the coasts of Spain, which it was impossible for the king's squadrons to prevent, as they committed these depredations in light ships, and by surprise. However, the king recollecting the advice given him by Don Garcia de Toledo, resolved to send a squadron, with a certain number of vessels filled with stone and bitumen, to block up and spoil the mouth of the river of Tetuan, to which these pirates commonly resorted. This measure, as it was wisely contrived, was very happily executed, to the great satisfaction of the king, and benefit of his subjects. But it was not long before both he and they were alarmed with certain intelligence that the Turks were arming with
- c incredible diligence, and that they would speedily put to sea a greater fleet than any that had yet appeared. On this, proper precautions were taken for the security of the Spanish coasts, more especially those of Catalonia and Valentia, for the protection of Majorca, Sardinia and Corfica, for putting Sicily and Naples in a proper condition of defence, and for assembling the gallies of Genoa, Tuscany, and the other Italian states, to be employed as occasion might require^p. The French monarch Charles IX. and his mother, having demanded an interview with his catholic majesty at Bayonne, he excused himself, and sent the queen Donna Isabella to confer with her mother and brother, attended by the duke of Alba, and some other persons of great quality; and in these conferences, which lasted about three weeks, it is said that various resolutions were taken for extinguishing heresy, or, to speak with greater propriety,
- d for the extirpation of those whom they stiled heretics^q. The king likewise caused several provincial councils to be held in his dominions, in which the decrees of the assembly of Trent were received; and though one would have imagined this must have been very acceptable at Rome, yet it happened quite otherwise; for Pius IV. observing that all this was done by virtue of the royal prerogative, and without so much as mentioning his holiness's name, he was extremely offended at it.

- IN the mean time, certain advice was received, that this prodigious armament of the Turks was intended against Malta, which induced the grand master Jean de Valette to demand the assistance of all the Christian powers. Don Garcia de Toledo, viceroy of Sicily, went thither immediately with a squadron of twenty-eight gallies, in order to give the best advice and
- e assistance in his power. He found all things in a much better state than he expected, and the grand master at the head of five hundred knights, and four thousand regular troops besides, exclusive of two thousand five hundred domestics, capable of bearing arms. He left with him his natural son Don Frederic, with a hundred Spanish volunteers; and having furnished him with ammunition and provisions, and promised him all the succours in his power, he returned to Sicily towards the end of April. On the 18th of May, the Turkish fleet, commanded by Piali basha, consisting of upwards of three hundred sail, appeared in sight, and debarked soon after an army of forty-five thousand men, under the command of Mustapha basha. As the Turkish generals are almost always responsible for the success of the expeditions in which they are employed, they pushed their military operations with prodigious obstinacy,
- f notwithstanding the great and continual losses they sustained, which, however, were as regularly supplied by continual reinforcements. While things were in this situation, a vast naval force was assembled in Sicily, where, notwithstanding the pressing solicitations of the grand master, the viceroy Don Garcia delayed their departure, which occasioned much discontent in John Andrew Doria, and other principal officers; but the viceroy considered, that, if the expedition miscarried, it must be fatal to Malta, and might be so to Naples and Sicily. At length, however, taking his measures from his own intelligence, he sailed with a fleet of seventy gallies, and, on the 6th of September, landed 12,000 Spanish and Italian foot without any interruption, and returned safe with his fleet to Sicily^r.

THE Turks, as soon as they knew that the succours were landed, raised the siege, embarked their artillery, and would have put their troops on board, but that Piali basha persuaded Mustapha to attack the Christians in their camp, which he did, and was very soundly beat; upon which he retired to the fleet, and the Turks quitted the island with much precipitation^a. The viceroy of Sicily returned with his fleet, and pursued them, but with no great effect: after which he reembarked the forces, and carried them back to Sicily. This war produced some very singular consequences in Spain, where Don Juan of Austria made his escape from court, with a sincere intention of going to Malta, to signalize himself against the infidels; but, over-heating himself in his journey, fell sick of a fever in Aragon, where he received the king's orders to return, which he was forced to obey^b. The prince Don Carlos was inclined to take the same step, but in appearance only; for, in reality, he meant to go to Flanders, being upon bad terms with his father. By a strange infatuation, the person he trusted was Ruy Gomez de Silva, the king's favourite, who cheated him with a false letter from the viceroy of Naples, importing that Malta was relieved; upon which he laid aside his journey, and then, as is generally supposed, revealed it to his father^c. This year prince Alexander Farnese was sent by the king to his mother in Flanders, after procuring for him Donna Maria, the daughter of the infant Don Edward of Portugal, in marriage; and Don Antonio, who afterwards took the title of king of Portugal, being at this time upon bad terms with the regency, retired to Madrid, and was kindly received by king Philip^d.

TOWARDS the close of the preceding year, pope Pius the fourth had sent a cardinal, with the title of his legate, accompanied by two commissaries, to enquire into the reasons which had induced the inquisition to seize and imprison the archbishop of Toledo; but the death of the pope obliged the cardinal legate to return, and put an end to the commission. The king was in hopes that the cardinal of Alexandria, who, upon his accession to the papal throne, assumed the name of Pius V. might have been prevailed upon to act in a different manner from his predecessor; but it proved otherwise; for he not only renewed the commission, but likewise ordered that the archbishop should be sent to Rome, with all the original pieces that regarded his process, which the inquisition at first endeavoured to avoid, but with which at length they were obliged to comply^e. King Philip's intelligence, tho' it was generally pretty good, failed him this year, in regard to the motions of the Turks, who, he was brought to believe, would employ their whole strength in a land-war against Hungary. This kingdom they attacked indeed with a numerous army, but at the same time they dispatched Piali basha, with a strong fleet, to plunder the coast of Naples, which he performed so effectually, that, after loading his galleys as deep as they would swim with booty and slaves, he was constrained to leave much that he had taken behind, having intelligence that Don Garcia de Toledo was at sea with a fleet to attack him^f. His catholic majesty, at the solicitation of the grand master, resolved to be at the expence of building a new fortress to cover the capital of that island; and having sent an engineer, with a sufficient number of workmen for that purpose, agreed to furnish the value of ten thousand ducats in military stores, provisions to the same value, and the like sum in ready money annually, till it should be completely finished^g. On the 11th of August the queen Donna Isabella was delivered of a daughter, who was baptized by the pope's nuncio, and had the name given her of Isabella Clara Eugenia, of whom we shall have occasion hereafter to speak frequently^h. The prince Don Carlos was one of the sponsors at this ceremony, though the king had discovered his intrigues with Mr. Montigny, one of the deputies from the malecontents in the Low Countries, by whom he was solicited to go thither; for which that unfortunate gentleman was sent prisoner to the castle of Segovia, and, upon his attempting to make his escape from thence, was transferred to Medina del Campo, where, with some of his friends, who had accompanied him into Spain, he lost his life upon a scaffold. Not long after, a resolution was taken to send the duke of Alba to support the inquisition, and compel the Flemings to remain good catholics by a military force, though some of the council advised that the king should go thither in person; and perhaps his affairs would have taken a better turn, if he had yielded to this adviceⁱ.

- a Africa, gave them intelligence prejudicial to the Christians, and frequently stole their neighbours children, whom they sold to these corsairs, who carried them into Barbary, circumcised, and brought them up Mohammedans, with much more to the same purpose; upon which informations the zealous pope wrote in very strong terms to king Philip, to stir him up against these poor people, and to raise a new flame about religion in Spain, at a time when he was already sufficiently embarrassed by pursuing this conduct in the Low Countries. If this conduct was strange in the pope, it was still stranger in the king, who took his advice, and sent express orders into the kingdom of Granada to oblige the Morescoes to change their habit, their manners, and their language, all at once. Mondejar, who was captain-general of that province, and others of his principal officers, remonstrated strongly in favour of these poor people, and declared their unwillingness to attempt the execution of a scheme equally unreasonable and impracticable, which looked as if they had a design to drive them first into despair, and then into rebellion. The Moors themselves also, by their deputies, represented with great humility the sad situation they were in; and with much modesty, but by clear and strong arguments, as the best Spanish historians admit, refuted the principal points of accusation that had been urged against them. But it was to little or no effect, except procuring a small respite; for the king gave express orders, even to those who had most strongly opposed this measure, to take their instructions from the resident Spinosa, a man who, in point of inflexibility, did not yield at all to the duke of Alba himself; and we shall quickly see what this produced.
- c THE king ordered a fleet to be assembled at Corunna, and it was certainly given out, at least, if not intended, that he would go in person to the Low Countries. An author of great reputation ^a assures us, that permission was asked from Charles IX. to debark the Spanish troops at Frejus, and so to march them by land into Burgundy; but the king found a civil pretence for declining what it was not either his interest or his inclination to grant. When the duke of Alba came to take his leave of the prince Don Carlos, in order to go to Flanders, the young man threw himself into a violent passion, told him he meant to go thither himself; that the army should have no other chief; and that he should not presume to go thither on pain of his high displeasure. The duke of Alba answered with great respect, that, at this time, those countries were in the utmost confusion; that he went to settle tranquility; that the prince would bestow that time in preserving a life infinitely precious to Spain; and that when all troubles were composed, he might visit the Low Countries without danger, and be the distributors of those favours which his father might think fit to bestow on such as he desired either to reward or to reclaim. He added, that, at all events, it was his own duty to obey the king's orders, which he hoped his highness would not take amiss. The prince immediately drew his dagger in great passion, and would have killed him; but the duke seized him by the arms, cried out for help, and, as soon as some of the courtiers entered, withdrew, and informed the king of this strange event, which, without question, gave him great displeasure. The duke of Alba landing at Nice, passed into Lombardy, and put himself at the head of the Spanish army, which, tho' not very numerous, was composed of such good troops, and the duke's military reputation was then at such a height, that some of the greatest powers in Europe were alarmed. The Swiss were apprehensive, that, in compliment to the pope, the duke would have taken Geneva in his passage; and therefore they thought fit to arm by way of precaution. The protestants in France had their fears; but the duke executed his commission punctually, and, having conducted the army into the county of Burgundy, proceeded from thence into Flanders, where having caused the counts of Egmont and Horn to be arrested as they came from council, he directed a citadel to be built at Antwerp. As he paid little or no regard to the princess Margaret, she very prudently resigned the title of governess, and retired into Italy, leaving the duke to reap all the glory and all the fruits of his own measures ^f. Measures which had one good effect, that they served to establish the Dutch republic.
- f THE unfortunate prince Don Carlos of Spain seemed to be intent upon accomplishing his own undoing. He had the misfortune to be deformed in his person, and to have a weakness in one of his legs; circumstances which occasioned more than ordinary indulgence to be shewn him in his infancy; and this, if it did not excite, at least strengthened bad habits. He was hasty and passionate, and, which rarely happens in the same person, he was obstinate and fullen, very apt to take offence, and implacable in his aversions; which very probably was the occasion of his distractions; for as he did not conceal his resentment, so some of the greatest persons about the court were the objects of it, and therefore little inclined to conceal or to excuse his errors. The president Spinosa, Don Ruy Gomez, prince of Eboli, and the king's favourite, were of this number; and Don Garcia Toledo, his governor, who had a sincere affection for him, taking the liberty, as they were riding together in a wood, to expostulate with him upon his ill conduct, the prince suddenly attempted to kill him; upon which he immediately set spurs to his horse, and fled to Madrid^e. The prince was desirous of marrying his cousin the archduchess Anne of Austria, which was likewise very acceptable to the emperor; but as the king made no great haste in the negotiation, he conceived in his own mind that the king thought him unfit to be married, and incapable of the succession; upon this he took a resolution of flying into Germany, and wrote letters to most of the nobility, desiring their assistance in a certain great affair; which they promised him, provided it was not against his father, and furnished him with a very large sum of money. He then broke the matter to Don John of Austria, and pressed him to concur in it; but he told him he had put it out of his power; that some of the nobility would acquaint the king, and therefore it was better in him to drop the thing itself^h.

On which the king goes in person to his apartment, and causes him to be arrested.

BUT he persisted; upon which his confessor forsook him. The admiral, and some other lords, having brought his letters to the king; and his majesty being likewise informed that the master of the posts had received the prince's orders to furnish horses for a long journey, he resolved to arrest him; and, for this purpose, went the same day, which was the 18th of January, to Madrid. About midnight he entered his son's apartment in the palace, attended by Ruy Gomez de Silva, Don Juan Manrique de Lara, Don Antonio de Toledo, the prior of St. John, and Lewis Quixada, the duke of Feria following with some of the guards. The prince, as soon as he saw him, shrunk under the bed-cloaths, crying out, Will your majesty kill me? I am not mad, but am rendered desperate by the manner in which your majesty treats me. The king bid him make himself easy, and be assured that he meant every thing for his good. The king seized all the arms that were in the room, together with his papers, and a strong box. He then appointed six noblemen of the first families in Spain to wait upon the prince, with express orders that two of them should have him constantly in their sight; and that they should permit him to have nothing in his reach by which he might endanger his own lifeⁱ. The king immediately gave notice to the pope's nuncio, and to all the foreign ministers, of the motives which led him to treat the prince in this manner. He did the same to all the great towns, by a letter, which is still extant in more volumes than one^k. Their imperial majesties interposed with great earnestness and anxiety in favour of the prince; but the king assured them, that he had taken the advice of civilians and divines before he proceeded so far; and that they might be assured he would act with caution and tenderness for the future^l.

He dies under that confinement in the space of a few months.

DON Carlos, however, bore his confinement with great impatience. He refused all nourishment for two whole days, of which the king being informed, he went to his apartment, and staid till he had taken some refreshment. He afterwards eat with great avidity, and overcharged his stomach. When the weather became hot, he drank to excess of ice dissolved to water, by which he weakened the tone of his stomach to such a degree that it would bear nothing. His physicians, seeing the danger he was in, advised him to prepare for death; which he did with great piety and calmness, being assisted by his confessor and other divines. He desired earnestly to see his father, who went to him immediately, and gave him his blessing. The prince begged his pardon, and desired that he would provide for his servants. The king asked him what he would have done for them, and, when he told him, promised to do all that he had asked. In a short time after the king withdrew, he expired, on the 24th of June, in the 24th year of his age^m. Such was the end of this unhappy prince, according to the best Spanish historians; but other writers have taken great freedom upon this subject, and have, without scruple, asserted that he was put to death by his father's commandⁿ. If this be true, it is inexcusable; if it be not true, the king was doubly unfortunate, in the loss of his son and of his reputation, of which few princes were so tender. He caused the whole court to go into mourning, and buried him publicly with great splendor^o (A).

(A) The prevailing opinion, as to the violent death of the prince Don Carlos, has proceeded chiefly from the confidence with which it was reported by French historians; one of them has given a long account of the king's proceedings against him before the inquisition, the issue of which was his being sentenced to death; but he was to be allowed to chuse what death he pleased, which having refused, four slaves came into his chamber in a morning, where two held his arms, one his legs, and the other strangled him with a silken cord. The same writer agrees that many were of opinion he was bled to death in a warm bath⁽¹⁾. Twigit, in his history of Spain, discusses the point largely, and at length asserts, that the inquisitors persuaded the king that he might lawfully put to death the prince his son, the queen his wife, and the prince with whom she was supposed to be with child, though it proved a princess. After all, he leaves it doubtful whether the prince was poisoned, or strangled by slaves. According to this writer, Don Carlos was impotent, and the unfortunate queen fell a sacrifice to the king's jealousy, not of the prince, but of the marquis de Pozza (2). Monsieur St. Evremont indulges a very unbecoming pleasantry upon this melancholy subject. He says, the Spaniard, who strangled Don Carlos, cried out while he was doing it, Calla, calla, Señor, todo que se hace es por su bien; that is, a THE marquis de Mondejar, finding all his representations ineffectual, left the publication of the king's injunctions to his son the count de Tendilla; and they were accordingly published about the beginning of the year ^p. The archbishop also enjoined the clergy in their respective parishes to require the Morescoes to register all their children from the age of five to fifteen, in order to be taught the Castilian tongue, and to be thoroughly instructed in the Christian religion. This manner of proceeding determined them at once to revolt; which resolution, though suddenly taken, was pursued with great slowness and secrecy, and was managed intirely by Farax Aben Farax, and some others of their chiefs. The first thing they did was to send into the mountainous country of Alpujarros, where their strength lay; and finding that there were eighty-five thousand Moorish families, that they could with ease bring fifty thousand able men into the field, they conceived the recovery of Granada a thing very practicable, if the scheme was rightly conducted. They sent an agent to Algiers, without being suspected, and they contrived a very singular method of introducing their deputies to sound the minds of the people in all parts of the kingdom, without giving any umbrage. They addressed themselves to the archbishop of Granada, and having informed him, that a great number of their poor countrymen, coming about their business to the city, were taken sick and died, without receiving either temporal or spiritual comforts; they intreated him to procure a place for erecting an hospital without the gates, promising to leave it intirely to his direction. He obtained for them this favour, and afterwards passes for those whom they named to go abroad, and beg a sum sufficient to erect and endow this hospital; and these were the very men who managed the insurrection ^q. They first fixed upon Holy Thursday; but finding their preparations not complete, they put it off to Christmas Eve. In the mean time, another deputy of theirs, who was going to Africa, was discovered by accident; and though he made his escape into the mountains, yet his papers were seized, and sent to the court by the count de Tendilla, which gave such light into their designs, that the king ordered the marquis de Mondejar to repair immediately to Granada, who, by his great prudence, prevented their surprizing that city ^r. At the time appointed, however, or rather a little before, they revolted every-where in the country; and having elected Don Ferdinand de Valor, a young man of the age of twenty-four, very rich, extremely brave, and very prudent, they proclaimed him, by the name of Mohammed Aben Humeya, king of Granada and Cordova, of which family he really was, and some of them had formerly bore the same title. He swore, at the time of his election, to live and die in support of the Mohammedan religion. After the revolt, they committed every-where the most outrageous excesses, and the most inexcusable cruelties, more especially on ecclesiastics and women, profaning churches, and expressing such an aversion and detestation of the Christian religion, as if they were desirous of justifying all that their enemies had said of them, and to bring those who had interceded on their behalf into suspicion with the court, or at least into contempt ^s.

c IN the month of May, the king named his brother Don Juan of Austria captain-general of the gallies of Spain, and sent him to Cartagena to take upon him the command, after having given him very full instructions in regard to the operations of the campaign, and of his own conduct. Hold your tongue, hold your tongue, Sir; all that is done is for your good (3); which seems to be a wilful mistake of what the king said when he seized him; for at the breaking open of the door, the prince cried out, What brings your majesty here? Is it to kill me? To which the king answered, No, my son; it is for your good. Be not impatient (4). Wiser and more impartial writers of that nation confess that those stories have been transmitted to posterity, odio magis quam ex fide, rather to indulge spleen than vindicate the truth (5). But let us hear strangers well informed, and whose integrity will admit of no suspicion. A Polish bishop and senator, who had his information from the Polish minister, then at the court of Philip II. says, that the king, going from Valladolid, turned out of the road to go and make a visit to his son at Madrid, out of paternal affection, and found him giving up the ghost; but he leaves it doubtful whether he died of poison or of grief (6). Morosini, the Venetian senator, who was permitted to inspect the dispatches of their minister to the republic, assures us, that Don Carlos, not being able to find a sword or dagger, the king left him no weapons, and suffered none to go near him armed, with which he might dispatch himself, took the diamond secretly out of his ring, and swallowed it; but finding this did him no hurt, weary of life, and ashamed of his imprisonment, he eat voraciously of all that was brought before him, and swallowed afterwards great quantities of cold water, which brought on a dysentery, that killed him; but that he first received all the sacraments of the church, with his father's forgiveness and blessing (7). This agrees perfectly well with what we have related in the text from a Spanish historian, and, in a matter of so dark and perplexed a nature, may, as the astronomers speak, without any sensible error, pass for truth (8).

received from them, with all imaginable docility, whatever counsels and lights they thought a fit to give him, visited the coasts of Italy and of Africa, examined the ports, changed the garrisons, and returned to court in the month of September, and made a large report to the king of the condition in which he found things every-where, with which his majesty was highly satisfied¹. The queen Donna Isabella, who the year before had been delivered of another daughter, the Infanta Donna Catalina, being in the fifth month of her third pregnancy, died of a miscarriage on the third of October, not without strong suspicions that her death was owing to ignorance, or something worse, in her physicians². The murmurs this occasioned were extremely heightened, when it came to be known that the king had entered into a negotiation for marrying the archduchess Anne of Austria, whom the emperor had intended for his son³. He sent, upon this occasion, his brother the archduke Charles to the court of Spain, with instructions to persuade the king, if possible, to recall the duke of Alba, and to pardon the prince of Orange. All possible marks of kindness and respect were shewn to the archduke; but the advices he gave in the emperor's name were not only slighted, but ill-received; and the successes which the duke of Alba had this year in the Low Countries were magnified, as if he had actually put an end to the war⁴.

War with the Morescoes in Granada carried on with incredible fury. MOHAMMED ABEN HUMEYA laboured all that was in his power to obtain assistance from the princes of Africa and from the grand signior. The former promised much, and gave little; but as for the latter, he neither promised nor gave any thing at all. The Christians, under the command of the marquis de Mondejar, took the field, and carried on the war with vigour; but the marquis, who was thoroughly persuaded in his own mind that a great part of the Morescoes involved in this rebellion were in reality Christians, driven to madness and despair by oppression and ill usage, treated them with lenity, and received many to mercy; by which he gained very useful intelligence, and brought the war, as he imagined, very near to an end. At Granada, however, the president Deza gave out that the marquis husbanded the war, in order to enrich himself and his captains by the plunder of the Morescoes, for whom, at the same time, they suggested he had too much compassion, and held a correspondence with them inconsistent with the king's service. The marquis wrote to the archbishop of Granada, and justified himself fully; but it vexed him so much, that, having dispossessed the Morescoes of a post of great consequence, he caused the old men, women, and children, they had left behind them, to be put to the sword; an action unworthy of so great a man, and of which he was very much ashamed all his life after. The marquis de los Velez also entered the Alpujarros, and had many actions against the Morescoes with different fortune; but he was jealous of the marquis of Mondejar, and would not act in concert with him, which turned to the prejudice of both. The king, to put an end to these disputes, sent his brother Don Juan of Austria to command in chief, with very full powers. He acted with great prudence; and, having received the advice both of the marquis of Mondejar and of the president, he sent them in writing to the king, and desired to know whose advice he should take.

Reasons why the king would not exterminate these people, as he was pressed to do. THE preference that was for some time given to violent councils furnished Aben Humeya with a better army than he had before, though he had been twice beaten by the marquis de Mondejar. He shewed great dexterity and courage in the perilous situation in which he was; for his father Don Antonio and his brother Don Francisco Valor were prisoners at Granada, and this induced him to write to the marquis of Mondejar and to Don Juan of Austria, which raised suspicions in his own people. He chastised such as discovered them with great severity, and, amongst the rest, put to death his father-in-law; and by giving a loose to his passions, in taking several women, created such jealousies, that one of his secretaries, by counterfeiting an order for cutting the throats of a body of Moors that came from Barbary to his assistance, engaged them to conspire against him, and set up Lopez Aben Abo, at whose instance they seized the unfortunate Aben Humeya, and, notwithstanding he gave them the strongest assurances of his innocence, resolved to strangle him. When he found his death inevitable, he declared himself a Christian, and that he had acted out of revenge for the injuries done to his father and his family. Lopez Aben Abo assumed, with the royal dignity, the name of Muley Abdallah, took all imaginable precautions to prevent the Christians from penetrating into the mountains, laboured to procure fresh succours from Barbary, and, notwithstanding the duke of Sessa and Don Juan in person acted against him with numerous troops, and gained several advantages, he found ways and means to keep up the war to the conclusion of the year. The king Don Philip was exceedingly disturbed by this dangerous rebellion in the heart of his kingdom, and yet he was very unwilling to rely wholly upon his arms for putting an end to it, paying great regard to the suggestions of the marquis de Mondejar; that if the country of Alpujarros was totally depopled, he would only gain a parcel of black rocks and desert

a mountains, into which the Moors from Barbary might steal over at pleasure, and keep up a war without end^y. This year queen Elizabeth of England seized a great sum of money he was sending into Flanders, which induced the first open rupture between the two courts; and this year the king concluded his marriage with the archduchess Anne of Austria, his niece^z, notwithstanding he could not be ignorant how this was censured throughout Europe.

Don Juan of Austria and the duke de Sessa renewed the war against the Morescoes immediately after Christmas, and met at first with a very obstinate resistance, by which numbers of men, and some persons of distinction, amongst whom was Lewis Quixada, whom Don Juan revered and loved as a father, were lost. Some strong places were reduced, and others revolted; so that on the whole there was a great slaughter on both sides, and no great success on either. In the mean time the king, by the advice of the president Deza, caused the Morescoes to be removed out of the city and plain of Granada into the kingdom of Castile, where they had lands given them, and satisfaction for what they left behind. However, some of the noble families expostulated upon this treatment, and insisted upon the privileges they had from Don Ferdinand and the emperor Charles, upon their constant fidelity to the crown of Spain, the services they had rendered, and the impossibility of making satisfaction for their large estates; upon which the president was obliged to demand an explanation of the king's order, and whether it would admit of any exceptions. To this Don Philip answered, that the privileges of his predecessors were inviolable, that it was never his intention to invade them, and that the Morescoes, distinguished by their fidelity, should be likewise distinguished by marks of his favour. This declaration had a great effect, for some of the chiefs of the rebels immediately began to treat, and even Lopez Aben Abo insinuated, that he had been forced to do all that he had done; upon which Don Juan offered him pardon, and great possessions; but he acted perfidiously, and murdered Abaqui, a noble Moresco, who had laboured honestly to put an end to these troubles; which induced another of his countrymen to treat him in the same manner; and, upon his death, the public tranquillity was quickly restored^a. This war of the Morescoes lasted between two and three years, cost the lives of twenty thousand Castilian soldiers, about five times that number of Morescoes, and depopulated and destroyed some of the finest countries in Spain. The king, towards the close of the summer, made great preparations for the celebration of his marriage; which he might well do, since, upon his making a tour to Seville in the spring, which city he had never before honoured with his presence, they made him a present of six hundred thousand ducats^b. His intended consort, the archduchess Anne, came from Germany into the Low Countries, where the duke of Alba had prepared a fleet to transport her into Spain; and though at that time, and chiefly through his management, there was no good understanding between the two courts, yet queen Elizabeth, in point of civility, sent an English squadron to escort the archduchess, and to invite her to put into any English port, in case the season, which was far advanced, should render it expedient^c. She embarked on the 24th of September, and arrived, without any accident, at the port of St. Andero in Biscay, from whence, accompanied by her brothers the archdukes Albert and Wenceslaus, she continued her journey to Valladolid, where she was met by the archdukes Rodolph and Ernest, and from thence came to Segovia, where she was received by the princess Donna Joanna and the cardinal Zuniga Espinosa. There the marriage was celebrated about the middle of November, after which the court returned to Madrid^d. The king entered this year into what was called the Holy League against the Turks, in favour of the Venetians, and sent prince Doria with his gallies to join the fleet of the allies; which, though a great force, did little, through the disputes that arose amongst the several generals who commanded. The duke of Alba, having rendered himself universally odious in the Low Countries by his cruelties, displeased his master by his imprudence, in causing his own statue to be erected at Antwerp, with figures representing the states under his feet^e.

A GENERAL council was held at Venice, composed of the ministers of the powers embarked in the holy league, wherein it was agreed, that the fleet should consist of two hundred gallies, and the army of fifty thousand foot and four thousand horse. The pope agreed to furnish the sixth part of the expence; the smaller states of Italy the like proportion amongst them, which did not take effect; the republic of Venice a third, and his catholic majesty one half. Mark Antonio Colonna was appointed to command the pope's gallies, the Venetians named for their general Sebastian Venier, and Don Juan of Austria was declared generalissimo of the league^f. The emperor of the Ottomans, Selim, having reduced a great part of Cyprus, sent his fleet, consisting of two hundred and eighty gallies, exclusive of ships of war and galliots, commanded in chief by Hali basha, and under him by four other bashas, with orders to fight the Christians at all events, and where-ever he found them. In the mean time Don Juan of Austria, having assembled the fleet of the league, and reviewed them carefully, found the Venetian gallies feebly manned, and indifferently provided with ammunition. To remedy the first, he put on board them four thousand of his own troops, and supplied the latter from his stores. At Corfu a grand council was held, when, by the advice of prince Doria, the following orders were settled: The van, consisting of fifty-four gallies carrying green streamers, was commanded by Andrew Doria, which, in the line of battle, was to form on the right; Don Juan, with the grand commander of Castile, and the generals of the pope and the republic of Venice, followed next, with sixty-four gallies, whose streamers were blue, the standard of the league being carried by the Real; this squadron was to compose the main body in the line: then came the provveditore Barbarigo with his squadron of fifty-five gallies, and yellow streamers, which was to form the left; the rear guard, which consisted of thirty gallies with white streamers, was commanded by the marquis of Santa Cruz; and in this order, on the 7th of October, the two fleets met in the gulph of Lepanto. The Turks formed in a half-moon, into which they brought two hundred and thirty gallies and seventy galliots. The first shot was fired by Hali basha, and answered by Don Juan of Austria from the Real. The Christians made no great haste to engage, depending upon the artillery of their galleasses, which were extremely well served, and put the Turks into great confusion; at length Barbarigo, with the left wing, began the attack, and the battle became general about half an hour after twelve. Don Juan engaged the gally of Hali, and, after an obstinate resistance, carried it, the commander being killed upon the spot. Upon this, he ordered the banner of the cross to be displayed from the mainmast, and the head of Hali to be fixed upon a pike, and placed in the stern; after this, it was all carnage and confusion; and if Uluciali, who was in the left wing, had not retired in time with twenty-eight gallies, the whole Ottoman fleet had been destroyed. As it was, they lost thirty thousand men, besides ten thousand that were taken prisoners, and fifteen thousand Christian slaves released. Thirty gallies were sunk, twenty-five burnt, and one hundred and thirty taken. On the side of the Christians, the loss, in the whole, was about ten thousand men; but, which was much greater, for the want of unanimity in their generals, they lost the fruits of their victory, and, after disputing a long time about what they should do, agreed at last to do nothing. The king Don Philip celebrated this victory by a feast, which continued nine days; and appointed the anniversary to be kept for ever in the cathedral of Toledo, to which he sent the standard of the grand signor, and other trophies. The queen, on the fourth of December, was delivered of the prince Don Ferdinand; and in this year the Spaniards seized the important fortrefs of Final, to which they pretended no better title than that it might fall into worse hands.

THE next year a grand council was held at Rome, to consider of the most effectual method for continuing the war. The grand commander of Castile, who was there on the part of the crown of Spain, proposed, that the pope, the Venetians, and the lesser states of Italy, should attack Albania and the adjacent countries; that the maritime force of Spain should be employed against the Turks and Moors in Africa; while the emperor and the king of Poland made a powerful diversion on the side of Hungary. But those who could concur in nothing else, were unanimous in rejecting this; to which the sentiments of the pope did not a little contribute, who was against dividing the forces of the league. On the other hand, the emperor of the Ottomans gave the command of his fleet to Uluciali, one of the ablest officers in his service, and who with incredible diligence assembled a greater naval force than could well be imagined. He dispatched likewise an ambassador to Charles the ninth of France, to dissuade him from entering into the holy league, and this not without effect. The death of pope Pius the fifth was another unlucky incident, because the princes of his communion looked upon him as a saint. He was succeeded by cardinal Buoncompagno, who assumed the name of Gregory the thirteenth. The allies were very apprehensive, that, fresh troubles breaking out in the Low Countries, his catholic majesty would quit the league, from which he received little benefit, and to which he contributed most. The king, however, assured them he had no such intentions, and, to convince them of it, he ordered Don Juan of Austria to take the command of the confederate fleet. That prince went accordingly to Italy, where he had an interview with the princess Margaret his sister, whom he had never seen before. He then proceeded to Naples, and, as soon as the fleet of the allies assembled, he went and took the command. His active spirit led him immediately in search of the Turkish fleet: Uluciali, who was much inferior in strength, advanced to meet him, but, like a great seaman, often offered him battle, and as often avoided fighting. At length Don Juan blocked him up in the port of Modon, where he would have attacked him, but most of the other generals said it was impracticable, as his fleet was protected by a good fortrefs, and many batteries along the coast.

- a Don Juan replied, that when they were once engaged, the cannon on shore must cease firing, or do as much mischief to their friends as to their foes; but the other generals persisting in their opinion, the fleet retired, after having performed little or nothing; but Don Juan's character was as much raised by the proposition he made in this, as by the victory he gained the year before^o. This year the king lost his great favourite, and his principal minister. The first was Ruy Gomez de Silva, prince of Eboli^p, singular in this, that, during the king's whole reign, he had remained equally possessed of his good graces, and died as much regretted by the people as by his master; the other was cardinal Espinosa^q, of whom his master Philip said, long after he was dead, that he was the greatest minister Spain ever could boast; and yet Spain had produced cardinal Ximenes, who had possessed his master's confidence long after

Don Juan of Austria, in obedience to the king's orders, had employed infinite care and diligence in augmenting, repairing, and equipping, his fleet, that, in conjunction with the allies, he might put to sea in the month of April, fully determined to proceed through the Archipelago, and put an end to the naval power of the Turks for a century at least; but when he thought himself in a condition to execute this project, he received the surprising news, that the Venetians had made their peace with the Turks; upon which he caused the colours of the league to be struck, and hoisted the banner of Spain^r. The king either was not, or did not seem much displeased. He removed Juan de Soto, who was secretary to his brother, and made him intendant of the fleet, on account of his advising his master to think of doing something for himself, and of acquiring an independent sovereignty at the expence of the Infidels. Juan de Escovado succeeded him as secretary to the prince; and the king, who bestowed upon him several favours, told him plainly the reasons for which he had removed his predecessor^s. He afterwards sent orders to Don Juan to reduce Tunis, and to demolish it. The season was very late before this order could be put in execution, but it was executed by the bare appearance of the fleet, for the Turks abandoned it; the prince, contrary to Don Philip's order, fortified the town, and marked out a new citadel, capable of holding eight thousand men; and afterwards, by the advice of both his secretaries, engaged the pope to propose to his brother declaring him king of Tunis. To this Don Philip answered, that the respect as well as affection he had for his brother would not permit him to grant that request, as he knew the grand signor meditated the recovery of all the places held by the Christians in Africa; and that, in its proper season, he would explain himself to his brother's satisfaction^t. This year the royal family was increased by the birth of the Infant Don Carlos; soon after which died the Infanta Donna Joanna, the king's sister^u. This year also he removed to the escorial the bodies of his queen Donna Isabella and of the prince Don Carlos, as also those of the emperor Charles the fifth, of the empress, of Donna Leonora queen of Portugal and France, of his brothers and sisters, and of his aunt Donna Maria queen of Hungary; at the same time he caused the body of his grandmother Donna Joanna to be transferred to Granada, and interred there near the bodies of Ferdinand and Isabella^v.

- c This year opened with a scene which never would have happened if the king had not lost the cardinal his minister. The wars in which the king had been so long involved in the Low Countries, and in the defence of Italy, and the places he possessed in Africa against the Turks, had constrained him to borrow money upon his revenues, from those in other countries, as well as the bankers in his own dominions, for which they had assignments. To supply his present necessities, he had recourse to the states, and they advised him to supersede those assignments; and to deduct, after liquidating his creditors demands, what he judged reasonable in regard to usury and exchange. His own subjects thought this hard; but those who durst call things by their proper names said, that he had declared himself a bankrupt. In consideration of this worthy action, the states gave him another tenth of the Alcavala; and thus, for a small temporary advantage, he lost his credit for ever^x. The apprehensions of the Turkish fleet was the great motive to this measure, of which the king gave notice to cardinal Granvelle, viceroy of Naples; to the duke of Terra Nova, who had the government of Sicily; and to Don Juan of Austria, who was then in Italy; with express orders to provide in time for the safety of the Gouletta and of Tunis. Don Juan did all in his power; but the viceroys were so much concerned for the provinces under their government, that they did not do what they might have done in time. The consequence was, that Sinan basha, who commanded the Turkish fleet, landed forty thousand men without opposition; upon which the Christians abandoned Tunis, and retired into the new fort. Sinan basha leaving the command of the fleet to Uluciali, invested both that and the Gouletta at the same time: the former was carried by assault; and Don Pedro Portocarrero, with the small remains of his garrison, carried into slavery. The new fort had the same fate not long after; so that the Spaniards lost all they had been so long acquiring, and at least twelve thousand good troops. The king thereupon sent prince Vespasian Gonzala to examine the state of things at Oran, who, finding them in disorder, fortified Mazalquivir, and abandoned the place before-mentioned. Don Juan of Austria, who was hindered by the bad weather from going in person to the relief of the fortresses in Africa, was exceedingly chagrined at their loss; but the king bore it with great temper, and laid no blame either upon Don Juan, or the people who commanded^y. Don Juan had this year the honour of entertaining Henry the third of France at Cremona, in his return from Poland to his hereditary dominions^z.

THE death of the Turkish emperor Selimi gave some hopes that the war would not be continued with the same vivacity; but these were quickly dashed by the news that a numerous fleet^b was equipping at Constantinople. Don Juan of Austria, who was then at Genoa, pressed the king so warmly for leave to return to Spain, that he obtained it. His business was to solicit two requests; the first was, to be declared Infant of Castile; and the other to be created lieutenant-general of Italy. After mature deliberation, the king refused the first, because there was no precedent of any such thing; and declined the latter, by telling him his presence was necessary in Italy, and that he would send full powers after him^a. The Turkish fleet made an attempt upon Calabria; but were so roughly handled, that they thought proper to return to Constantinople. This year was fatal to the Infant Don Carlos; but the queen was delivered on the twelfth of July, which was three days after, of the Infant Don Diego^b.

IN the spring of the year died Don Lewis de Requifens, who had succeeded the duke of Alba in the government of the Low Countries; and the king immediately resolved to send Don Juan of Austria thither. Don Juan, who knew very well that both money and troops were wanting, sent Escovedo his secretary to court, who presented so many and so sharp memorials, that the king directed Antonio Perez, who was secretary of state, to tell him, that he would not be importuned, and that he should learn to write in a more becoming stile^c. Don Juan, perplexed with this delay, embarked at Genoa, and came to Barcelona, of which he gave the king notice, who, to avoid receiving him as an Infant of Castile, which he knew that prince expected, retired to the escurial, and sent for him thither. At his audience, he would have kissed the king's hand; but Don Philip, rising from his seat, threw his arms round his neck, and embraced him. He then kissed the queen's; and, in paying the same respect to the Infant Don Ferdinand, he rased his forehead with the pommel of his sword. The child cried out violently; upon which the king took him in his hands, and said to Don Juan, "God be praised, it is only a scratch." "So much the better," replied Don Juan; "for, if it had been ever so dangerous, here is no window out of which I could have thrown myself." "Brother," added the king coldly, "more or less dangerous would not have altered the case, for it would have been still an accident, and accidents are not in our power^d." The king held several councils, to which the duke of Alba, the marquis de los Velos, and the secretary Perez, were called; and the result was, that the king left every thing to his brother's discretion, except the point of liberty of conscience, which he absolutely refused to grant. As so much time had been lost, the king enjoined him to pass through France in disguise, which^e he did in quality of domestic to Octavio Gonzaga, and arrived safely at Luxemburgh^e. Muley Mohammed, who had been expelled the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco by his brother, solicited Don Philip to restore him by force of arms; but the king, grown weary of African expeditions, declined it. He then applied himself to his nephew Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, who sent one of his ministers to solicit the assistance of Don Philip in this enterprize, and to demand one of his daughters in marriage. The king answered, that the Infantas were too young; and that if his nephew, under the appearance of devotion, would come to our lady of Guadalupe, he would meet him there; which he did; and the duke of Alba had a share in the conference. The king and the duke both laboured to dissuade Don Sebastian from the war, by shewing him how great an army was necessary to do any thing in Africa, how impossible it was to subsist such an army, and how little he could rely upon the promises of a Moor. These remonstrances were vain; and the king was at last forced to promise his nephew, that he would furnish him with fifty galleys and five thousand men, provided the Turk had no fleet at sea^f. This year died at Rome the unfortunate doctor Carranza, archbishop of Toledo, after being obliged to abjure certain doctrines, which he affirmed in the most solemn manner when he was dying, he had never supported or believed. His persecution is said to have been owing to the envy of a great prelate, who had passionately sought what without desiring Carranza obtained. In Spain some had still their doubts about him, but at Rome he was unanimously regarded as a saint^z.

a THE king Don Philip, in order to be better informed of the state of affairs in Morocco; Don Philip makes peace with the emperor of Fez and Morocco. A. D. 1577. sent over Francisco Aldana, who had been long a prisoner in that country, and was well acquainted with Muley Moloch. He was extremely well received by that king, and, after he had remained there some time, was kindly dismissed. At his return, he assured his catholic majesty, that Muley Moloch had a great body of Turks about his person, was well provided with artillery, and could raise a numerous army without difficulty; upon which he was sent to make the like report to Don Sebastian, though it proved to no purpose. The king procured for his brother-in-law the archduke Albert a hat from Rome, and the grand cross of Malta for the archduke Wenceslaus, with one of the richest commanderies that order had in his kingdom. The news brought him by captain Aldana made him very apprehensive that b the Turks might seize the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco; and as he by no means desired such neighbours, he caused it be intimated to Muley Moloch, that he was well disposed towards him. That monarch, who needed, immediately solicited his friendship; so that an alliance was quickly concluded, and, by the interposition of the Venetians, the king made a truce with the Turks for three years. In consequence of these measures, he sent the duke of Medina Cœli, in the winter, to dissuade Don Sebastian from attempting the war in Africa, but without any effect ^a.

c IN the spring of the year the king had the news of the arrival of the archduke Matthias, Don Juan of Austria dies in the Low Countries. not without suspicion of poison. 1578. whom the confederates had invited into the Low Countries, and whom they acknowledged as their governor ¹. On the last day of March Juan de Escovedo, secretary to the prince Don Juan of Austria, was assassinated in the streets ². The general opinion was, that he was in the secret of his master's intention to espouse queen Elizabeth of England, and that this induced the king to order him to be put to death. But it is very certain that he was murdered by the express direction of the secretary Antonio Perez, who gave out to those he employed, that it was for his majesty's service; and that he procured for them, by way of reward, commands in the army in Italy: it is also certain, that Perez had twice attempted to poison him before, once at his house, to which he invited him for that purpose, and another time by procuring poison to be put into his victuals at home, which he escaped by accidentally dining abroad, and of which his wife had like to have died, and on this account a poor slave was unjustly put to death ³. This assassination made a great noise at the time, and was attended, as such d actions always are, with very fatal consequences. On the fourth of April the queen was delivered of the Infant Don Philip, who succeeded his father ⁴. This year, however, was very fatal to the royal family; for on the seventh of October died Don Juan of Austria of a malignant fever ⁵, as some say, but, as others assert, not without a great suspicion of poison. On the eighteenth of the same month died the prince Don Ferdinand, at the age of sixteen, to the inexpressible grief of his parents; and on the twenty-fourth died the archduke Wenceslaus ⁶. This year was also fatal to the unfortunate Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, who perished in his rash expedition into Africa ⁷, as we shall have occasion to shew at large in its proper place; and as soon as the news of it arrived at Madrid, the king sent orders to cover the places which the Portuguese possessed in that country.

e THE cardinal Don Henry having assumed the regal dignity in Portugal immediately after Antonio the death of Don Sebastian was known, felt very early the cares of a crown; for, on the one side, he was solicited by the people to marry, that the independency of Portugal might be preserved; and, on the other, he was pressed by the ambassadors of Don Philip to regulate Perez, secretary of state, and the prince of Eboli, disgraced and imprisoned. and declare the succession. His catholic majesty, who had not the least scruple about his own right, sent a friar to persuade the king of Portugal, that, being a priest, a bishop, and a cardinal, he could not in conscience, or with any degree of decency, marry, more especially at his time of life. He likewise applied to the pope, to prevent any dispensation from being obtained for that purpose; alleging the great scandal that would attend it, and what advantages would be taken of such a step by heretics. The king Don Henry, who, though f no great politician, was an honest, pious, and just man, was absolutely deaf to these insinuations. At Rome they opened but one ear to his catholic majesty, and at the same time extended one hand, reserving as much for the king of Portugal, that, in so important a business, something might be heard and felt on both sides ⁸. The new emperor of Morocco and Fez, perceiving how much it was his interest to be well with the king of Castile, sent over one Andrew Gasparo, a Corfican, who negotiated a peace for twenty years between the two crowns; in consideration of which, and of the assistance promised by Don Philip, in case of any foreign invasion or domestic trouble, he yielded to him the town of Larach for their mutual conveniency; and, rejecting the large offers that were made for the ransom of the duke of Barcelos, son to the duke of Braganza, and nephew to the king of Portugal, he g made a present of him to king Philip, and sent him to the house of Don Pedro de Vinegas, his embassador^r. The council of Castile advised the king to detain him as an honourable prisoner, a whom he might otherwise find the most formidable competitor to the crown of Portugal; but Don Philip, with great magnanimity and prudence, rejected their advice, and bound him in stronger chains, by ordering him to be set at liberty, and sent home with all possible marks of kindness and respect^r. The king caused the body of his brother Don Juan of Austria to be brought privately into Spain, and then to be removed publicly, and with great funeral pomp, to the escorial, and, according to the dying request of that prince, it was there interred, on the 24th of May, close by that of his father the emperor Charles the fifth^t. On the 29th of July, Antonio Perez, secretary of state, was arrested, and sent to prison, upon some discoveries that were made of the murder of Don Juan's secretary; and the princess of Eboli was at the same time confined for having too great an influence over Perez, by which she had b drawn from him some secrets of state^u. Some time after the secretary, falling sick, had leave to return to his own house, where he was visited by the king's confessor; upon which, and his not being removed from his office, the world, always busy in criticising the actions of princes, made some very strange conclusions^w.

Don Henry of Portugal, who, though not a great, was a very good prince, declared, that as to the succession, the king Don Philip, and the duke of Braganza in right of his wife, were the two competitors, and the only two whose rights would admit of a discussion; for as to Don Antonio, prior of Crato, though he had the greatest credit with the populace, yet he esteemed and adjudged him a bastard. He appointed five commissioners to hear and determine the affair of the succession, and in this disposition died, on the last of January; upon this, c the five commissioners assumed the government, with the title of regents; and tho' they did all that was possible to keep the people within bounds, yet their aversion to the Castilians was so strong, that Don Philip's ambassadors could not have been safe, if the duke of Braganza, with great generosity, had not received them into his palace^x. But the king, though he was secure of three of the regents, never intended that his title should be regulated by their judgments; but, having taken his measures from the very death of his nephew, had an army and a fleet ready to put him in possession of that kingdom. He resolved to put at the head of his forces the best officer in his dominions, which was the duke of Alba, old, in disgrace, and at that time a prisoner; the reason of which was this: His eldest son Don Garcia de Toledo had given a promise to one of the queen's ladies of honour, which he refused to make good; upon which d the king caused him to be arrested, and sent to Tordesillas. His father the duke took him from thence by force, carried him to his own castle of Alba, and there married him to his cousin Donna Maria de Toledo, daughter to the marquis of Villena. The king could not but punish this offence, though perhaps he did not highly resent it. However it was, upon the death of the king of Portugal he sent to know of the duke, if his health would permit him to command an army; who replied, that his strength and abilities, such as they were, should be always devoted to his service. The king then sent him directions to come to some place near Madrid, where he might receive his orders; and he did accordingly come to Barajas, where they were sent him, without seeing the king at all^y. As soon as the Spanish troops entered Portugal, the populace proclaimed Don Antonio king, first at Santaren, and then at Lisbon; notwithstanding which, the duke of Alba reduced the kingdom without much trouble, after defeating Don Antonio in two battles^z. The king, in the mean time, after causing the prince Don Diego to be acknowledged his successor by the nobility, advanced to Badajoz, where he fell ill towards the end of September, and was hardly out of danger before the queen, whom he had sent for thither, was seized with a violent fever, of which she died on the 26th of October, in the 31st year of her age, exceedingly regretted by the king and by his subjects^a.

Don Philip goes in person into Portugal, and is acknowledged by the states.

THE king, at the request of the duke of Alba, entered Portugal in the spring, and opened the assembly of the states at the convent of Tomar, where the nobility, clergy, and deputies from the cities, did homage and swore allegiance; the duke of Braganza and his son the duke of Barcelos being the first who took the oaths^b. The king then granted a general pardon, f excepting to Don Antonio, and fifty-two others, who were named; he bestowed likewise many favours upon the nobility, who remained notwithstanding discontented, and, if we may trust some of the Spanish historians, the revenues of Portugal would not have satisfied their expectations^c. On the 29th of June he made his public entry into Lisbon, where not long after the fleet from the Indies arrived; which gave him great satisfaction, more especially as he understood that he had been acknowledged and proclaimed there; and consequently, by the end of the year, was intirely master of the kingdom of Portugal, the islands of Azores only excepted^d. As for the unfortunate Don Antonio, he remained disguised and concealed in the

- a kingdom till towards winter, and then found a passage to England, where he was kindly received and protected by queen Elizabeth ^c.

THE king, having spent the winter at Lisbon, found himself, at the beginning of the new year, in greater perils and perplexities than ever he was in his life; persecuted with numberless demands, which it was impossible for him to grant; and which, if he denied, was likely to increase that discontent which was too great and dangerous already. He had sent for his sister the empress Donna Maria, upon the death of his queen, to take care of his children; and, not finding him at Madrid, she came to Lisbon. The king received her with all possible respect and kindness, and had some thoughts of making her regent of that kingdom; but he soon laid that aside, to prevent the disputes that must have arisen with another lady, who had appointed herself regent. This was the duchess of Braganza. The king had in general promised to comply with her demands; but when she came to make them, he did not think himself obliged to keep his word. She expected to be made regent, to have a great number of towns given her in property, and to have all her debts paid, with some other things of less consequence. In this embarrassed condition the king first sent away his sister, and then took the report of five Portuguese commissioners, whom he had appointed to consider of the duchess's demands; who said, that if his majesty gave her seven hundred and fifty thousand ducats to pay her debts, she ought to esteem it a great favour, as well as a full satisfaction ^f. Don Antonio, by the assistance of the queen mother of France, and other princes who pitied his condition, equipped a fleet of sixty sail, with a considerable body of forces on board, with which he proposed to go to the Azores. In their passage, or rather as they were on the point of entering into port, they were attacked by the marquis de Santa Cruz, with a Spanish squadron under his command, and totally defeated. In this battle three hundred persons were taken prisoners, amongst whom were thirty noblemen and fifty gentlemen. They produced French commissions, and expected to be treated as prisoners of war; but the marquis finding by papers that their chief aim was to intercept the fleet from the Indies, insisted there was no war between the crowns of France and Castile, treated them all as pirates, beheaded the gentlemen, and hanged the rest without mercy ^g. On the 21st of November died the prince Don Diego, to the great grief of the whole Spanish monarchy ^h, as well as of his father, who, though he was esteemed the greatest master of dissimulation of any prince of his time, and made his utmost efforts to appear calm and easy amongst his new subjects, found it impossible to conceal the anxiety that this and other untoward accidents gave him; more especially when he found that all his efforts to gain the affections of the Portuguese were fruitless and ineffectual. In this year pope Gregory the thirteenth made that famous alteration in the calendar which produced the distinction of old stile and new; and though it was perhaps not well understood, and withal very little pleasing to the Castilians, the king caused it to be observed and brought into use through all the countries under his dominion, as in such cases he piqued himself extremely upon shewing his respect and submission to the see of Rome ⁱ.

- It is no great wonder, if, in this situation of things, the king grew weary of his residence at Lisbon, where, when he had caused his son the Infant Don Philip to be acknowledged and sworn to as his successor, and had directed the bodies of the two last kings Sebastian and Henry, together with the remains of twenty other persons of the royal family, to be transferred to the chapel of Belem, he made preparations for his departure ^k; at which time the duke of Alba being sick, he visited him with all the kindness of a friend, and shewed great concern for his death ^l. On his leaving Portugal, he appointed the cardinal archduke Albert regent, and brought many of the Portuguese nobility with him to the escurial, where, to his great satisfaction, he found most of those things executed which he had directed, and seemed to please himself with the hopes of repose, when in truth the busiest and least agreeable part of his life was yet to come ^m. He was desirous, however, of reducing the Azores islands, and sent the marquis de Santa Cruz with a fleet for that purpose, which service he performed with great success; but it would have turned more to his reputation, if it had been attended with less bloodshed; but the adherents to Don Antonio in those islands had given great provocation; the marquis was naturally severe, and the executions that followed upon their reduction were numerous and cruel ⁿ. There happened nothing of great importance in the succeeding year, except the assembly of the states of Castile and Leon at Madrid, for acknowledging the Infant Don Philip, and the conclusion of a marriage between the duke of Savoy and the Infanta Donna Catalina; to which the king consented, upon condition that the duke came in person to espouse her ^o.

IN the beginning of the year the galleys of Spain were sent to bring that prince; and the king, with the whole court, went into Arragon, where at Saragossa the marriage was consummated in the month of February, and in June the king accompanied his son-in-law to Barcelona, where he embarked for his own dominions^p. He went afterwards to hold the states of Catalonia, Arragon, and Valentia, at Moncon, in order to have the prince acknowledged by them, where, as things went not altogether to his mind, he fell sick, and, upon his recovery, dissolved the states, though his affairs obliged him to remain at Valentia the remainder of the year, where he received the ambassadors of some princes of Japan, who afterwards went to Rome, to pay obedience in the name of their masters to the pope^q. In the succeeding year, finding himself, as his own historians say, deeply touched in his honour by the depredations committed in Europe and America by the English, he entertained a project of making queen Elizabeth feel the whole weight of his resentment. Some say he was excited to this by the prince of Parma; and that, after he had begun his preparations, he was dissuaded from pursuing them by the same prince, who, upon mature deliberation, foresaw the difficulties that would attend such an enterprize, and concluded it impracticable. It is much more probable that he was encouraged to it by the popish fugitives from England, men of a violent and implacable spirit, who, under the veil of religion, sought to vent their own passion and resentment; and that he was farther importuned to it by pope Sixtus the fifth is very certain. Besides, Sir Francis Drake had burnt several ships in the road of Cadiz, and had taken a very rich East Indiaman, named the Saint Philip, which provoked the king highly^r. The Spanish writers say, that, notwithstanding this, the prince of Parma prevailed upon him to consent to certain conferences for a peace in the Low Countries, which is out of doubt; but when they add, that the propositions of the English commissioners rendered them ineffectual, we have great reason to question their sincerity, since we know that those commissioners came into a great deal of trouble for their complaisance; and that, in the issue of this business, these pacific propositions appeared to be no more than a Spanish amusement. The truth seems to be, that the king had lost his old able ministers; and that his councils were chiefly governed by cardinal Granvelle, who did not live, however, to see the mischiefs and misfortunes they produced^s.

THE king, bent upon the execution of this expedition, issued his orders for assembling the whole maritime force of his vast dominions, and ordered all the fleet to assemble as early as it was possible at Lisbon; while the prince of Parma had instructions to provide in the Low Countries the greatest force he was able, both by sea and land, for effecting and covering a descent. The steadiness of the king, in pursuing whatever resolution he had once taken, joined to the high opinion the Spaniards had of the invincible force of their maritime power, which at that time was certainly the greatest in Europe, and the zeal, not to say fury, of the catholics, to pull down a princess whom they considered as the protectress of heretics, animated all the preparations for this extraordinary design, for the execution of which the king spared no expence; so that, as Don Bernard de Mendoza (and none knew better) told the president de Thou, it cost the king upwards of thirty-six millions of pieces of eight by that time the fleet was assembled at Lisbon. This invincible armada, as it was stiled, consisted, according to the Spanish accounts, of one hundred and thirty ships of war and galleys, having on board upwards of twenty thousand land troops, and eight thousand two hundred and fifty seamen, besides slaves at the oar. When things were almost ready, the marquis de Santa Cruz, who was to have commanded, died, and the king appointed the duke de Medina Sidonia to succeed him, who would willingly have excused himself, as being conscious of his want of skill in maritime affairs, and was afraid of the king's displeasure. He sailed from Lisbon the 27th of May; but, meeting with very bad weather, was obliged to put into the port of Corunna, where he remained some time, and came in sight of the coast of England on the last of July. They were from that time harrassed by the English fleet, composed of small and light ships, which had great advantage over them in the English chanel, and, being commanded by the ablest seamen of that age, pushed their advantage to the utmost. The weather was also favourable to them, and destructive to the Spaniards. The prince of Parma suffering much, and seeing no hopes of executing their enterprize, the duke de Medina Sidonia, and the rest of the Spanish commanders, from meditating a conquest, were brought to study how to escape; and in this they were no less unfortunate, as being in the midst of their enemies, and but very indifferently skilled in navigating those seas. They quickly found it was impossible to retire through the English chanel, and were therefore forced to sail northward, along the coast of Scotland, beaten all the way by furious tempests; and, after losing twelve large ships that ran upon the coast of England, some were also lost upon the west of Scotland,

- a some were driven to Denmark, and some to Ireland. The duke de Medina Sidonia, with the few ships that remained, at last put into St. Andero. The Spaniards compute their loss at thirty-two large ships and ten thousand men, but it was certainly much greater; Mariana says truly, that it ruined their marine, and that the best part of their old troops and most experienced seamen perished in this fatal expedition, which, as in the beginning it was intended to crush England, so in its conclusion it proved the heaviest blow that Spain had ever felt since she became a maritime power¹. Some great historians, and amongst them Mr. de Thou, say, that the king was so much chagrined, that he would not permit the duke of Medina Sidonia to come to court; but in reality the duke himself declined it, and went to his own house, full of sorrow and regret. But the king issued his orders for relieving all the poor people that returned, and wrote the duke a very kind letter, in which he thanked him for his services, expressed a great concern for the miseries he had endured, and told him, that, in things depending upon the elements, the fault was never to be imputed to men. This letter, as it deserves, is extant, and shews, that whatever passed in his mind, Philip knew how to conceal all his passions².

THE next year the king found himself in a new situation, which he little expected; for Spain and Portugal in great danger by an invasion from England. Don Antonio, who styled himself king of Portugal, having prevailed upon queen Elizabeth to assist him with a numerous fleet and a powerful army, the former commanded by Sir Francis Drake, and the latter by general Norris, arrived on the coasts of Spain in the spring, where they sacked Corunna, and did a great deal of mischief, which, how much soever it chagrined the Spaniards, in reality undid themselves³; for Don Philip immediately sent express after express to the archduke Albert, to provide for the security of Portugal; which had been out of his power, if they had sailed directly to Lisbon, where they did not arrive till the first of June. Don Antonio had promised that his countrymen would rise unanimously in his favour, in which no doubt he went too far; but the bulk of the nation were certainly so inclined, and it was owing to the precautions taken by the archduke that they became masters of the suburbs only, and not of the capital, where, however, it was as much as he could do to restrain the populace from a general insurrection; and, if there had not been a misunderstanding, or at least a want of right intelligence, between the English admiral and general, Don Antonio might have succeeded in his enterprize, or at least have given rise to a long war. But Sir Francis Drake not bringing the English fleet up the Tagus, and the cardinal archduke having burnt all the magazines of provisions without the town, general Norris was obliged to decamp on the fourth, for want of provisions. In his retreat, he took the fortress of Cascaes, which was ruined and blown up at his departure; and the English fleet made prizes of a great number of ships, after which they embarked their forces, and returned⁴. Though this was considered as a high dishonour in Spain, yet in reality the loss was very inconsiderable, in comparison of what it might have been; and it so effectually opened the king's eyes, that he studied from this time to suit his councils to his circumstances, and to consider of the properest ways and means to put his own dominions in a state of defence, against enemies whom he found to be far more formidable than he had ever imagined; and, if he had not done so, it is highly probable that his territories would have suffered more than they did, though, notwithstanding all his care, they suffered a great deal.

THE civil war in France occupied in a great measure the thoughts of Don Philip, at a time when the situation of his own affairs seemed to demand his whole attention, as the necessities of the state required the whole forces of his vast dominions in Europe and elsewhere. But it may be he had continued his intrigues with the catholic league, as it was styled, so long for his own security, that he could not easily withdraw his protection. Perhaps he looked on the troubles of France as very favourable to his own safety and power; but it is most probable that he had still greater things in view; and that, having procured for himself the administration of that kingdom, under the title of protector of France, he thought it not impracticable to obtain the possession of it for his favourite daughter the Infanta Donna Isabella Clara Eugenia, who it was once proposed should espouse the young duke of Guise; but, whatever his motives were, his conduct plainly shewed, that he meant to frustrate the pretensions of Henry the fourth, styled in Spain the prince of Bearn, to the crown of France; and to the desire of doing this, he sacrificed interests that much more nearly concerned him: for, not content with sending a great corps of Spanish troops to the duke of Mayenne, which weakened his own army in the Low Countries, he sent express orders to the prince of Parma to relieve Paris; which he performed with great reputation to himself, but with irreparable loss to the concerns of Spain in the Netherlands. His expence in support of the French rebels in their own country and at Rome was immense, at the same time that his own affairs every-where suffered for want of money; and, while he meditated the destruction of other powers, the very means a he employed for that purpose exhausted his own^r.

Antonio Perez tortured on account of the business of Escovedo's murder, and his escape.

WE have before mentioned the disgrace and imprisonment of Antonio Perez, the king's secretary of state, who, in consequence of his being charged with various crimes, had been sentenced to a fine and imprisonment; and afterwards the old prosecution, for being concerned in the murder of Escovedo, being revived, though he had compounded it with the son of the deceased, by giving him a large sum of money, he was tortured to make a confession, and prosecuted afresh upon that confession. This, though he was a man of very quick parts, drove him to the very extent of them; so that, being a native of the kingdom of Arragon, he contrived to make his escape thither, in order to shelter himself under the privileges of that kingdom, which not without great difficulty he effected. Being again apprehended by the king's b orders, upon his appeal to the chief justice, he was carried to Saragossa, and thrown into the prison belonging to that tribunal, of which the justice of Arragon was the chief. But as all proceedings before them were in public, and in a clear and open manner, that by no means answered the intention of his enemies, who made use of the royal authority, as if the king was of that number; they therefore caused it to be suggested to the inquisition, that Perez intended, as soon as he should be acquitted by the tribunal of the chief justice, to retire into Bearn, and put himself under the protection of queen Catherine of Navarre, mother of Henry IV. of France, and, if he did not like that country, to withdraw into Holland or England. It was clearly computed from hence, that a man who placed his hopes in heretics (though he could hope protection from none else) could never be in his heart a good catholic. To fish c out, therefore, this latent heresy, the inquisitors thought fit to transfer him to their prison without the city of Saragossa. This produced a revolt, which the bishop of Tervel, who was then viceroy, quieted, by taking Perez out of the prisons of the inquisition, and sending him back to the prisons of the chief justice; but the marquis of Almenara, the king's minister, was so rudely handled by the populace, that he died.

Delivered by the people of Arragon, which draws on them the king's indignation.

THE inquisitors, having engaged all their friends to support them, constrained the viceroy to deliver up the prisoner to them again; and, having assembled about two thousand foot, to cover this great enterprize, they attempted to carry it into execution, which excited a fresh insurrection, and in this there perished about one hundred persons, some of them gentlemen. However, as the soldiers could not be brought to act against their countrymen, or rather d against their country, the people prevailed, and set Antonio Perez at liberty, who very prudently withdrew into Bearn^z. In the midst of these disputes, the chief justice of Arragon, Don Juan de Lanuza, died, and was succeeded in that high office by his son. The people, upon certain intelligence that Don Alonso Vargas, with a body of six thousand men, was advancing, by the king's command, in order to punish this opposition to his will, insisted upon the assembling an army for protecting the liberties of Arragon, and obliged the young chief justice to issue commissions for that purpose; but most of the nobility, being become dependent upon the court, or willing to obtain favours by sacrificing that constitution which had made them great, either acted against the commons, or affected to appear neuters. The chief justice himself would have retired, if the people, who suspected it, had not restrained e him. Don Alonso Vargas, who was himself an Arragoneze, no sooner appeared with his troops before Saragossa, than the magistrates went out to meet him, and, when he had taken possession of the city, the chief justice, Don Juan de Lanuza, returned with the duke of Villa Hermosa and the count de Aranda. Don Alonso caused them all three to be arrested, and, by the king's express order under his hand, directed Don Juan's head to be cut off upon a scaffold the same day^z. In the opinion of all sensible people, the blow that deprived him of life, 591. extinguished the liberties of Arragon. As to the other two noblemen, they died in separate prisons, under prosecutions for high treason; but their heirs making it fully appear, that they only made use of that popularity which their great probity and unblemished characters had given them to quiet the first commotions, and had no share at all in the last, they were, by a f solemn sentence, declared loyal and faithful subjects^b. This end had the troubles of Antonio Perez, who in a tedious exile, in which he was driven to great necessities, survived his mother and most of his enemies (B).

(B) We have said so much in the text of Antonio Perez, and the fortunes and misfortunes of that great minister are in general so well known, that we shall insist here only on a few particular points that have hitherto in some measure escaped the public notice, and which, in conjunction with his own writings and the common histories,

- a THE king Don Philip was still very intent upon his projects in France; but finding it very difficult to supply the leaguers with money, in proportion either to their demands or to their wants, he formed a project, which shews his abilities as a politician. Pope Sixtus V. had amassed prodigious sums of money, which he laid up in the castle of St. Angelo, under pretence of employing them, if it should be necessary, against the infidels; but Don Philip suspected rather it was intended for the conquest of Naples. His immediate successor Urban VII. died so soon, that the king had it not in his power to practise upon him; but Gregory XIV. being raised to the pontifical throne, he ordered his ambassador to acquaint him, how much it was in his will, and how little it was in his power, to support the holy league in France; and, as a proof of his sincerity, desired leave to sell some of the church-lands in Spain for so good a purpose. This, he knew, the Spanish cardinals would labour to prevent; but, that they might not seem to have less zeal for the church than their master, they suggested that the treasures laid up by pope Sixtus might as well be employed against heretics as against infidels; in which they prevailed, and no less than three millions were this year issued for the service of the league^c, which the Spanish faction in France placed to the account of king Philip, though not a penny of it came out of his pocket. But the duke of Mayenne, desirous of knowing what his catholic majesty's sentiments really were, sent the president Jeanin to Madrid, to discover them, where he found the king so fully persuaded of his title to France, that, in his discourse, he frequently made use of these terms, My city of Paris, my town of Orleans, my port of Rouen, which by no means pleased that minister, though he dissembled it. At length he was plainly told, that the king looked upon the infanta Isabella as the heiress of France; that he was inclined to marry her to the archduke Ernest, and, in consideration of the zeal and fidelity of the catholic league, in raising them to the throne, he was content to give them the Low Countries^d. At this very juncture, the council of sixteen took upon them to offer the crown of France to the infanta, provided she espoused the young duke of Guise, who was just escaped out of prison. It was from these propositions, and the slender supply of ten thousand crowns a month, which the king promised the duke of Mayenne, that the president took occasion to make the best terms he could with Henry the fourth^e. The English had this year a fleet upon the coast of Spain, under the command of the earl of Cumberland, and another squadron under lord Thomas Howard at the Azores, which, but for the intelligence they received from the former, had been surprised by Don Alonzo Bazan; who had the honour, however, of taking the Revenge, commanded by Sir Richard Greenfield, whose name Ferreras has hispaniolized into Campo Verida; the only ship of war the Spaniards took from queen Elizabeth. But this saved the plate fleet; the best part of which, however, together with the prize, perished by a storm in their return to Spain, where, notwithstanding, Don Alonso was received in triumph^f.

tories; will give the reader a true idea of the most singular character perhaps that the world ever saw. It is certain, that his intimacy with Donna Anna de Mendoca y la Cerda plunged them both into misfortunes. This lady was princess of Étoli, equally remarkable for her accomplishments and her passions. She had a high genius, lively wit, and exquisite beauty; she was at the same time very ambitious and very gallant. The mistress, as the world said of Philip II. and the mistress too, if the same authority may gain credit, of Antonio Perez. She is said to have been in love with the power of the king, and the person of the secretary (1). The king's jealousy had no share in their disgrace; the princess always retained a great power over that monarch, notwithstanding she always corresponded with, and affected great attachment to Perez, who, through his long exile, still held a place in his master's esteem. This appears in part from the king's will, but more clearly and with better evidence in the memorial which Don Baltazar Zuniga drew up for the information of his nephew the Conde de Olivarez, in which he expressly affirms, that Perez was the faithful servant of the king, though disgraced, tortured, and banished, and kept his secret among his enemies, in spite of the threats, the arts, and the gifts, employed to exact it from him (2). He had a great affection for his wife, as appears from the elegant Latin epitaph he wrote for her; but he had his gallantries notwithstanding; and we are told, that Henry IV. of France hinted to him one day his surprise, that he should be so much the slave of a woman that had but one eye. Perez answered with emotion, she set the world on fire with that; if she had preserved both, she would have consumed it. We are not at the bottom of this history, which had a large share in his misfortune; he kept up his Spanish haughtiness in the midst of his wants, and would give the title of excellency only, not highness, to the count of Soissons, the duke of Guise, and other princes. Though he was a beggar, he was very intimate with queen Elizabeth's favourite the earl of Effex, and no less with M. de Villeroi, the French secretary of state, to whom those letters were addressed, which are intitled, To a friend; but he quickly lost his credit with queen Elizabeth and Henry IV.; and perhaps it would have been as well if he had not preserved it with their ministers. He died at Paris in 1611, in mean circumstances; for though he had many great qualities, he wanted oeconomy (3).

THE next year the unfortunate Aragonese, who had been obliged to take shelter in the principality of Bearn, believing that the severities which had been exercised at Saragossa must have spread universal discontent through the kingdom of Aragon, they, with such succours as could be procured from the queen of Navarre, resolved to make an irruption into that kingdom; in which possibly they might have met with some success, if one of the queen's ladies of honour had not betrayed them to the viceroy Don Alonso Vargas, who posted troops there with such propriety, that Don Martin de Lanuza, who commanded the refugees, was surprised and beat, almost as soon as he entered the kingdom. He had, however, the good fortune to escape himself; but Don Diego de Heredia, Don Francisco Ayerbe, Don Juan de Luna, and Don Diego Perez, were taken, and executed, together with numbers of an inferior rank; and an expedition that was made in Catalonia by the Bearnois was not more successful^a. Don Philip, upon this, published an amnesty, in which however were excepted Antonio Perez, and twenty others by name, all who were in prison, or under prosecution, and such as might be objected to by the inquisition. Upon which the Aragonese said truly, that the king had sent them a very handsome suit of cloaths, but that it would fit nobody. Soon after, he convoked an assembly of the states at Tarragona, which was held in his name by the archbishop of Saragossa, and which, when they had curtailed some of the privileges of the kingdom, and done other disagreeable acts, the king meant to honour with his presence. The household of prince Philip being settled, the king, though somewhat indisposed, set out for Navarre; but, in his route, was taken so ill at Ejtrella, that it was believed his life was in danger. He recovered notwithstanding, through the strength of his constitution, and, as soon as he was able to bear the fatigue of travelling, proceeded with the prince to Pampluna, where he was received with all apparent marks of joy, held an assembly of the states, in which the prince Don Philip was acknowledged his heir apparent. Having left an able architect to finish the castle, he returned through Aragon, and was present at closing the assembly of the states at Tarragona, where, upon his giving orders to Don Alonso de Vargas to leave the kingdom with his troops, excepting only a detachment that was to guard the inquisition, he obtained a free gift of seven hundred thousand livres, of that country money^b.

His projects with regard to France were now at a crisis. He had a strong body of forces in Bretagne, and had directed the duke of Parma, who had gained so much reputation the year before by raising the siege of Rouen, to enter France a third time, to countenance the general assembly that was to be held at Paris for the choice of a king. That nothing might be wanting to facilitate his design, he caused ingots of gold to be carried by land to Namur, to be coined there into a million and half of ducats, the best part of which were to be distributed amongst the deputies to the assembly, where the duke of Feria was to assist in his name, and to demand the duchy of Bretagne for the infanta Isabella, to which he asserted her right was indisputable, since that duchy came to the crown of France by an heir female, whose immediate direct heiress was his deceased queen, and consequently his daughter by her. The duke was also to support the interests of the duke of Guise, who, in case he was elected king, was to marry the new duchess of Bretagne; but, previous to this, he was to use his utmost endeavours to procure the election of the infanta, and to consent to the other measure only in case of necessity. These fine-spun schemes were broken by a variety of accidents. The duke of Parma died at Arras, where he was assembling his forces; upon which the troops mutinied, and a great part of them disbanded. The duke of Feria quarrelled with the duke of Mayenne; and the Spanish ministers were so scrupulous in parting with their money, that they were not able to carry any considerable point in the assembly; so that if the king persuaded himself, as some think he did, that his daughter would have been this year declared queen of France, he must have been much disappointed^c. The Spanish historians tell us^d, that Don Alonso Bazan, with the gallies under his command, took several English ships that had made themselves masters of two of the plate fleet at the islands of the Azores; but an author of our own^e, who was at that time in Spain, affirms, that Don Alonso might have done it, if he had followed the king's orders; but that, by pursuing his own notions, he failed, was disgraced for it, and never recovered the king's favour any more.

THE king Don Philip employed a great part of the spring in taking the best measures possible for quieting the minds of the people of Aragon, and at the same time provided for the security of that kingdom, by disposing his troops in such a manner on the frontiers, as to put a speedy end to any commotion that might be excited, in hopes of abolishing the concessions made in the last assembly of the states, in prejudice to their old constitution. He sent likewise a squadron of ships from Biscay, to support the leaguers in Bretagne; in the a prosecution of which enterprize they engaged some English ships, by which both sides were losers; but the Spaniards carried their main point of preserving what they had acquired in that country, which gave great uneasiness to queen Elizabeth^m, on account of its situation. The king held a chapter of the order of the golden fleece, for the installation of his son the prince Don Philip, in which the collar was given to the duke of Infantado, the marquis de Villena, and Don Pedro de Medicis, a young Moorish prince, whose name was Muley, son to Muley Mohammed, the dethroned king of Fez and Morocco, who came privately to the king's court, and declared that he did it with a desire of becoming a Christian. After due precautions taken to be secure of his sincerity, he was baptized, and the king not only gave him appointments suitable to his birth, but also made him a knight of St. Jago, and grandee of *Spain*ⁿ.

HENRY IV. of France, having declared himself a catholic, broke all the measures of the league, and brought over at once all who had any sincere inclinations to restore the peace, and revive the honour, of their country^o. The catholic king, in a manner little suitable to his great prudence, as even the Spanish historians confess, persisted in the pursuit of those projects that were now become impracticable, and had so much influence at Rome as to engage pope Clement the eighth to delay the absolution which he had demanded by the duke de Nevers, and perhaps might have done more, if a French priest had not honestly and boldly said to that pontif, Holy father, your predecessor Clement VII. lost England by gratifying the emperor Charles V. have a care therefore that you do not lose France by pushing too far your complaisance for Philip II. This, and other remonstrances, wrought upon the pope; but as for the king, though he might at that time have made very good terms with Henry, he continued obstinate in his own measures, and in lavishing vast sums to no purpose, while his affairs suffered at home and abroad through the debts and difficulties that were by this means brought upon his administration^p. In the Low Countries, the principal nobility refused to acknowledge the count de Fuentes, whom he had appointed their governor; so that the management of public affairs was left to count Peter Ernest de Mansfield, who had been appointed his deputy by the duke of Parma; and this visible declension of his grandeur on all sides, though it had no effect upon his behaviour, is thought to have affected the king's mind, and to have increased his infirmities^q.

d THE friends of the Spaniards in France had prevailed upon the duke of Mayenne to remove the count de Belin from the post of governor at Paris, and to bestow it on the count de Brisac, whom they looked upon as an irreconcilable enemy to the king; and so perhaps he might have been, if they had not procured him this post, which enabled him to make his peace with his master, by putting the capital of his dominions into his possession. He managed this affair with such secrecy, that, while the army of France entered on one side of the city, the duke of Feria, with about four thousand Spanish troops, marched out of the other. There is no doubt that Henry might have attacked, and probably cut them to pieces; which, however, he was so far from attempting, that he sent them a safe-conduct, and offered them an escorte^r. The king Don Philip, having sent his nephew the archduke Ernest, with the title of governor, into the Low Countries, the French king made him some propositions of peace; and, upon his declining them for want of proper powers, he sent an agent to Madrid with as little effect. Hostilities were still continued by the English at sea, and, by their assistance, the French were enabled to recover several places in Bretagne. 1594.

To heighten the perplexities of Don Philip, a Turkish fleet, under the command of the A Turkish basha Zigala, appeared very unexpectedly on the coast of Calabria, where they committed most horrid outrages; and having acquired a vast booty, and a multitude of slaves, returned in triumph to Constantinople^s. This year died Don Gaspar de Quiroga archbishop of Toledo, a person equally beloved and revered, and who had opposed, as far as he was able, most of the measures that had brought the king into distress. He was a great oeconomist, and died immensely rich, but without making any disposition of his effects, which were therefore claimed by the pope. It is probable this might have met with some opposition, if, at the same time the claim was made, the pontif had not declared his intention that one third should be employed in works of piety, that another should be paid into the royal treasury, and the remainder belong to the apostolic chamber, which was executed without any dispute^t. The king, upon the demise of this prelate, recalled the archduke Albert from the government of Portugal, where the administration was committed to five regents; and, upon the archduke's arrival in Spain, the king gave him the rich see of Toledo, to the great joy of his mother, though she had no interest in his promotion; for though he treated her with great civility and respect, yet it was believed he never forgave her the defeating his father's scheme of causing him to be elected king of the Romans.

An attempt made to set up an impostor for Don Sebastian detected and punished.

THE king, having received the news of the death of the archduke Ernest, governor of the Low Countries, appointed Don Pedro Henriquez de Toledo de Fuentes to succeed him for the present, intending that government for the cardinal archduke Albert, who, for that reason, was not consecrated to his see, though he took possession of it by proxy, and appointed Garcia Loyasa his administrator, who, upon his resignation, became his successor^a. Henry IV. of France, believing that he could receive no greater injuries than he had done from Philip, declared war against Spain, and took proper measures, with the assistance of the queen of England, to make his power felt, where his friendship had been despised^w. There happened this year, or rather there was finished this year, a very singular and almost incredible transaction in Spain. At the time king Philip made himself master of Portugal, amongst other ecclesiastics, who were in the opposite interest, there was one father Michael de los Santos, an Augustine frier, who had been vicar general of his order, chaplain to Don Sebastian, and confessor to Don Antonio. He was a man of learning and sense, and yet took such liberties in his discourse, that the king found it absolutely necessary to remove him out of Portugal; upon which he caused him to be seized, and sent him to Madrigal, where he made him confessor to a monastery of nuns of his own order, amongst whom was Donna Anna of Austria, his niece. Father Michael took notice there of one Gabriel de Spinosa, at that time a pastry-cook, a native of Toledo, but a foundling, who had been bred a velvet-weaver, who went as a soldier when the king sent the duke of Alba into Portugal, and, having carried away a young woman from that country, took up the trade he then followed for a subsistence. This man father Michael engaged to assume the name of Don Sebastian; and as he could not have a more able master, and as a great deal of time and pains were spent in giving him instructions, there was scarce ever an impostor who acted his part with greater dexterity. The next thing father Michael did was to introduce him to Donna Anna, who, through reverence of her spiritual guide, prejudice in favour of a man who did all he could to render himself agreeable to her, and through want of experience, was easily brought to believe that he was really the person he represented. Being flattered that a dispensation from the pope might enable her to share his throne and his bed, she gave him some jewels of great value to furnish him with money; and, in disposing of these privately at Madrid, he was apprehended for a thief, and, at the time he was seized, declared the truth, that he was a pastry-cook in Madrigal, and that the jewels belonged to the princess Anne of Austria. But, soon after he was confined, a packet was intercepted, directed to him from Madrigal, in which the title of majesty being given him, it was immediately carried to the king, and orders thereupon sent to confine Donna Anna to her cell. The share father Michael had in this business came soon after to be understood; upon which he was made prisoner, and the decision, with respect to him, left to the pope's legate. Gabriel Spinosa at first confessed freely, but afterwards retracted; however, being carried to Madrigal, and confronted both with the princess and the frier, the two men being put to the question, acknowledged all. The issue of this matter was, that Gabriel de Spinosa was condemned to suffer death; to which he submitted with great reluctancy. Father Michael, after being degraded by order of the nuncio, was delivered over to the secular arm, and hanged. He is said to have died very penitent, and to have confessed that he intended to make use of the pretended Sebastian to excite a rebellion, and, if possible, to bring about a revolution in Portugal; after which he was to be removed, to make way for Don Antonio. As for the unfortunate princess, she was removed to another convent of the same order, and very closely confined during the remainder of her life^x.

Turks for pillaging Calabria.

TOWARDS the end of the month of August, the cardinal archduke and archbishop Albert set out for the Low Countries, vested with full powers to treat and conclude a peace with the French monarch; for as Don Philip could not prevent his being absolved by the pope, he at length abandoned the design of making the infant a queen, and contented himself with what was in his power, resigning to her the Low Countries; a resolution which, if it had been earlier taken, might have produced those effects that were now expected from it in vain^y. Don Pedro de Toledo, captain-general of the galleys of Naples, in conjunction with Don Pedro de Livo, general of the galleys of Sicily, made a descent at Patras in the Morea, at the time of the fair, where they took from the Turks a booty to the value of 400,000 ducats, and brought away many rich merchants, whom they ransomed at a very high price. This year the English had a strong squadron in America, under the command of Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake, who both died there, after doing much mischief to the Spaniards, but with little advantage to themselves^z.

^a AGE and infirmities had by degrees broke the spirit of king Philip; so that, notwithstanding the natural loftiness of his temper, his confidence in his own strength, and conceit of his superior policy, he had a strong inclination to peace, and was even disposed to make some sacrifices for obtaining it; yet partly from the slowness of the Spanish councils, and partly from that inactivity into which he was now fallen, he did not pursue his new measures with that vigour which was necessary to have procured them success. He had intelligence of an English fleet and army preparing to invade his dominions, and he would persuade himself that the place aimed at was Lisbon; upon which he ordered all his strength thither. But this fleet, commanded by the lord admiral Howard and the earl of Essex, had, in reality, no other view than the attacking Cadiz, and destroying there the fleet outward-bound to the Indies. They were very fortunate in all respects; for they brought the first news of their own arrival, and found the Spaniards miserably unprepared. Don Juan Portocarrero, who commanded the galleys in the bay, provided in the best manner he was able for the defence of the forts and the security of the merchantmen; which, however, proved to very little purpose. The English attacked them with their small ships, as the depth of water did not permit them to use their large ones, and shewed more concern to outstrip each other in getting in than about the resistance with which they might meet. The passage being forced, the frigates, instead of taking shelter under the castle of St. Philip, run ashore on the other side, by which the men escaped. The galleons were either taken or burnt; the galleys had the good luck to get out, by the breaking down of a bridge, which the English somewhat imprudently had quitted. This, however, put it out of the power of the duke of Medina Sidonia either to relieve the place or favour the retreat of those who were in it; so that the earl of Essex stormed and took it; but the admiral landing to second him in that design, the fleet of merchantmen got up the bay, which otherwise might have been all taken; to prevent which the duke ordered them to be set on fire. The English remained in possession fourteen days, and though they ransomed the place for one hundred and twenty thousand ducats, the adjacent country could not raise the money; so that they carried with them their hostages. The Spanish authors are divided as to the value of the plunder; some say it amounted to four, and others say to eight millions, and six millions more perished at least on board the fleet^a. This struck such a terror along the coast, ^d that the inhabitants every-where abandoned it; so that the English landed at Faro in Algarve, burnt and plundered it, carrying from thence the library of the famous Jerome Osorio, and afterwards searched the harbours of Corunna and Ferrol, where they would have burnt the king's ships, if they had found them. The loss they sustained was great, the dishonour greater; the king felt both, and, with much difficulty, assembled a fleet and army to revenge it, by invading England. The high steward of Castile, Don Martin de Padilla, ^e commanded both; but it was so late in the season before they sailed, that they met with a violent tempest at sea on the 27th of October, by which forty sail of ships were destroyed, and the shattered remains of the fleet forced into Ferrol^b. In the summer, pope Clement VIII. sent his legates, cardinal Medicis to Henry IV. and father Bonaventure, general of the Observantines, to king Philip, to mediate a peace; and this was the step for which the king had waited, that the negotiation might be opened with greater honour; whereas it might have been ended with much more advantage two years before. In the mean time the archduke Albert sustained the reputation which the count de Fuentes had acquired in the Low Countries, by taking Calais and Ardres from the French, and the island of Hulst from the Dutch, which afforded some, though but a small, consolation for what had happened in Spain^c.

THE peace with France would have been sooner concluded by a year, if it had not been for an unexpected piece of good fortune, or at least so it was esteemed, which happened to the Spaniards. This was the surprisal of the city of Amiens in Picardy by Hernando Tello Portocarrero, an officer of a small stature, but of a most enterprising genius, accompanied ^f with great firmness of mind, and a perfect knowlege of the military art, as it then stood. The archduke Albert put him upon, and supported him in, this expedition; the success of which threw the city of Paris into a general consternation, and embarrassed Henry IV. extremely, who had still the duke of Merceur and other chiefs of the league to contend with, and was but upon indifferent terms with the protestants. The king saw that peace was not to be made upon reasonable terms till that place was retaken, which he caused to be blockaded immediately, besieged it afterwards in form, and commanded there in person. The archduke Albert marched with an army of 25,000 men to its relief, and approached it so unexpectedly, that the advanced guards of the French army had probably been beat, or at least forced to raise the siege. But taking time to form his own troops, he afforded that leisure to Henry which was necessary to remedy this disorder; and then it was thought unadvisable to risk a battle; so that, in September, the place was surrendered upon honourable terms; and the negotiations of the peace were in earnest resumed^d. About the same time his catholic majesty made known to the archduke Albert his resolution with respect to his marriage of the infanta, and the cession of the Low Countries, and sent him full powers to demand in marriage for the prince Don Philip the daughter of the archduke Charles of Austria^e.

tended upon England.

THE war with England continued as warm as ever. Intelligence had been received there of the invasion that was intended the year before, and that this was still the aim of his catholic majesty. To prevent this, Elizabeth equipped a very strong fleet, with a numerous body of troops on board, to block up or burn the Spanish armada in their own ports. A terrible tempest having dissipated this fleet almost as soon as it put to sea, the original scheme was laid aside, and the earl of Essex, with the best part of the fleet, and as many of the troops as were judged necessary, sent to reduce the Azores; in consequence of which it was thought impossible that they should miss the plate fleet. But this fleet was in the first place to visit the coast of Spain, which they did in a hasty manner, and then continued their route to the islands: thus Don Martin de Padilla had an opportunity to come out of Corunna with his ships and forces, which gave the Spaniards great hopes, and indeed great probability, of success; but when they were within thirty leagues of the English coast, they were so roughly handled by a storm, that the fleet was intirely dispersed; and every ship being obliged to shift for itself, they put back in a most shattered and distressed condition into different ports of Biscay; so that, as the Spaniards themselves confess, through the immediate and apparent interposition of Providence, all their attempts to the prejudice of England were frustrated, and turned to their own loss^f; but if the Spaniards were unlucky in their intended invasion, they were very fortunate in repelling the intended invasion of the islands. Don Gonzalez Vaez Continbo, who was governor of the island of St. Michael, drew the whole force of that island to Punta Delgada, where he threw up such strong retrenchments, that the English were obliged to leave him, and go to Villa Franca, from whence the earl of Essex supposed he could have marched by land to Punta Delgada, which upon trial he found impracticable. But what was still worse than miscarrying in their conquest, they, through some misunderstanding amongst their officers, suffered the plate fleet to escape almost unhurt, though it fell in with them, by which the Spaniards received a supply of ten millions of dollars, which had otherwise gone into their enemies pockets, and would, in all probability, have been employed in military operations against them: these observations are the more certain, since in these the best English and Spanish writers agree^g.

A. D. 1597.

Peace concluded with the crown of France at Vervins.

THE conferences at Vervins for a peace between the crowns of France and Spain began on the seventh of February, under the mediation of the pope's legate, cardinal Medicis; but the plenipotentiaries of Spain were named by the cardinal archduke, in virtue of the full powers that had been granted him by the king. They demanded that the duke of Savoy should be included in that treaty, and, with some difficulty, carried that point; but when they made the like demand in favour of the duke de Morœur, it was absolutely refused, which occasioned some delay; but the duke having made a separate peace with the king, that difficulty was removed. Many others were started, but by the firmness and address of the cardinal legate, who knew very well that, notwithstanding the high and harsh language that was sometimes held on both sides, the French monarch and the cardinal archduke were equally desirous of peace, it was at length concluded and signed on the second of May, to the satisfaction of both monarchs. This famous treaty consisted of 34 articles, which in the main were very near those of the treaty of Chateau Cambresis, two only excepted; for, by the first, all places taken were to be restored, which was intirely in favour of France; and, by the 23d, Henry reserved all his rights to be discussed in an amicable way, or in the course of justice, by which was understood his title to the kingdom of Navarre. On the other side, Philip preserved his rights, and those of his daughter the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, to be discussed in like manner; and these were supposed to respect the duchies of Burgundy and Bretagne^h. It is very remarkable, that as all the restitutions were on the side of the Spaniards, who were possessed of Blavet in Bretagne, and of Calais, Ardres, Montulin, and several other places in Picardy, the archduke sent the duke of Arscott, the admiral of Arragon, count Aremberg, and Don Lewis de Velasco, to be hostages for the evacuation of these places, as well as to be witnesses to the king's swearing to the peace, which he did in the presence of the cardinal legate on the 21st of June, and the archduke did the like at Brussels, in the presence of marshal Biron, on the 27th of the same monthⁱ.

a THE archduke having received his uncle's orders to go into Germany, in order to conduct the archduchess Margaret through Italy into Spain, he in the first place resigned his hat by a letter directed to the pope, which was delivered by the archbishop of Besançon. He also resigned the archbishoprick of Toledo, which was bestowed on Don Garcia de Loyasa, who was preceptor to prince Philip; and then, in virtue of the renunciation made by the king, on the sixth of May, at Madrid, and of full powers granted him by the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, he received the oaths of the states, and those of the duchy of Brabant, who were the first, upon the 10th of August. All this was done with a view to conclude his marriage, while the king was yet alive, from an apprehension that some doubts or difficulties might arise on the part of his successor^k. All this diligence, however, was ineffectual in this respect; for the king declining daily, thro' a complication of distempers, caused himself to be removed from Madrid to the Escorial, not without great difficulty, and against the advice of his physicians, to whose representations the king answered with great firmness, that they would have the trouble of carrying him thither when he was dead, and they might as well do it while he was alive. He was much better after his arrival there for some days; but then he relapsed. Upon his death-bed he gave a paper of instructions to the prince his son, to whom he recommended the infanta, calling her the joy of his heart, and the delight of his eyes. He ordered some state-prisoners to be set at liberty, and, amongst the rest, the wife of Antonio Perez, upon condition that she retired to a monastery. At length, with great marks of piety, as the Spaniards say, and, in the midst of the most excruciating torments, he breathed his last, on Sunday the 13th of September, about five in the afternoon, in the seventy-first year of his age, and in the forty-second of his reign^l.

THERE is scarce any character in history that has been more frequently examined, or more severely censured, than that of this prince, who, though magnified by some historians as another Solomon, under whose form he is represented in a statue at the entrance of the Escorial, where Charles the fifth is adorned by the sculptor with the robes and the crown of David; yet others have more fitly compared him to Tiberius; and, while his panegyrists held him forth as a model for princes, those who criticised his character described him as the mirror of tyrants. Without partiality or prejudice, we will offer the reader a few observations drawn from facts. He was stiled Philip the Prudent, and with justice; for he was in all things a politician. Those who magnify his piety, by which they mean his zeal for the church of Rome, seem thereby to offer an exception; but they only seem to offer it; for Philip was only a political bigot. When Philip began his reign, he was only upon bad terms with the court of Rome; he was therefore no persecutor in England, but shewed rather a compassion for those that suffered here for their sincerity in the faith. He introduced and subjected the Spanish church to the decrees of the council of Trent, but it was in his own way, and by his own authority; and though, through his whole reign, he was pressed to banish the Morescopes for the security of religion, his constant answer was, You must find some other way; for this is impracticable. The truth of the matter is, the church was the great instrument in his government, and he made great use of churchmen in his administration; and thus his zeal is accounted for on political principles. In point of system, if ever a modern prince aimed at universal monarchy it was Philip II. He was disappointed in his schemes; but those schemes were equally bold and well contrived. He was near being king of the Romans; he bid fair for making his daughter queen of France; and his projects for the conquest of England were defeated by Providence, but by competent judges were never derided. As his plans were very extensive, so he had great fertility of invention, and was never at a loss for expedients to piece them together again when broken, till his treasure and his power were equally exhausted, and then as he began, so he ended, his reign, with endeavouring to establish peace. In his domestic administration, he has been justly commended for encouraging and promoting men of abilities; but he depressed the nobility too much, and therefore he advised his son to a contrary course, that of caressing the grandees, and curtailing the revenue and power of the clergy, and this he did from his observation, that new men were turbulent, and, being raised from nothing, nothing could content them. It is very certain that he had not much affection, and less of pity, in his composition; but it is as certain, that he has been represented as more cruel than he really was; for however severe he might be when his scheme of policy required it, he was never wantonly so, and could not therefore be said to delight in blood.

In private life he was vicious, and therefore his pretences to religion were certainly political; for true piety appears in the conduct of a man's life, and is not to be taken from exterior actions, which may have another motive, and must have it, when, with high pretensions to piety, a person is corrupt in his morals. He had a great haughtiness in his nature; ^{His conduct in domestic affairs, and personal character.}

and it was said, that though in his person and his complexion he resembled the Flemings, his temper and behaviour were intirely of the growth of Spain. Those who had audience of him, spoke upon their knees, which he excused from the lowness of his stature, pretending he did it to avoid being overshadowed by those who addressed him. He not only held the nobility in subjection, but at a distance; and, to qualify these apparent signs of pride, he was very easy of access to persons of meaner rank, but without departing from his dignity, unless he might be said so to do in conversing familiarly with peasants. He used the like condescension to churchmen, to his ministers, and to the ladies. He acquired by habit such an equality of temper, that success, or the want of it, made no alteration in his behaviour. He was never reputed brave, but he had a great firmness of mind; and though less active than his father in his person, who executed all his great designs himself, yet he was at least equal to him in abilities; for he gave his enemies more disturbance by the factions and insurrections he excited by his intrigues, than the emperor had ever done by his arms. Upon the whole, his ambition and his policy made him great and terrible during the major part of a long reign; but at the same time it made him odious, and exhausted his power. He saw this when it was too late, subscribed to the advice given by his father, and penned a censure of his own conduct for the use of his son. It is now time to see what effect this had upon a young prince, to whom, with his crowns, his father left the best counsels he could devise, but who with all this could not bequeath him his capacity.

Philip III. Philip IV. and Charles II.*

- THE prince Don Philip of Spain, at the time of his accession to the throne, was in the twenty-first year of his age^a. He had received a good education, under the care of Don Garcia archbishop of Toledo, was sincerely virtuous and pious, and, as a noble Italian historian says, exceeded most of his subjects in moral virtues; but was very defective in those great qualities that, because they are necessary too, are generally expected in kings^b. In the last years of his father's life he had assisted in the council for foreign affairs, and shewed somewhat of ambition in demanding the key from Christopher de Mora, the ensign of his office, while his father was yet living, at whose command it was delivered to him, and he gave it immediately to Don Francisco de Rojas y Sandoval, marquis of Denia, his favourite, to whom he not long after gave the title of duke of Lerma^c. It was at first doubted what turn things would take at the new court, where several great affairs seemed to be but half-finished; but it very quickly appeared, that the king and his minister were disposed to moderate measures; in consequence of which the peace with France was ratified, as also the cession of the Low Countries in favour of the infanta^d. The archduke Albert proceeded in his journey to Germany, and with the duchess of Gratz, and the archduchess Margaret her daughter, travelled slowly, and with great pomp, through the territories of the state of Venice, where all imaginable honours were paid to them, into Italy. Pope Clement VIII. being at Ferrara, where, on the 15th of November, by virtue of a procuration from king Philip, he espoused the archduchess, the nuptial blessing was given by the pope; and at the same time the Spanish ambassador, who was the duke of Soffa, acting as proxy for the infanta Donna Isabella, the pope celebrated that marriage also: then taking Mantua and Milan in their way, the archduke brought her to Genoa; where, however, the rough weather detained them till the spring^e.
- In the beginning of the ensuing year died the archbishop of Toledo, which, besides the loss of so great a man, had a great influence on the court, as it put the king intirely into the hands of his favourite, who quickly procured the primacy of Spain for Don Bernard de Rojas y Sandoval, bishop of Jacca, who was soon after honoured with a hat from Rome^f. The new queen, attended by the archduke, landed towards the latter end of March in the kingdom of Valencia, and the king repairing to that capital, the marriage was solemnized and consummated on the 18th of April. Amongst other signals of public joy on this occasion, there were two statues erected, one representing Jupiter, and the other king Philip, with a globe resting on both their shoulders; the meaning of which was obvious enough; but soon after an inscription was pinned upon the god, containing these words, This Jupiter is the duke of Lerma; which shewed how early the public envy began against this minister^g. The old ministers and governors of provinces, who had been bred in his father's maxims, excited the duke of Savoy to persist in keeping the marquisate of Saluces from the French king, and promised him the support of Spain, provided he would send his three children thither to be educated, or, as the duke understood it, to serve for hostages. They prevailed also with the king to assemble great forces at Lisbon, and afterwards to bring troops and a fleet to Corunna. He also demanded of Henry the fourth, that his fleet might be received into the harbour of Brest: all which was to alarm queen Elizabeth, as if he intended an invasion; which compliment the queen returned by preparations of the same kind, though there does not seem to have been any real intention on either side^h. The archduke Albert having married the infanta, the king conducted them to Barcelona, where they embarked on the 7th of June for Genoa, from whence they proceeded by land to the Low Countries, where the archduke no sooner arrived, than he acquainted queen Elizabeth, that he had full powers to treat of peace; and commissioners being appointed on both sides, they met at Bologne, by consent of the French kingⁱ. The Dutch sent a strong fleet to the islands, which did a great deal of mischief, being the first time that they had acted at sea alone against the crown of Spain; but, as auxiliaries, they had assisted in taking Calais^k.

A. D. 1600. Attempts unsuccessful against the Moors, and intrigues of the count de Fuentes in Italy. THE count de Fuentes, who had formerly made so great a figure in the Low Countries, was having now the government of Milan, not only with very full powers, but with a million of pieces of eight at his disposal, raised a great army, which drew the eyes of all Europe upon him; but, however, he did little, and what he intended was never perfectly understood. It was apparently designed to support the duke of Savoy, and to alarm the French king; but there were various secret designs, and one of them the surprising of Marseilles, which miscarried¹. At last, that these preparations might at least seem to have some end, a fleet of 70 gallies was sent, under the command of Doria, against the Turks; but tho' the basha Zigali's fleet was much inferior, that of Spain did nothing. While the treaty was concluding at Bologne, his catholic majesty assisted the rebels in Ireland; and it is said that king Philip obtained from the infanta, his sister, a resignation of her rights, whatever they were, to the crown of England.^b

The next year Doria made another attempt upon Algiers with as little success^m. On the 22d of September the queen was happily delivered of the infanta Donna Anna at Valladolid, to the great joy of the Spaniards, some doubts having been entertained whether there would be any issue of this marriage. The duke of Savoy was so much of this opinion, and so fully persuaded that the infanta Isabella would die childless, that he began to relish the proposal that had been made of sending his sons to be educated in a country, to the crown of which they might one day become the heirsⁿ. The count de Fuentes still continued his armaments and his intrigues; and tho', in the end, he seized the marquisate of Final, and published a pompous manifesto on that occasion, yet the world was now well enough apprised of his true design, by the discovery of marshal Biron's conspiracy, in which he was very deeply embarked, and which, as it ruined his own, so it very much lessened his master's reputation, more especially as he still maintained his government, and continued still to pursue the same dark designs^o.

UPON the death of queen Elizabeth, the court of Spain sent over Don Juan Baptista Taxis, count of Villa Mediana, to compliment king James upon his accession, and, under that pretence, to make some overtures of peace. This was judged to be the more necessary, as they were not ignorant in Spain that Henry the fourth of France was very desirous of engaging the new king in that general confederacy he was forming, in order to pull down the power of the house of Austria^p. In the summer, another expedition was made by sea against the infidels without success; and, in the autumn, died the empress Mary of Austria, who was the daughter, daughter-in-law, wife, and mother, of five emperors^q. She was exceedingly beloved by the people, and respected by the royal family in Spain, which was now increased, by the arrival of the prince of Piedmont, and his two brothers. The year ensuing his catholic majesty sent Don Juan Fernandez de Velasco, constable of Castile, his ambassador and plenipotentiary into England, to complete the negotiation which was already far advanced. Commissioners being appointed on both sides, the peace, notwithstanding many obstacles that were thrown in the way, was at length concluded, signed, and proclaimed, in the beginning of August, to the great satisfaction of the court and the people^r. It was the more acceptable, as the misunderstandings still continued between Spain and France, which frequently discovered themselves by the imposition of heavy duties on merchandize on one side, and prohibitions of commerce on the other. Besides, it was hoped that this treaty would make way for a peace with the new republic of the United Provinces, of which the archdukes were very desirous, and which could not but be pleasing to the catholic king, who paid a monthly subsidy of 300,000 ducats for the support of a war which produced him neither honour or profit.

As it was requisite to send an ambassador extraordinary to Spain, to see the peace sworn to by his catholic majesty, the king of England made choice of the earl of Nottingham for that purpose, who was so well known to the Spaniards by the title of the lord high admiral Howard. He was received with all possible demonstrations of respect, and had the good fortune to find the court in raptures of joy on the birth of the prince Don Philip, which happened on the 8th of April; of the ceremonies of whose christening he was a spectator, the duke of Lerma and the infanta Donna Anna being sponsors. Soon afterwards the king swore to the due performance of the treaty, the cardinal archbishop of Toledo reading the oath, and the king kneeling, with his hands upon the gospel; which we the rather mention, because such ceremonies are now out of use^s. The next year the queen was delivered of the infanta Donna Maria, and the first steps were made towards the negotiation of a truce with the states, tho' it did not take effect. The finances were in great disorder, and the measures that were taken to redress this were far from answering the end. In the mean time, those who hated the favourite, and who had pursued him with envy from the very beginning of the reign, multiplied their imputations, and magnified every unlucky accident that happened into a crime. a alleged, that the very duties upon oil and wine had brought in three-and-twenty millions: that the fleets from the Indies were more richly laden than in his father's time; and that, notwithstanding this vast income, the king's coffers were empty. All this confirmed the minister in his former sentiment, that the maxims of the last reign were to be abandoned, the sums squandered on spies and pensioners retrenched, and an end put to the war in the Low Countries without delay; since, besides the immediate expences supplied to the archduke, it obliged the crown of Spain to put annually a strong fleet to sea, and subjected them to losses in the Indies, which it was alike impossible to prevent or repair^t.

THIS situation of things made it requisite to call an assembly of the states, which was opened on the 16th of April, and continued sitting the best part of two years at Madrid, to which city the court was returned on account of the inconveniencies that were felt from their residence at Valladolid. There, on the thirteenth of January, the infant Don Philip was acknowledged heir apparent to his father, and the nobility sworn to his succession^u. In this assembly also the tender point of the duke of Lerma's administration was brought upon the carpet; and this was doubling the value of the copper-money, in which without doubt he was ill advised. The famous jesuit Mariana, who has rendered his name immortal by his history of Spain, shewed himself a judicious politician and an unbiassed patriot, in an admirable treatise upon this subject; but, having drawn the minister's picture in very strong colours, and exhibited his master likewise as an indolent and inactive prince, who looked into nothing with his own eyes, but left all to the discretion of those, or rather to the disposition of him he trusted, he was arrested, and remained a prisoner a full year^v. The states, however, more intent upon finding a remedy for the evil, than the punishment of those who perhaps erred in judgment, passed a law on the 22d of November, in which they provided, that the silver which should come from the Indies in the two next flotas should be coined in the manner therein prescribed; and that all the silver which came for the future should be likewise coined into such money as should be most expedient; for, upon raising the value of the copper coin, it had been poured in upon them from abroad, and their silver suddenly swept away, as if it had been by enchantment. The duke, however, prosecuting his scheme, procured a truce for eight months to be concluded in the Low Countries, which made way for that by which the states of the United Provinces were acknowledged as free and independent^x.

d THIS great event was brought about in the succeeding year by the interposition and under the mediation of the kings of France and England, who were guaranties of this treaty, by which a truce was concluded for twelve years between his catholic majesty, the archduke, and the states general. It was signed on the 9th of April, and ratified by king Philip at Segovia in the month of June^y. This produced a new clamour against the duke of Lerma, who was certainly the author of this measure, which those who hated him considered as highly dishonourable to Spain. We need the less wonder at this, since the Spanish ambassadors employed in making the peace with England always talked as if they had really believed it in the power of their monarchs to have reduced the seven provinces whenever they pleased by force, if they had not been restrained either by maxims of policy, or their unwillingness to exterminate the inhabitants of their hereditary dominions. To justify this, they compared the countries under the dominion of the states, and their forces, with the vast territories and proportionable power in the hands of their catholic majesties. But, whatever they might say, their statesmen certainly saw and knew that the contest for the Low Countries had cost Spain infinitely more than they were worth, and was such a continual drain of treasure, troops, naval stores, and ships, as wore out gradually the strength of the monarchy. The duke of Lerma, therefore, in all appearance had nothing to answer for in this respect, since he sacrificed only phantoms and chimeras to the real interests of the crown, by taking the single method that could be taken to rescue the Spanish nation from a consumption by which she was already brought very low, and by which, in the space of a few years, she must have been utterly undone; whilst most of her neighbours, who bore her no good will, were daily augmenting their strength and wealth, and, as she had good reason to fear, meant, at a proper season, to make her sensible that they had not forgot the injuries they had received from her in the days of her prosperity. But haughtiness, and a high conceit of their own power, are so natural to the Spaniards, that, how just soever the minister's motives might be, this step, of all others, was most likely to offend them; nor is it at all improbable that some of those, who best understood the reasons upon which he acted, from their envy to his high fortune, represented his actions in the worst colours.

ALL the measures that had hitherto been taken to secure the tranquillity of Spain, notwithstanding the number of Morefcoes that were still left, could not dispossess the greatest part of the clergy, and many prelates, of whom the archbishop of Valentia was the chief, of their apprehensions, which they represented in the strongest terms possible to the cardinal archbishop of Valentia; and he, on the other hand, prepossessed his brother the duke of Lerma in such a manner, that, in spite of all the arguments which could be used to the contrary, a resolution was taken to expell them out of that kingdom, and the edict for that purpose subscribed by the king, at the Escorial, September the 11th, 1609². In this edict it is said, that the Moors had invited the grand signor, and the king of Fez and Morocco, to make a descent in Spain with a great army, promising that they should be received by 50,000 good infantry, who were as zealous Mohammedans as any in Asia or Africa. Some say that they were charged with a conspiracy to massacre all the old Christians on the Good Friday following; but this was only a contrivance to give a colour to this barbarous and inhuman expedient, which was vigorously opposed by all the nobility and men of property in the kingdom of Valentia, who foretold, and the event justified the prediction, that, with the Moors, industry, wealth, and plenty, would be banished from their country. But all methods possible being tried to alter the king's resolution without effect, the decree was put in execution, and the Moors at several times transported out of that kingdom into Barbary, where however his catholic majesty interposed his interest to procure them a good reception, and the best settlements that could be given them².

AFTER the execution of this decree in Valentia, the same method was taken in Andalusia, Granada, Murcia, Catalonia, Aragon, both Castiles, Estremadura, and La Mancha, not without two rebellions, in each of which the Moors chose themselves a king, which were not suppressed without a great effusion of blood, and putting both those miserable pretenders to royalty to death^b. A great number of children under the age of seven years were retained and sold; but his catholic majesty declared they should not remain slaves, but that those who bought and educated them should have their service as many years after they reached the age of twelve as they had bought them under it, and that then they should be free. By this expulsion of the Moors, some say that no less than a million of persons were sent out of Spain, which is probably beyond the truth; but it seems on all hands agreed, that there were eighty thousand families transported, and, according to the most moderate calculation, this rather exceeded d than fell short of six hundred thousand persons^c. We must, in common justice to the understanding of the king and his ministers, suppose there must have been very strong reasons for so bold and so extraordinary a measure (A). However, the bad effects that were foreseen quickly

(A) The chief reasons for expelling the Moors, or rather Morefcoes, by the clergy, and more especially by the cardinal of Toledo and the archbishop of Valentia, might be reduced to three. First, That they were obstinate and incorrigible infidels, upon whom preaching did no good, and all instruction was cast away; and therefore it was to no purpose to bear with them any longer. Secondly, That they were traitors to the state, rejoiced at the misfortunes of the king's arms, wished well to his enemies, held a constant correspondence with them, invited them to invade the kingdom with a promise of their assistance, and, as often as they had opportunity, sold or betrayed people into the hands of their countrymen the Moors of Barbary; so that, from a principle of self preservation, it was requisite to remove them. Thirdly, That as they perpetually increased in their numbers, and began in many places to have great interest with their neighbours, there was great risque of their corrupting the manners and faith of the Christians, and no less hazard of their becoming strong enough to attempt recovering their dominion over them. It was therefore absolutely necessary, to prevent these evils, to remove them without delay. To these the barons opposed their answers. They said, that, if most of the Morefcoes were Mohammedans at the bottom, it was owing to the want of learning and application in the clergy, to the wrong methods they took in converting them, to the impolitic and irreligious distinction between old and new Christians, to the want of suitable encouragements, and, above all, to the violences and cruelties exercised upon them by the inquisition. As to their treasons, they were at best chimerical; that, for their correspondencies with France, England, and Holland, they were downright falsehoods, equally void of probability and evidence; and that, as to the persons they sold or betrayed to the Moors, they would undertake to ransom all captives at the expence of the Morefcoes. In answer to the danger and hazard that might attend keeping them, they suggested the immense benefit that arose from their labours, the improbability of unarmed and dejected people rising and conquering a warlike and potent nation, and the dreadful indigence that must follow from expelling a million of industrious people, to gratify the resentment, and still the fears, of avaricious and timid priests, some grudging the pensions they paid out of their revenues to those appointed to instruct them; and others weary of their pastoral functions, and willing to sell their flocks, which in conscience they were bound to feed (1). After all, it must be allowed, that the clergy spoke truth, when they affirmed the bulk of the Morefcoes to be Mohammedans; and it must be also allowed they spoke sense, in affirming it to be very dangerous to let them remain in Spain if they continued so. On the other hand, the nobility were in the right as to the advantages derived from them, and no less so in the consequences they foresaw from the loss of them. Both spoke from their interests, and neither had any thing else in view (2). The king and his ministers, therefore, a quickly discovered themselves; and though the duke of Lerma secured by it the clergy in his interest, it lost him the best part of the nobility, and was always considered as the worst action in his whole administration. In the month of November the strong and important fortress of Larach in Africa was betrayed to the Moors, thro' the treachery of some Morescoes, which, though in itself of great loss, was of some use in allaying that general discontent which had been excited by their expulsion, though it was as likely to have been occasioned by the resentment of that measure as by any other way ^d.

It is affirmed by some, who were present in the Spanish court, that the news of the deplorable death of Henry the fourth of France was very acceptable there; which is the less strange, since there is nothing more certain than that his demise at this juncture concurred precisely with their interests ^c. The Spanish ministers, or at least their emissaries, had given this prince perpetual disturbance and repeated provocations ever since the peace of Vervins, which was concluded from necessity rather than choice; and it was well enough known, that though he bore this, he bore it with great reluctance; and with a purpose of being revenged as soon as it was in his power. At the very moment he was murdered, he was on the point of taking the field against the house of Austria in the empire, and it was believed, had concluded a secret treaty with Charles Emanuel duke of Savoy, one of the ablest, but one of the most unquiet, princes that age produced, by which he promised him his assistance in conquering Milan from the Spaniards. If, therefore, the war had broke out in Italy as he intended, at the same time that it began to blaze in the Low Countries and in Germany, the system framed by Charles the fifth, and upon which Philip the second wrought throughout his long reign, would in all probability have been demolished in a few months, since the deep submission shewn both in Germany and in Italy was the pure effects of dissimulation, and, upon the first appearance of a force sufficient to protect them, the concealed enemies of the house of Austria would in both have thrown off the mask. However, upon the first intelligence of the French king's death, the court of Spain went into mourning, and a minister was dispatched to Paris with compliments of condolance to the queen regent, as well as to put her in mind of the marriages that had been proposed; the flatterers of both courts gave out, that the match of the eldest infant and the young king Lewis was intended by Providence, because they were born within a few days of each other; and this embassy was very kindly received, and the proposals of marriage were promised to be brought upon the carpet, notwithstanding the French nation appeared in general very much against it ^f. The duke of Lerma was extremely satisfied with this, as it fell in exactly with his pacific disposition, and allowed him to proceed at leisure in his scheme of paying the king's debts, and bringing the finances into order, for which he was highly applauded by his creatures, and abused almost by every body else, upon a supposition that old demands could not be satisfied without a proportionable present to the all powerful benefactor by whom they were procured.

QUEEN Margaret of Spain, who had an extreme attention to this marriage, a great influence over the king, and upon whom the German branch of the house of Austria chiefly relied, had the satisfaction of seeing herself the mother of three princes and as many princesses, when she was delivered of another son, Don Alonso, on the 22d of September, at the Escorial, which was celebrated with all possible demonstrations of joy; but these soon after were converted into mourning by the unexpected death of this prince on the third of October following ^g. A report prevailed some time after that she was poisoned, and very probably those who raised it cast the suspicion on the man in the world least likely to commit such a fact; this was Don Rodrigo Calderona, who was favourite at once to the queen and the duke of Lerma, and he had a prodigious influence, or rather command, over both; from which it was asserted, by those who had more wit than to believe it themselves, that he had enchanted them both. A certain prelate, however, assures us, that the queen was poisoned by the smell ought to have given full credit to neither; they should have employed their thoughts in devising how to make these people true Christians, which would have put an end to the dispute (3). This might have been done by separating them, by establishing an order of monks, whose sole business it should have been to convert them, by erecting schools for teaching their children the Castilian tongue, by bestowing upon those children employments in distant parts of the country, and by sending the apostates into Barbary, instead of leaving them at the mercy of the inquisition (4). But the duke of Lerma was governed by his brother, and the king by the duke and his own superstitious fears, which were wrought on by pretended miracles and fictitious prophecies (5).

of certain perfumed pastils thrown into the fire, which the season rendered necessary in the chamber; and the fact is ascribed to the natural aversion which the Spaniards have to German customs, from which the queen would never refrain^a. Be this as it will; as soon as the king appeared in public, it was given out on one side, that he was desirous of marrying the English princess Elizabeth, but to others it was pretended that he had thoughts of a princess of Savoy, which, with the proposed marriage of the prince of Piedmont to one of the infantas, flattered the ambition of duke Charles Emanuel extremely.

THE queen regent of France, having made the necessary alterations in her council, ventured to avow the double marriage concluded with the court of Spain; and sent the duke of Mayenne to Madrid to demand the infanta, at the same time that the duke of Pastrana was sent to Paris, to make the like demand of the princess Isabella, or Elizabeth, sister to king Lewis,^b for Don Philip, prince of Asturias; which ceremonies, though supported with all imaginable splendor, from the natural antipathy of both nations, were not agreeable to either, though the situation of their affairs rendered them very convenient, according to the sentiments of their politicians^c. The Morescoes, so hardly dealt with in Spain, sustained this year two persecutions from those of their own religion. At Constantinople they drove the Jews out of the suburb of Pera, and attempted the like with respect to the Christians, for which they were chastised by the grand vizir. The city of Algiers being afflicted with famine, they turned out thousands of those poor creatures to starve, and put numbers of them to death. The murmurs of the people in Spain were in some measure silenced by the arrival of a plate fleet from the Indies with eleven millions on board^d.

War in Italy, and the renewal of a proposition for a

England.

THE Spanish ministry, as much as their parts were slighted by their countrymen, had with great address perfected what the French could never perform, that is, the intire subjection of Italy. Charles duke of Savoy could not brook this with patience; the Venetians saw it with concern; and the grand duke, though he felt but little of the yoke, was far from being easy under it. Pope Paul the fifth affected not to perceive it; and indeed the Spaniards occupied themselves rather in forging and rivetting the chains of Italy, than in rattling them about people's ears, merely to make them know who were their masters. The death of the duke of Mantua, who left an only daughter, produced an explanation of this matter which the Spaniards did not expect or desire. Cardinal Gonzaga, brother to the deceased duke, laid aside his hat to place a coronet upon his head; and the duke of Savoy, having withdrawn the duchess dowager his daughter, surprised on a sudden the best part of the Montferrat, of his rights to which he had made a cession upon his daughter's marriage. The duke of Mantua, unable to defend himself, called in the assistance of his neighbours the Venetians, and the grand duke supplied him from a point of honour; but the governor of Milan received express orders from Madrid to oblige both princes to disarm, and to prescribe a peace upon certain terms, the most remarkable one of which was the marriage of the cardinal duke to his brother's widow. Both princes were displeased with this, as were indeed all the Italian states: but, after all, the cardinal duke wisely submitted, knowing that he had not a power to resist, and upon a presumption that his antagonist, who was stronger, would take the same steps upon other motives; so that he should lose nothing, and procure at the same time the protection of Spain; in which he judged right; for the duke of Savoy, roundly refused to part either with his troops or his daughter, not doubting that he should be supported by France, in which, however, he found himself mistaken^e. At this time the catholic king and his ministers continued to amuse the English court with distant and indefinite propositions. The princess Elizabeth was married to the elector Palatine, so that nothing more could be said on that head^f. Henry prince of Wales, whom they had often wished in Spain to espouse the infanta Donna Maria, was dead; and the loss of this prince put the Spanish ministers in mind, that when a match was mentioned between him and the infanta, of the disproportion between their ages. She was said to be a fitter match for the duke of York, in which they now concluded the English ministers had reason, and were for bringing this negotiation upon the carpet again, though all their purpose was only to amuse, since they knew the marriage was extremely odious in England, nor could it be more so there than it was to them.

THE military preparations of the Turks being very great, and no certainty at all upon whom the storm would break, the Spanish ministers found themselves under a necessity of providing for the security of their coasts, and fitting out a considerable fleet. By that time this was completed, it was known that the Turks had in view the attacking of Malta; but, before the Spaniards had leisure to regulate the affairs of their succours, the grand signor laid up his fleet, and turned his arms against the Persians. Upon this, orders were sent to Don Lewis Faxarado, who commanded the Spanish fleet, to make a descent on Barbary, and to build a a strong fort upon the gulph of Marmora, to prevent the pirates from taking shelter there; and disturbing from thence as they had done the coasts and the commerce of Spain. This, in the month of August, was happily effected; and, tho' it would scarce have deserved notice in the days of Charles or Philip his son, it was one of the most considerable successes of this reign^a. The troubles of Italy still continued, though the duke of Savoy professed upon all occasions the most profound deference for his brother-in-law, and actually sent his son, the prince of Piedmont, into Spain; but, having a secret understanding with the governor of Milan, it was sometimes war, sometimes peace, between them, notwithstanding very precise and clear orders were sent from Madrid. The great point he laboured to evade was, the disbanding his troops; especially when he found the queen regent of France would not embark in this quarrel, out of respect to the house of Mantua, with a branch of which in France she had some measures to keep. On the other hand, the duke of Lerma, who was believed to have a personal prejudice against the duke of Savoy, and who, from the intire influence he had over his master, hindered him from proceeding farther than some general discourses in a scheme of marrying a princess of that house, resolved to ruin all his projects by sending a new governor into the Milanese, who should pursue his instructions punctually, and by making the Venetians feel the resentment of Spain for the succours they had privately given the duke, though they had taken part against him in the beginning of the quarrel. The sole view of the Spanish minister was, that an end should be put to these disputes by the interposition of Spain, without admitting the shadow of the emperor's authority, or allowing the French to interfere in the negotiation. In this respect he was jealous of his master's honour, but took care to second his dictates with the princes of Italy by an army of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, which he judged the most probable means of having them obeyed. Though he was not reputed the most subtle statesman, yet even his enemies allow, that this plan was well drawn, and conducted throughout both with prudence and spirit^b.

He was prevailed upon, however, to trust Mendoza, the old governor, with the conduct of the campaign for this year, from various motives, of which this was none of the least, that, the double marriages being to take place, it was not so convenient that things should be carried with a high hand in Italy. He abated, however, nothing in his instructions, but left that intirely to the temper of him who was to execute them, and who, notwithstanding his superiority, having to deal with a prince of consummate capacity, made a confused kind of war, which he concluded as soon as he could by a perplexed peace^c. In the mean time his catholic majesty went to Burgos, where, on the 18th of October, the marriage was celebrated by proxy between prince Philip of Spain and Madame Isabella, sister to the king of France. The same day was likewise celebrated the marriage of Lewis the thirteenth with the Infanta of Castile, who two days before had renounced all her rights to the succession, in case her brothers died without issue, not only to her father's kingdoms, but even to the Low Countries. On the ninth of November the two princesses were exchanged on the river of Bidasso. Affairs were at this time in such confusion in France, that the queen regent was forced to bring her son with an army to meet his bride, whom he received at Bordeaux, and was afterwards obliged to conclude a peace with the malecontents, in order to open a safe passage back to Paris; which peace proved very soon fatal to the marshal de Ancre, who had the chief hand in the marriage, and to the queen herself, who was exiled to Blois. As for his catholic majesty, he remained with the prince at Burgos till the arrival of Madame Isabella, and soon after returned with the court to Madrid. There the treaty of Asti, which had been concluded by the governor of Milan, was disclaimed, and a resolution taken to send Don Pedro de Toledo, marquis of Villa Franca, to replace him in that government; a man of high spirit and great talents, who it was not doubted would re-establish the superiority of Spain, and give law to the princes and states of Italy. This the duke of Lerma thought indispensably necessary for the honour of his master's crown, and for the credit of his administration^d, which he knew was decried by the common people, at the same time that his authority was undermined by those who were under all the ties and obligations that either the laws of nature or of society could establish, for the foundation of trust and confidence amongst men. He bore up against them, however, with courage, and opposed great prudence and long experience, as well as the interest he still had in his master, to the arts and intrigues of men who attacked him without any just cause, and were guided solely by the dictates of their ambition.

Don Pedro de Toledo, the new governor of Milan, quickly gave the duke of Savoy, and all who were interested in the treaty of Asti, to understand, that it was not to be the rule of his actions, farther than it was consistent with the glory of the Spanish crown, of which he took himself to be the sole judge. He applied himself with such vigour and diligence to augment his troops, and to dispose all things for the continuance of the war, that, notwithstanding he forbore committing hostilities, yet he perplexed the duke of Savoy much more than his predecessor had done at the head of a numerous army. The French king at first sent thither Monsieur de Bethune; and after him the marshal de Lesdiguières was sent to Turin, where he served the duke of Savoy effectually by his advice, and saved him by his assistance, which enabled him to resist Don Pedro when he came to attack him openly, as well as to defeat that back blow by which the governor of Milan expected to have undone him; for understanding that the duke of Nemours, who was of the house of Savoy, and who had been but indifferently used by the duke, was notwithstanding raising forces on his behalf in France, he, by promising him the investiture of Savoy, engaged him to change sides, and, when admitted into his country, to fall upon the duke with that army which had been raised partly with his money, and intirely for his service. But this treachery was discovered in time, and prevented. It was upon this that the governor of Milan, who had dissembled, to give the duke of Nemours time to penetrate into Savoy, discovered his real intentions, and began the war, in which his superiority gave him some success; but the great courage and conduct of duke Charles of Savoy prevented his doing any thing that could be accounted decisive. The duke of Osuna, at this time viceroy of Naples, attacked the duke likewise by sea; and made some impression¹. The Spaniards had also another quarrel with the Venetians, as auxiliaries of the archduke Ferdinand. This contributed to excite a general distaste to them and to the house of Austria, which was greatly augmented by the private views and bad designs of some great men, whose wickedness rendered a crown and administration odious, though they had not the least concern in their intrigues, and must have suffered more by them than any other state whatever.

Strange designs and daring practices of the Spanish ministers in Italy.

THE flame of war blazed higher this year in Italy than ever, and spread much farther than ever the court of Spain intended, if the intrigues before-mentioned had not been discovered. There was at this time a triumvirate of ministers in that country, capable of embarrassing all Europe, and of sacrificing it too, for their own private and pernicious purposes. This triumvirate was composed of Don Pedro Gironne, duke of Osuna and governor of Naples, the marquis de Bedmar, who was ambassador at Venice, and the marquis de Villa Franca, governor of Milan. The first of these, under pretence of arming against the Turks, carried on a secret correspondence with them, at the same time that he held another equally dangerous with the marquis de Lesdiguières, the design of which was to seize the kingdom of Naples, and to render himself independent. The second conducted those dark projects that were to have ended in the destruction of the city and republic of Venice, if they had not been discovered and prevented. The third seemed to meditate the conquest of Savoy, and actually made himself master of the strong fortrefs of Vercell, by which the duke was constrained to enter into an accommodation, upon terms that were far from being agreeable to him. This, however, raised his character with the court of Madrid, who disavowed the conduct of the other two, and recalled the marquis of Bedmar immediately². In the East Indies the war continued between the Dutch and Spaniards and Portuguese, subjects of the same crown, of which we have treated in another place; and of which all we have here to say is, that Don Juan de Ronquillo having, on the 15th of April, gained a signal advantage at sea, the news of his victory were no sooner received in Spain, than it was celebrated with great demonstrations of joy, the duke of Lerma pretending, upon this foundation, to take such measures as should effectually secure the Moluccas; in which, however, himself and his successors were exceedingly disappointed; neither did the rejoicings that were now made contribute to support, as he was in hopes they would, his credit with the king, or restore him to the general good opinion of the grandees and of the people.

As soon as it was known at the court of Madrid that the duke of Savoy was inclined to peace, it was very quickly concluded, even upon such terms as were approved, if not dictated, by the court of France; and express orders were sent to the marquis de Villa Franca to carry this treaty punctually into execution; which he obeyed, tho' with all the solemnity of a Spaniard, obliging the duke to take always the first step in the setting prisoners at liberty, in disbanding troops, and in the restitution of places; but Charles gave himself no pain about that, when he found the marquis was to be depended upon, and that he performed things honourably, though he would perform nothing but in his own way³. The disputes with the Venetians were also composed: and the eldest branch of the German line of the house of Austria being on the point of failing in the emperor Matthias, his catholic majesty, out of regard, and in order to support the grandeur of the family, consented to a general renunciation of all his rights to the succession of any part of the dominions belonging to that branch; and though some say that, in consideration of this resignation, it was agreed, that the king should have a full and ample a cession made to him of the whole country of Alsace, yet it does not appear that any such grant was ever made, or at least it is very certain that he never received any benefit from it: we may therefore justly assert, that his conduct in this respect was equally prudent and disinterested; for if he had insisted upon these possessions, they would have added nothing to his power, and would have lessened that of the archduke very much. But we must now pass to the domestic concerns of his catholic majesty, and relate as succinctly as we can the fall of the duke of Lerma, who had hitherto governed his vast dominions with unrestrained authority, the king seeming to have no other will than that of complying with his minister.

It is generally agreed, that consummate prudence, rather than any sublimity of genius, The measures taken by the duke of Lerma, to secure his administration, prove ineffectual. was the characteristic of the duke of Lerma. It was this that rendered his administration peaceb able and stable, and yet it is owing to this that he fell at last into disgrace. He discerned clearly, that the abilities of the duke of Uzeda his son were below the level of his own, but he had the manners and the polish of a court; he therefore intended that he should succeed him as the king's favourite, and he instructed him so well, and managed his design with such address, that it succeeded beyond his wish. His aim was, that his son should manage the court; but, for the cabinet, he made choice of his sister's son, the count de Lemos, a man of true parts, and every way fit for the great employment for which he was intended. But as he was himself in no hurry to retire, he placed the count de Lemos in the bed-chamber of the prince, that he might contemplate the rising sun, and rise with it. In this too he succeeded, for the count de Lemos gained the affections of his young master in a c supreme degree. The duke's foresight went still farther; he cast his eyes upon Lewis Aliaga, a monk, of whose probity he had a great opinion, whom he made the king's confessor. The consequence of all this care and skill was, that his son and the priest conspired against him, and became his bitterest enemies: the duke of Uzeda could not pardon the contempt his father had shewn of his talents; the priest thought he had more to expect from a minister of his own making, than from the minister who had made him. The count de Lemos might have secured himself at least, if he would have joined in this scene of ingratitude, but he disdained it; he loved, he revered his uncle, and therefore removing him was the first step towards the fall of that great minister. The king signified to the count, that he should not pass his evenings at the prince's bed-side; and, his commands not being very punctually d obeyed, he was forbid his presence, and removed from his employment*.

THE duke de Uzeda and the confessor, as is usual in courts, cloathing their private views with He is disgraced, and for his own security, obtains a hat from the pope. the specious pretence of concern for the public, carried all the popular complaints against the duke of Lerma into the king's closet; in consequence of which a committee, or, as they call it in Spain, a junta, was appointed to consider of the state of the nation; and they made a long and laboured report, in the very first paragraph of which they told the king, that Spain was on the point of falling to the ground, and ascribed all these misfortunes to the duke of Lerma and his administration; and yet a very able and a very impartial judge assures us, that there never was a favourite more mild and moderate than this duke; and that, while he held the reins of government, the public resembled his private conduct; it had not in it any thing striking or e surprising, but it was without war, without taxes, and without oppression. The king, however, upon this report, by a short letter, dismissed the duke from his employments, and ordered him to retire; which he did on the 4th of October^r, which was the feast of his patron St. Francis, and which, from the superstitious practice of those times, he had regarded as fortunate and propitious. He made some struggles to remain, that were unworthy of so great a man; but his prudence in procuring a hat from the pope a little before his disgrace, though he did not receive it till afterwards, was very commendable, since it covered him from those pursuits which the malice of his enemies, who had gone so far, would otherwise have carried farther². On the 7th of December, the same year, died his brother the cardinal archbishop of Toledo suddenly, and, as some think, of the grief conceived at his brother's disgrace, which he
 f had laboured all that was in his power to prevent³. The king determined immediately to give that important preferment to the Infant Don Ferdinand; but as that prince was very young, this design met with great opposition at the court of Rome, and it was not without a long and troublesome negotiation that it was at length brought to bear^b. The duke de Uzeda, who succeeded his father, advised the king to shew himself to his subjects; and proposed, in hopes it would render his administration popular, that he should make a tour into Portugal, as the most effectual means of quieting the discontents of that nation, which were both general and great, but occasioned chiefly by the degeneracy of their nobility, who consumed in folly and luxury the vast revenues derived to them from the virtue and industry of their ancestors, which this visit of the king's was much more likely to increase than to cure.

IN a short time after the disgrace of the duke of Lerma, his favourite Don Rodrigo Calderon, a count of Oliva, was seized and imprisoned. The fortune as well as the fate of this man was very extraordinary. He was the son of a poor soldier and of a Flemish woman, neither of whom would ever have been heard of but for this son of theirs, who was a youth of pregnant parts; the duke, then marquis of Denia, took him under his protection, and afterwards into his favour. In the beginning of his fortunes, the young man was ashamed of his birth, and would have disowned his father; but he quickly effaced this fault, by receiving him into his house, and treating him there with the utmost respect and veneration. It has been remarked, as peculiar to the duke of Lerma, that he advanced his favourite as high as if he had been the favourite of a king: for he not only enabled him to raise an estate of an hundred thousand crowns a year, and procured him titles and honours, but he even allowed him to hope for a viceroyalty. These favours could not fail of exciting envy, which the haughtiness and impetuosity of his temper quickly swelled into malice, according to the prediction of his father, who frequently told him, that, his bark having so little ballast, if he continued to croud sail at that rate, it would be overset by the first storm. The death of the queen and of prince Philip Emanuel of Savoy, with many other enormous offences, were charged upon him, as the instrument of his master; but, after sifting for two years these accusations, they were found to have nothing in them. However, he was continued in prison, and, as we shall see hereafter, became the victim of that resentment which the abuse of his master's kindness had excited. It is supposed that this prosecution was drawn out into so great a length, partly to prevent his escape, and partly to keep up the odium that had been raised against the duke his master, and hinder his being restored to the king's favour.

ON the 22d of April the king Don Philip set out from Madrid, with the prince his son, and the infanta Donna Maria, for Portugal, and, from the hour he entered that kingdom, saw nothing but splendor, joy, and obsequiousness. On the feast of St. Peter he made his public entry into the city of Lisbon, where the river was covered with vessels of all sorts, decorated with the most glaring and costly magnificence. There were no less than thirty-two arches of triumph in the streets; and such an amazing display of gold and jewels, that the king was obliged to prolong this shew for two days, that he might have time to behold all. He paid the Portuguese by his courteous and affable behaviour, and by saying, that he never thought himself so great a king before. He caused an assembly of the states to be held, in which the nobility swore to his son as heir apparent, and himself likewise swore to maintain their privileges, and to govern according to law. He remained at Lisbon for some months; and when he left Portugal, to return into Spain, he seemed to do it with reluctance. Yet the nation in general was not satisfied with his behaviour, for he did not appear so much in public as they desired, neither did he give so explicit an answer to their demands as they expected. The first was in reality owing to the principal motive of his coming thither, which was, a declining state of health; and the other to the influence of his new ministers, who were much afraid that the Portuguese would insinuate themselves into his affections; and were not at all pleased, that, in representing their grievances, they more than once insinuated to the king, that they did not in the least impute them to his majesty, but to those who had his ear, and who abused that confidence which he placed in them; circumstances that contributed not a little to heighten that distemper which the king had upon him, and which in fact was a deep melancholy, occasioned by the memorial which had ruined the duke of Lerma, and which had opened the king's eyes with respect to the miseries of his subjects, and to his own incapacity of relieving them.

Embarrassed state of affairs, by which the Spanish ministry is much perplexed.

A. D. 1619.

THE affairs of Europe, which had been tolerably serene during this reign, began now to be overcast. The affairs of the empire were fallen into great confusion; the Bohemians had thrown off the yoke, and elected Frederick prince palatine for their king; even the Austrians wavered in their fidelity, and Ferdinand found himself besieged without and within Vienna. In short, the assistance of Spain, which had always been expedient, was now necessary, to the German branch of the family; and that which had been an uneasy burden became a heavy load; and, what rendered it the heavier, it was impossible to be laid down. In Italy, the duke of Feria, who was sent to replace the marquis of Villa Franca in the government of Milan, found a league upon the carpet for circumscribing the power of the Spaniards; and, to defeat this, he set on foot such intrigues in Switzerland, as rendered his nation more odious and more insupportable to the Italians than ever. The designs also of the duke of Osuna became so apparent, and the nature of his connections so generally known, that the only question at Madrid was, not whether he should be removed (for in that all the ministers agreed) but whether he would submit to be removed, or how another governor should be introduced,

The honour of the crown of Spain required her having a fleet at sea likewise; but prince Philibert of Savoy, who commanded it, following his instructions very punctually, fought it with great earnestness, and, with equal dexterity, avoided fighting when he had found it ^h.

As the Spanish ministers found the concerns of the monarchy in such a situation, that, As with without exerting themselves, they must necessarily fall into confusion, a spirit of vigour ap-^{spirit, and} peared, very unusual in their councils. Under colour of assisting the archduke Albert, great ^{find their} supplies were sent into Germany, and a numerous body of veteran troops under the marquis ^{efforts attend-} Spinola, who acted however in the name of that prince, and not of the king of Spain; which ^{ed with con-} timely succours enabled Ferdinand to get the better of his competitor, and to over-run his ^{ed} dominions ⁱ. In order to assist him still farther, the old treaty of marriage was revived with the king of England, and mighty advantages proposed to recommend the match of the infanta Donna Maria with Charles prince of Wales; an alliance which king James had no one reason to wish, by which Spain alone could have been a gainer, and in which they were notwithstanding, from first to last, but very insincere ^k. The duke of Feria was encouraged and applauded, which induced him to spirit up the popish inhabitants of the Valteline to revolt from the Grisons, and, which was much worse, to massacre the protestants. This being per-^{A. D. 1623.} formed, the Spaniards, as protectors of the catholic religion, erected several forts in that country, not so much to serve the interest of their new allies as their own. The situation of this narrow track rendered it of infinite importance, as it facilitated the correspondence be-
c. tween the two branches of the house of Austria, shut the Swiss out of Italy, kept the Vene- tians in awe, and perfected the plan laid down by the count de Fuentes for holding the Italian princes and states in a dependence that differed very little from subjection ^l. Cardinal Francis Borgia, being appointed viceroy of Naples, was introduced with silence and secrecy into the castle, which is one of the three fortresses that commands the capital, and by the thunder of the cannon from thence the morning after, the duke of Offuna had the first notice that his successor was arrived. He was a man of courage and abilities, as well as boundless ambition; but this stroke so surprised him, that, though he made some overtures, he was afraid to venture upon open resistance; and therefore resigned, though with a bad grace, what it
d. was not in his power to keep ^m. The cardinal infant Don Ferdinand, the consent of the pope being at last obtained, took this year possession of the see of Toledo by proxy, the primacy of Spain being committed to a child of ten years old; which, whatever pleasure it might give the king as a father, could not be well reconciled to that character, of which alone he seemed ambitious, of being esteemed the most pious prince of his time ⁿ.

WHATEVER satisfaction might result to the ministers from the success of the last year, they were far from reviving, as it was hoped they might, the spirits of the king. He grew worse ^{Died of} in the winter, and, at the coming on of the spring, he became so weak, that he clearly per-^{Philip III.} ceived he could not last long. He now expressed a great concern for that indolence and inap-^{and circum-} plication which had been the disgrace of his reign, which his father had predicted, and to ^{stances attend-} which in truth he had contributed by an austere education, and which this very prince had copied in regard to his own son. He disapproved the seizing the Valteline, and gave orders upon his death-bed that it should be restored. In imitation of his father, he left in writing some notes and observations for the use of his son; but he left him, what made a stronger impression, his example of never being his own master, into which he was already fallen, and in which he persisted to his life's end. The king was given over by his physicians near thirty days before he died, which occasioned a variety of intrigues. Some of his ministers, either repenting of what was past, or through fear of what was to come, desired him to recall the duke of Lerma; to which he readily consented. Upon this, the count de Olivares, who was the prince's favourite, put his master upon a very extraordinary and a very hazardous
f. action; for he engaged him to send an order to the duke of Lerma, requiring him to return to his own house as soon as it came to his hands, and where-ever it might find him. This, though he might have declined it, the duke obeyed, saying, with his usual prudence, that he was glad to be honoured with the first order of his master, that he might give his subjects an early lesson of submission to all his commands ^o. Philip III. expired in his palace at Madrid on the last day of March, in the forty-third year of his age, and in the twenty-third of his reign. He expressed much less firmness in his last moments than his father had done; which was so much the more strange, as his life was incomparably more innocent, since an indolent love of quiet was his great and almost only fault. He had by his queen, the archduchess Margaret of Austria, seven children, four sons and three daughters. Of these, Philip, who succeeded him, the infant Don Carlos, the cardinal infant Ferdinand, the queen of France, the infanta Donna Maria, who was afterwards queen of Hungary, survived him; but, notwithstanding this numerous posterity, he is said to have had no better prospect with regard to his family than in reference to his dominions, the thoughts of which embittered his last moments, and occasioned some complaints, which it is needless to repeat ^p.

His son Philip IV. succeeds, and is intirely governed by count Olivares.

PHILIP the fourth, like his father, remained the subject of his favourite, after he became the sovereign of his people. This favourite, as we observed before, was Don Gaspar de Guzman, count de Olivares, a man of great parts and boundless ambition. He followed, tho' as we have seen it was not necessary, the orders sent by the prince, with another signed, the moment he became king, to the duke of Lerma, whom it overtook upon the road, and served only to convince him, that, in his first resolution, he had acted with prudence. The king discovered at first some sparks of spirit and genius, that were not long supported, and which, if they were afterwards remembered, served only to persuade his subjects, that indolence, and not incapacity, was his principal failing. The count, by a dexterous management, raised a great outcry against the late ministry, and, under colour of inquiring into it more strictly, the duke de Uzeda was removed, and his friend the confessor remanded to tell his beads in his own monastery. In this there was not much amiss, the world in general approving these sacrifices; but it was not so with another victim. Don Rodrigo Calderone, after being acquitted of all the great charges brought against him, was condemned for having knowledge of the death of two Spanish gentlemen, not over-clearly proved. He suffered on the scaffold; but he suffered with so much constancy, and yet with so much humility and resignation, that he attracted universal compassion. Great changes followed in the cabinet and the court. About the person of the prince the count scarce suffered any that were not his own relations; and, except his nephew Don Lewis de Haro, none of them were distinguished by their shining abilities. The minister had a great genius, and he did not care to be controuled ^q.

A new scheme of politics introduced, which has long and lasting bad effects.

In regard to foreign affairs, things were conducted in a manner not very conducive to the honour of the new king. The late monarch, by a clause added to his will, had commanded the prince his son to restore the Valleline. In compliance with this, a treaty was concluded at Madrid with Monsieur de la Bassampiere, in which all the proper stipulations were made for the restitution of that country, and orders for that purpose were to be sent to the duke of Feria, who knew how to execute, or rather not to execute, them, so as to keep the country; pretending a good will to restore it, if the catholic inhabitants might be preserved in the free enjoyment of their religion. But by this time the new system of the count de Olivares began to display itself; for having brought into public odium, and even under a kind of prosecution, the late ministry, for their pusillanimity in the management of affairs, it was become requisite at least, if not necessary, that new methods should be entered upon. These consisted in the concluding a strict league with the emperor, that, by his assistance, while France was torn with religious wars, and England amused with the false hopes of a marriage, the war in the Low Countries might be revived, upon the conclusion of the truce, and both there and in Italy the authority of the crown of Spain rendered not only respected, but in a manner absolute ^r. A great design, and not ill laid out, if all things had happened according to the apprehension of its author; but Providence disposing otherwise of events, his schemes were not attended with that success he expected. On the contrary, they produced a spirit of jealousy, which, in process of time, brought the Spanish monarchy to the brink of ruin.

Resolution taken to renew the war with the states, and to bridle Italy.

THE count de Olivares, who, under the veil of extraordinary modesty, concealed a self-sufficiency, that equalled, in his own opinion, the talents of Ximenes, would not seem to do any thing out of his own province; and therefore put his uncle Don Baltazar de Zuniga, who had been the king's governor, at the head of foreign affairs. He was in reality the very opposite of his nephew; for he had that genius to which the other pretended, but with all the modesty which the duke only affected. With all this merit, however, he suffered himself to be carried away with the count's notions, and concurred with him, against the sense of all the rest of the council, to renew the war with the Dutch, notwithstanding they had shewn a great disposition to prolong the truce, or even to convert it into a solid peace ^s. This strange measure, in direct opposition to the representations made by the archduke Albert, and most of the council, was far from being acceptable to the people. But they were better pleased, at least at the beginning, with the count's causing a new court to be set up, for squeezing those who had been in the management of the finances during the former reign, by which a great a sum was brought into the treasury, and by the count's declaring, that, for the future, the public revenue should be applied only to public uses, and no gratifications or pensions granted upon any terms¹. In Italy, the people of the Valteline were still protected in their revolt, and the marquis Spinola, with the Spanish troops under his command, assisted the emperor against the protestants, while the negotiation of the infanta's marriage remained still on the carpet. By this doubleness in its behaviour, the Spanish court, by degrees, wore out the patience, and at length excited a resentment in all the great powers of *Europe*². A. D. 1622.

In order to repay the obligations they were under, or at least to acknowledge them, the German branch of the house of Austria did every thing that could be desired by the crown of Spain; the emperor, in particular, granted to king Philip the investiture of Milan, Final, Piombino, and other lesser fiefs in Italy, which heightened the jealousies of the princes and republics to such a degree, in conjunction with the conduct of the duke of Feria, then governor of Milan, that, under the protection of the crown of France, they formed a confederacy for the recovery and preservation of their freedom³. The war went on in Germany and the Low Countries, and consequently the treaty of amusement with England, notwithstanding the infanta had declared clearly to the count de Olivares, that, if it was concluded, she would retire into a monastery, and the king himself had sworn that he would never give the princess his sister to a heretic⁴. However, appearances were carried so far, that the English ambassador extraordinary, the earl of Bristol, and the Spanish ambassador, count Gondemar, seem to have been both deceived; so that, upon their assurances, Charles prince of Wales, attended by the marquis of Buckingham, arrived at Madrid on Friday the seventh of March, very unexpectedly; and their presence, in such a situation of things, must have been very unwelcome. To cover this as far as it was possible, all imaginable honours were paid him. The king, in all public places, gave him the right hand; all criminals not condemned, and all prisoners for debt, were set at liberty, the king paying their creditors in honour of this visit. The intentions of the court were so well dissembled, though his royal highness saw his mistress but seldom, some say but once, that, after seven months stay in that court, he departed, under such a persuasion of their being in earnest, that, having left full powers with the lord ambassador Bristol, he deposited a private act of revocation, to be delivered to him when the bull from Rome should come, which, if he had been apprised of the true sentiments of the court, was altogether needless. However, the two favourites quarrelled to such a degree, that Buckingham told Olivares, he would serve the king of Spain in England at the risk of all that was dear to him, but for himself, he should always find him his greatest enemy; to which the count answered, without the least emotion, that he hoped he would keep his promise; and that, how far soever he went in the execution of his threats, he would forgive him with all his heart⁵. The pope too, that he might shew an equal strain of sincerity, after giving all imaginable proofs of his approbation of the match, directed a brief to the count de Olivares, in which he thanked him for his steady attachment to the catholic cause, so clearly manifested by his defeating a measure so inconsistent with it as this marriage would have been. The whole transaction, when it came to be thoroughly understood, added England to the number of those great powers which studied to find out means for effectually humbling the pride, and lessening the authority and influence, of the house of Austria. Such were the first effects of this minister's refined politics!

The court of Madrid had reason to be well satisfied with the promotion of cardinal Barberini to the papal throne, under the title of Urban VIII.; but though he espoused their interests heartily, and was allowed to have managed them with great dexterity, they proved nevertheless ineffectual. The French ministry, for various reasons, but more especially on the score of giving some assistance to the Hugonots, had conceived a very high dislike for the conduct of Spain, which they discovered by pressing the pope, who held the Valteline in a kind of sequestration, to render the forts, according to the treaty of Madrid; and this being long protracted, the marquis de Coeuvres, with the forces of the league, made a great progress in the dispatch of it, by a shorter method than that of negotiation⁶. The pope likewise interfered, to prevent the king of England, Charles the first, from marrying the French princess Henrietta Maria; and in this he likewise failed, tho' his nuncio at Paris went so far as to declare his master would not grant a dispensation. But Richlieu, who was rising to the head of the ministry, told him, that this would break no squares with the English; they would conclude it without⁷. It was easily discerned from this, that those crowns were embarked in the same designs. In the Low Countries, the war was carried on, but at a vast expence, though, at the time the truce was broken, the great argument for that measure was, that peace or war in those parts would not create a difference of 50,000 crowns a month. We may form some idea of the character of Philip and his minister from what happened upon the marquis Spinola's remonstrating against the orders that were sent him concerning a siege, which, for many reasons that he assigned, he judged in a great measure impracticable. The king's answer was in these words, Marques, sumais Breda, Yo El Rey; that is, Marquis, take Breda, I A. D. 1624. THE KING^b. The Dutch this year made themselves masters of the capital of Brazil; but Don Lewis de Andrada had, on the other side, some some success against them at sea, as well as against the Moors. The archduke Charles, brother to the emperor, whom the king invited into Spain, with an intention, as was believed, to bestow upon him the government of Portugal, was taken sick soon after his arrival at Madrid, and died in three weeks; and this year also deceased the famous duke of Offuna, formerly viceroy of Naples^c.

The Spanish dominions suddenly attacked on all sides by the English, French and Dutch.

THE deep policy of count Olivares had hitherto done no remarkable service to the crown^b of Spain, but, on the contrary, provoked all her neighbours; so that, without the ceremony of a general alliance, they concerted to attack her this year on all sides: the republic of Venice, and the duke of Savoy, in conjunction with the crown of France, were to prosecute the recovery of the Valteline; and the two latter agreed farther to conquer the city and state of Genoa; the states were to make great efforts by land and sea; count Mansfield was to be furnished with an army sufficient to keep the emperor employed, and the English were to invade Spain by sea. These schemes were not only constructed, but executed; however, the Conde de Olivares lost no credit by that; and though this was a year in which the strength of the monarchy was put to very severe trials, it acquired fame that more than balanced some little loss. The Venetians would not concur in the expedition against Genoa; the French and Savoyards attempted it^c with great force, and with some degree of success at first; but the Spaniards supported their allies with men, money, and a fleet; and the duke of Feria, invading Piedmont, quickly constrained the enemy to abandon all the conquests they had made. The English fleet and army came to Cadiz, which they might have taken with great ease, if they had gone about it with vigour; but their general, the lord viscount Wimbleton, spent so much time in fortifying at the Puntal, that Don Ferdinand Girome transported in his sight a reinforcement to Cadiz, which saved the place. Notwithstanding this, they might certainly have taken the whole plate-fleet, if they had continued where they were; but several advice boats being dispatched from the coast of Spain, with orders to sail to Corunna, one of them fell into the hands of the English, who thereupon directed their course thither, and the very next day that fleet, having missed all those^d boats, arrived safely in the port of Cadiz^e. This appeared an event of such consequence to the king, who would have gone in person to the relief of that place, if Olivares had not prevented him, that he ordered anniversary rejoicings, on the 20th of November, to perpetuate the memory of this mark of the divine favour^f. The quarrel of Buckingham with Olivares, as it brought this mischief on Spain, so the jealousy between that favourite and cardinal Richlieu disappointed the measures that had been concerted for the recovery of the Palatinate; and, to crown all, the marquis Spinola took Breda, and Don Frederic de Toledo had great success against the Dutch in Brazil. This year died the cardinal duke of Lerma at Valladolid.

Olivares gains an advantage over Richlieu in making the peace.

THE necessity of opposing so many enemies at once by sea and land, and in so many different parts of the world, had constrained his catholic majesty to raise, which had not been done^e in his reign, some extraordinary taxes upon the people; and this excited some discontent. The count de Olivares proposed that the king should make a tour into Catalonia; which journey had other political reasons. In the last campaign he had been in a manner compelled to abandon the Valteline; and finding the war on that side very troublesome, he resolved, if possible, to put an end to it by peace. He acted in this matter with great address, and caused the Spanish minister at Paris to insinuate to cardinal Richlieu, that, in a general treaty, the princes and states in Italy would be able to prescribe laws to the two crowns, which it was equally unfit and dishonourable that they should receive; but that, if they treated secretly, they might adjust all things to their own interests. His propositions were listened to, and an ambassador sent into Spain, under pretence of complimenting the queen lately delivered of an Infanta, by whom^f a treaty for the restitution of the Valteline was concluded at Moncon, and ratified at Barcelona, intirely in favour of the Spaniards, and in which the French not only treated without the privity, but even sacrificed the interests, of their allies, which disoblged the Venetians extremely, and irritated the duke of Savoy to the last degree. Upon this the duke of Feria was recalled from the government of the Milanese, which was committed to Don Gonfales de Cordova, and all the proper measures were taken to repair the naval force of Spain, and to afford what succours were necessary to the emperor. Besides, to strengthen the interests of the German line, the infanta Donna Maria, on whose account the war with England had happened, was married to

Few minds escape uncorrupted by prosperity; Olivares having disappointed in war the views of those who were stiled the allies of Avignon, and having succeeded since in a negotiation with France, while the emperor had in a manner rendered himself absolute in Germany, and pursued schemes that seemed to manifest a resolution to become quite so, he thought the opportunity was to be improved, and no means rejected, that might exalt the grandeur of the crown of Spain. A little incident had in this respect too much weight with him. He had induced his master, soon after his accession to the throne, to assume the title of Great, and he afterwards considered himself as under an obligation to make him so. The spirit of independency had been checked in Italy by the treaty of Moncon; but the Valteline was by that treaty restored to the Grisons; so that the end of the war, which was shutting up in Italy, was defeated, which he could not bear. The fortress of Cazal in the Montferrat, erected and fortified by princes who could not maintain it, immediately presented itself to his view. It is true it belonged to the duke of Mantua, who was under the protection of Spain; but as it was foreseen that a dispute must arise about this succession, as the branch of the house of Gonzagua was settled in France, where they had the title of Nevers, was nearest in blood, and the house of Gustalla, being of the same family, pretended preference, as being Italians, he thought it very practicable, whenever the duke died, to seize all, till the emperor should settle the rights of the contending princes, and then to keep Cazal as a reward for restoring the rest. Into this project, by making it his interest, they drew the old duke of Savoy, and troubled not themselves about France, supposing that the intestine broils in that kingdom, to which they lent some assistance, would keep it in a state of distraction till their projects were brought to bear. In all this they were soothed by assurances from Cordova, governor of Milan, that all might be easily brought about, if he was well supplied with money. But Vincent duke of Mantua, commiserating the state of his country, upon his death-bed sent for the young duke of Rhetel, eldest son to the duke of Nevers, in order to marry him to his niece, that he might have a title equally clear to Montferrat and Mantua; which marriage, commanded by his last words, was solemnized in his palace, while he was yet warm. The duke of Nevers endeavoured to open a peaceable entry to his just rights, by testifying the most obsequious submission to the crown of Spain; notwithstanding which, by the ascendancy that Olivares had over his master and his councils, the war of Mantua was resolved upon; from which resolution we are to date the declension, if not the ruin, of Spain ^g.

The war of Mantua resolved upon by Olivares contrary to the sentiments of other ministers.

As the Spaniards in general are politicians, the resolution of kindling a new war in Italy excited great discontent; but the count, who had procured to himself the title of duke de St. Lucar, which, by resignation, he meant to bestow upon a bastard son of his, was so persuaded that success must attend his measures, that he gave no great attention to these murmurs, which were not at all lessened by the crying down copper money, on the hopes of a large supply of silver from the West Indies. In Italy, the war being begun, Cordova and the duke of Savoy endeavoured to divide the Montferrat between them; but the former, failing in surprising, was forced to besiege Cazal, which was obstinately defended. On the other hand, the duke of Savoy demanding assistance to shut the French out of Italy, the Spaniards were forced to weaken an army that was before scarce equal to the siege. The correspondence also held with the duke of Rohan and the protestants in France, not having been able to save Rochelle; and cardinal Richlieu, after the surrender of that place, having prevailed upon the king his master to go in person with a numerous army to the assistance of the duke of Mantua; raised the spirits of the Italians to such a degree, that Cordova was neither able to take Cazal, nor to keep the duke of Savoy in that degree of subjection which was expected by the court of Madrid. Add to all this, that the Dutch admiral, Peter Adrianson, beat a Spanish fleet in America, of which they burnt part, and brought a great booty home. On the 8th of September, Peter Heyn took the galleons in the neighbourhood of the Havannah, and acquired thereby for his masters, the West India company, eight millions of florins in silver at least, which, as it proved of very great advantage to the affairs of the republic, so, in many other respects, besides the immediate loss of such a treasure, it was highly detrimental to the concerns of Spain ^h.

THE arrival of the French king with his forces on the frontiers of Piedmont, and forcing the pass of Suza, obliged the duke of Savoy to a treaty, and constrained the governor of Milan to raise the siege of Cazal; but the disorders of France obliging the king to return, revived the Spanish hopes, and gave them time to bring a body of Germans into Italy. They likewise sent the famous marquis Spinola to restore their affairs on that line, and furnished him so plentifully with money, that the inhabitants of the Low Countries, still in obedience to his catholic majesty, looked upon themselves as abandoned, and actually sent an agent to Madrid, to make strong remonstrances for assistance, since otherwise it was impossible for them to defend themselves¹. These disappointments gave the conde duke some disturbance, heightened the popular distaste against him, and might have had worse effects, if the queen had not been delivered, on the 27th of October, of the prince Don Balthazar, to the infinite joy both of the court and nation, and to the great benefit of the house of Austria. The conde duke, for so he was pleased to be called, as affecting a kind of singular behaviour in every thing, might have taken opportunity, from this incident, to have made some propositions of peace; but, instead of doing that, he entered into a new treaty with the duke of Roban, promising him mighty things, if he would revive the troubles in that kingdom; but this had not the desired effect; and the German soldiers perishing in great numbers in Italy, together with the dispositions made by the Swedes to succour the protestants in Germany, who were driven to the last extremity, kindled the flame of a general war, which, by a kind of unanimity little known to politicians, all Europe ascribed to the ambition and obstinacy of *Olivares*².

ALL hopes of succeeding in the project for bridling Italy were now devolved upon the marquis Spinola, who had orders to besiege and to reduce Cazal almost in the same terms with those he was commanded to take Breda, and this notwithstanding it was one of the best fortifications in Italy, with a numerous garrison, composed mostly of French troops, commanded by marshal Thoiras, and well supplied with provisions. It was supposed that the French, by their intestine distractions, would be with-held from any new irruption, and that the correspondencies held in Mantua, and even in the family of the new duke, would suddenly produce great effects. There is no doubt but Spinola did all in his power to execute his commission, but was foiled notwithstanding by a most obstinate resistance. The duke de Richlieu, vested with the title of generalissimo, and followed by a gallant army, penetrated into Piedmont, and was very near seizing the duke of Savoy and his son, which, with other disgraces and disappointments, affected the mind of the duke to such a degree, that he died of discontent³. Mantua was indeed surprised, the duke and his family expelled, and the city and palace plundered, which only served to increase that hatred against the Spaniards in Italy, that was but too strong already; for the marquis Spinola dying of resentment of the reproofs he received from Spain, and Ferdinand taking upon him to make a peace at Ratisbon with the French, Cazal was saved out of their hands, and the outlines of a peace drawn, which did no honour to the councils at *Madrid*⁴. The infanta Donna Maria, queen of Hungary, was this year sent into Germany; but the promises made by Philip IV. to his subjects in the Low Countries, that he would come to redress all their grievances in person, proved a mere delusion, and excited that distrust, which afterwards was heightened into an absolute contempt of the declarations that came from *Spain*⁵.

In order to prevent the restoration of peace, or at least a tranquillity, in Italy, Olivares sent Feria again into Milan, depending on the temper and abilities of the man, who was naturally an enemy to quiet. He laboured to seduce the duke of Mantua from his allies by magnificent promises, to bring Victor duke of Savoy into a closer dependence upon Spain than ever his father had been, to create jealousy in the Venetians, and new commotions in the Valtelline; but without effect. The treaty of Querasque settled the peace of Italy for the present, and not only procured the best part of his dominions, with the emperor's investiture for the duke of Mantua, but, contrary to the expectations, as well as to the interest of the Spaniards, the strong fortress of Pignerol, by purchase from the duke of Savoy, in the hands of the French, and an army of Grisons and Switzers under the command of the duke of Roban, now reconciled to France, for the defence of the Valtelline; so that all the schemes of Olivares, and all the intrigues of Feria, were totally defeated⁶. In Germany, the power of the emperor, on which Spain had so much depended, was in a great measure broken, and new complaints and demands brought from all quarters to Madrid. To satisfy, as far as possible, the desires of the people, the infant Don Carlos was sent viceroy to Portugal, the cardinal infant appointed to the government of the Low Countries, and the marquis de Sante Croce sent thither to command the forces⁷. At sea Don Antonio de Oequendo, with a strong fleet, equipped with great difficulty, and on board which multitudes had perished by a contagious sickness before it sailed, proceeded to the coast of Brazil, where attacking a Dutch squadron, commanded by admiral Pater, of sixteen sail, of which ten fled without fighting, because they had the good luck to sink one ship, and blow up another, which carried the flag with the admiral on board, medals were struck

- a in honour of the victory, with the king's head on one side, and Sampson rending the lion on the reverse^a. But this success was quickly qualified by the loss of no less than sixty vessels in the Low Countries, and fourteen others burnt and destroyed, with the loss of many thousand men, and a prodigious quantity of military and naval stores^r. This year, though they were very little able to bear the expence, the Spaniards received the queen mother of France, and her son the duke of Orleans, into their protection, fully persuaded that this would contribute to the ruin of cardinal Richlieu, whom his master thereupon created duke and peer of France; and the senate of Venice, by an unanimous vote, received him into the number of their nobility, to the no small mortification of Olivares, who considered him very justly as his implacable enemy^s.
- b KING Philip concluded this year a treaty with the emperor, to enable him to defend himself the better against the Swedes; and, for the security of the Italian provinces, entered into negotiations with the duke of Savoy, and the Genoese. Don Gonsales de Cordova was sent to command the auxiliaries in the Palatinate, and the infant Don Carlos declared generalissimo by sea, for the relief of Tangier, which was besieged by the Moors. Don Antonio de Oquendo had some degree of success against the Dutch in Brazil; but, on the side of the Low Countries, both the states and the French were very successful^t. In the mean time the infant Don Carlos, brother to the king, died at Madrid; the prince Balthazar was acknowledged heir apparent of the Spanish monarchy, and the cardinal infant began to prepare for his journey into the Low Countries, where he was to succeed the infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia in the government of those provinces^u. A new tax, though laid upon persons in easy circumstances, added to the general distaste which prevailed against Olivares, already so unfortunate as to have every thing that happened amiss attributed to him, and particularly the death of the infant, a prince of a restless and active spirit, whom it was given out the conde duke had removed by poison, in order to secure himself from such aspersions^v.
- c THE supreme council was revived in the kingdom of Portugal, the security of which was thought to be promoted by the duke of Braganza's marriage with the daughter of the duke of Medina Sidonia at Madrid^w. The infanta Isabella Clara Eugenia, daughter to Philip II. died, on the first of December, at Brussels. The cardinal infant, being come to Milan, found his progress stopped in the route he intended to have taken; to open which the duke of Feria marched with an army of 12,000 men, who performed indeed what he was sent for, and relieved the city of Constance; but it was so late in the year, that the cardinal found himself obliged to continue where he was; and it may be he did this the more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of promoting the intrigues in Italy, which began to be under some apprehensions from the Swedes. At sea and in Brazil the Dutch had various advantages; and, in the Low Countries, affairs were daily falling from bad to worse; for the forces and the treasures of Spain were employed in such a degree for the service of the emperor, or rather in support of the common interests of the house of Austria in Germany, that they were not in a condition to look after their own concerns^x. Into this they were at first led by a fond hope, that when the emperor should, by their assistance, have triumphed over the protestants, and all other opponents in Germany, he would concur with them in the reduction of the Low Countries to the state they were in at the death of the emperor Charles the fifth.
- d AFTER endeavours had been used in vain to bring the duke of Savoy back to his former connections, persuasions, with better success, were tried with his two brothers; insomuch, that prince Thomas, having sent his wife and children into Spain, retired himself to Brussels, while cardinal Maurice at Rome declared openly for the emperor and the king of Spain^y. On the other hand, the republic of Genoa, resenting highly the decision, which, in his brother's name, the cardinal infant Don Ferdinand had made in respect to the disputes between them and the duke of Savoy, put themselves under the protection of France, and acted with a vigour and dignity becoming a free state. In the mean time, his catholic majesty's minister at the imperial court, count de Ognate, by the instructions of Olivares, first accused, before the privy-council, the famous general Wallenstein, and afterwards proposed his assassination; which being effected, gained great applause to a measure that would otherwise have been universally condemned^z. The duke of Feria being dead at Munich, the marquis de Leganez took the command of the army till the arrival of the cardinal infant, who, in conjunction with the king of Hungary, his brother-in-law, engaged and defeated the Swedes, and their confederates. The marquis de Aytona, who governed the Low Countries, till the cardinal's arrival, with great spirit, had, under colour of a conspiracy, arrested some of the principal nobility, and forced others to fly; while the king Don Philip and the conde duke, having first very roughly interrogated the duke of Aremberg, who had been sent as deputy from the nobles to the court, as to the same conspiracy, because he would not accuse himself and his friends, caused him to be arrested in their presence, and sent to a close prison ^b. In this situation the cardinal infant took possession of the government, where, notwithstanding these bold steps, the town of Dunkirk refused to admit a garrison that he sent thither. Gaston duke of Orleans, after making several treaties with the crown of Spain, for the invasion of his native country, and the disturbance of his brother's government, which were indifferently performed on both sides, finding himself become inconsiderable in the eyes of strangers, and being sold, as he commonly was, by one of his favourites, returned privately into France, and thereby saved the Spaniards a great expence, which had never answered their purpose ^c. The conde duke, however, forming new designs, assembled a great naval force, of which having given the command to the marquis of Santa Croce, the Genoese, as he accepted it without their leave, ordered his name to be struck out of the list of their nobility ^d.

ALL these enterpizes of the crowns of France and Spain against each other, as they were in reality the fruits of that animosity which reigned between Richlieu and Olivarez, were carried on without a war declared. But the cardinal infant, governor of the Low Countries, having surprised Treves, and made the elector prisoner, sent him to Vienna, to answer to the emperor for having admitted a French garrison; upon which Lewis XIII. having demanded him from the cardinal infant, rejecting his excuses, declared war in form. This declaration was followed by an army, which having defeated that of the Spaniards, commanded by prince Thomas of Savoy, threatened great things, but, through the interposition of a variety of accidents, performed little ^e. On the side of Italy things were in great confusion; the duke of Roban, having received considerable reinforcements, secured the Valtelline for the French, who, entering through Piedmont with an army commanded by the duke of Crequi, invaded the Milanese. There they were joined by the duke of Parma, and brought with them the duke of Savoy, whose inclinations, however, were thought to be on the other side; and therefore, though this irruption promised fair, yet the event was not equal to those promises. This was chiefly owing to the conduct of the Venetians, who maintained that neutrality which their interest dictated, with a firmness and dignity worthy of that prudence for which they have been always famous ^f. The Spanish fleet, upon which Olivares much relied, as being composed of many large ships, with seven thousand Spanish troops on board, sailed at length for the coast of Provence, under the command of the duke of Ferandina and the marquis of Santa Croce; but in their passage met with a storm, by which they were dissipated, and seven galleys lost, with all that were on board them. Being, after much loss of time, once again brought into order, they attacked the islands of Hieres, and reduced them, for which the marquis of Santa Croce was rewarded with the viceroyalty of Catalonia ^g.

In Italy the Italian princes had this year good reason to repent their having entered so far into the jealousies of the two crowns, as to make their own country the seat of war; for the duchies of Parma and Modena were grievously spoiled, as well as the Milanese ruined, by the irruption of the Spaniards into the Milanese, though, after a battle, the marquis of Leganez drove them out, and then with his cavalry ravaged Piedmont, so that destruction was spread on every side, without any great advantage to either party ^h. In the Low Countries prince Thomas of Savoy, with the assistance of the emperor's generals, pushed the war with effect; and, having taken some places in Picardy, struck such terror into the inhabitants of Paris, that the cardinal once advised the king his master to retire to Orleans; but prince Thomas being in no condition to maintain his conquests, they were, when the French had recovered their spirits, very speedily retaken ⁱ. The Spanish fleets, attempting to put into the harbours of Genoa, were refused licence, upon certain suspicions, which heightened the hatred they had conceived against that republic. The conde duke, to display his power, and to shew his influence over his master, caused his relation, the duke de Medina de la Torres, to be declared viceroy of Naples for eight months; that, while he held this dignity, he might espouse the princess of Stigliano; after which, the count de Monterey resuming that government, the duke had the viceroyalty of Sicily bestowed upon him ^k. In the winter both sides seemed inclined to peace, and the city of Cologne was appointed for the conferences; but when passports were required for the plenipotentiaries of the protestants of the empire, and of the states general of the United Provinces, they were refused by the emperor and the king of Spain, the former affirming, that he looked upon those princes as his vassals, and the latter avowing, that he considered the Dutch in no better light than that of rebels ^l.

- a EXPERIENCE having taught the duke of Parma with how little advantage princes of his rank embark in the quarrels of great monarchs, finding himself blocked up in one of his capitals, and his dominions surrounded by the Spaniards, he made his peace by the surrender of Sabionetta, and put an hundred thousand crowns into his pocket, under pretence of repairing his fortifications. By a proper use of soft persuasions, accompanied with a dexterous distribution of money, the Grisons were prevailed upon to expel the duke of Rohan, and resume their sovereignty of the Valtelline, under the protection of a perpetual league with Spain. But, to balance these successes, the French recovered the islands of Hieres, and made some progress in the Low Countries, under favour of which the prince of Orange recovered Breda in nine weeks, in reducing which the marquis Spinola had spent nine months ^m. The conde duke, hoping to set all right, invaded Languedoc with a numerous army, commanded by the duke of Cardona and count Corbelon, who besieged Leucat; but duke Schomberg, who was governor of that province, with a small army, and that composed chiefly of militia, forced their trenches in the night, and obliged them to abandon the siege with the loss of all their cannon ⁿ. This year died the emperor Ferdinand the second, Victor duke of Savoy, and Charles duke of Mantua ^o. The famous imperial general Picolomini, by the consent of his master, entered into the service of Spain, and the duke of Medina de la Torres, by the influence of his protector Olivarez, was removed from the viceroyalty of Sicily to that of Naples ^p. The Grisons are prevailed upon to drive out the duke of Rohan, and resume the Valtelline. A. D. 1637.
- c THE situation of things in Italy was certainly favourable to Spain, and her ministers and generals lost no opportunity of improving them. The marquis de Leganez took several places in Savoy, where the marshal de Crequi was killed, and all the endeavours of the cardinal, de La Valette, to restore the affairs of that country baffled; while, on the other hand, the princess dowager of Mantua was persuaded to change sides, and to commit the protection of herself, her son, and her dominions, to the emperor and the crown of Spain ^q. In Germany the affairs of the house of Austria went prosperously; in the Low Countries they were unusually successful, the cardinal Infant Don Ferdinand routing the young count William of Nassau with great loss, and making a capture of seventy barks laden with naval and military stores; to revenge which, his father the prince of Orange having besieged Guelldres, the cardinal forced him in his intrenchments, and gained a complete victory ^r. The prince of Conde, with the duke de la Valette, having laid siege to Fontarabia, an army was speedily assembled for its relief, under the command of the amirante of Castile, who, with great spirit and bravery, attacked the French in their lines, beat, and forced them to raise the siege with considerable loss, and with equal shame and confusion ^s. There happened also a fight at sea, in which both sides claimed the victory, though neither with any great reason. But, what was esteemed of more consequence, there happened this year an insurrection in Portugal, in which some proclaimed the duke of Braganza king, of which that prince was so far from making any advantage, that he withdrew himself far enough out of their reach, as if he had been afraid of having the crown forced upon him ^t. Such an unusual turn of good fortune could not but be extremely welcome to the Spanish nation; and it would have been much more so, if the king had not persuaded himself that it was so intirely due to the councils of the conde duke, as to heap upon him all the rewards which the generality of his subjects thought due to other men's endeavours. In accepting these, the minister himself was much to blame, as well as in treating with the contempt he did not only the far greater part of the grandees, but also the people of certain provinces, which were once kingdoms, whose privileges he considered as fetters on the royal authority. He made no difficulty of avowing, that the great object of his wishes was to emancipate the crown from these chains, from a persuasion, that till the king was absolute at home, he could not dictate as the conde duke desired he should to the other powers of Europe ^u; a notion he avowed, though he could not effect; and which Richlieu concealed when he had actually atchieved it. Unexpected good fortune renders the conde duke more insolent than ever. 1638.

- f THE two princes of Savoy, supported by the emperor's authority, and the assistance of the Spaniards, pushed things very far in Piedmont, under colour of their having a title to the regency of their nephew; and at length prince Thomas, who was a gallant man, and a great general, surprised the city of Turin, the duchess dowager escaping half-naked into the citadel. But the prince becoming jealous of the marquis of Leganez, and fearing he would put a Spanish garri'on into the place, did not press that fortress so much as he might have done, and at length prevailed upon him to consent to a truce for some months, which gave great advantage to the French; while, on the other hand, Olivares, who never departed from a point he had proposed, sharply reprov'd the marquis for not reducing Cazal; telling him, that he regarded nothing as done in Italy while that was left undone ^v. At length the count de Har- He persists in his resolution of having Cazal, and sends orders accordingly to M. de Leganez.

court, advancing with a very small force into Piedmont, renewed the war with advantage. In the Low Countries, Picolomini forced the lines of Tbionville, and obliged the French to decamp. An armada from Spain, commanded by Oequendo, consisting of upwards of threescore sail, passed through the English chanel, towards the coast of Flanders; but were attacked in their passage by the Dutch admiral Van Tromp, notwithstanding their having all the protection they could expect from the English. This fleet had a very large sum of money on board, which, with the largest ships, arrived safe in Dunkirk, but many others being taken, sunk, and destroyed, the Dutch with good reason celebrated this as a great victory ^a. The duke of Modena being now in Spain, his catholic majesty bestowed upon him the order of the Golden Fleece, and gave him the title of Highness, with which he was extremely pleased. The marquis of Leganez was likewise raised to the much envied honour of grandee of Spain, as well in regard of his services, as because he was descended from the then favoured house of Guzman, and his posterity in our times inherited the duchy of St. Lucar ^b.

That enter-

A. D. 1630. THE war in Italy which had so long occupied the attention of the conde duke, was at length, in his opinion, on the point of terminating to the advantage of Spain by the reduction of Cazal, in which the French had but a thin garrison; and the Spaniards, having concluded a treaty with the dowager princes of Mantua, derived from thence some intelligence in the place, which had no succours to expect, as the French had no troops in the field. The governor, M. de la Tour, an old and experienced officer, prepared to make the best defence possible; and the method he took suggested hopes to the Spaniards, that he would scarce make any defence at all. His forces being weak, he made no sallies; and the Spaniards being left at liberty to fortify their camp without disturbance, did it much at their leisure, and with a view chiefly of cutting off all provisions from the place, but without attending much to their line of circumvallation, persuaded on that side they had nothing to fear. The count de Harcourt, however, who commanded in Savoy, having exact intelligence of the situation things were in, collected all the forces he could, though their number was but small. With these he advanced towards Cazal, brought the first news of his own march, and attacked the Spaniards so vigorously, that, after the loss of three thousand men upon the spot, they quitted their lines, and for the most part disbanded, leaving their tents, baggage, and artillery, to the conquerors ^c. At his return into Savoy, the count, with an army smaller than would be now thought requisite for its garrison, invested Turin, which was bravely defended by prince Thomas: yet, notwithstanding several attempts made by the marquis of Leganez for its relief, but without success, it was surrendered towards the close of September ^d. Soon after this, prince Thomas reconciled himself to the French by a treaty, negotiated with great secrecy by the famous cardinal Mazarine. In the Palatinate the Spanish troops had some advantages; but in the Low Countries they lost the important city of Arras, notwithstanding the cardinal infant made a generous attempt to relieve it, which very much raised his reputation, though it was not in his power to save the place. On the side of Spain itself, the French had taken Salses, and some other places in Roussillon, which the Spaniards easily recovered; but the consequences of this were fatal to them, beyond all the losses they had sustained in the course of the war ^e; a thing that must appear strange to the reader, and which therefore we shall immediately explain.

a design of depriving the Catalans of their privileges.

We have before observed that the conde duke was by no means pleased with the distinct privileges of certain provinces, and meditated the reduction of all Spain, under what he styled one form of government, which was generally suspected to differ little, if at all, from a despotic monarchy. It is no wonder, therefore, that, to a minister with these notions, the Catalans should be in a particular manner odious, since they were the freest of all his catholic majesty's subjects. He had, the very last time the king was at Barcelona, prevailed upon him to leave that city while the states were sitting in it, abruptly, and induced him from that time to treat whatever applications they made by their deputies very roughly ^f. The Catalans, indeed, instead of stooping to him, had behaved on their side very cavalierly, refusing not only to make any application, in order to recover his favour, but refusing to have any correspondence with him whatever, and, in all their remonstrances, told the king plainly, that they looked upon Olivares as their declared enemy, and for that reason unworthy of his majesty's confidence. This, without doubt, heightened his resentments, of which they would have felt the effects, if they had not been protected by the situation of their country, covered on every side by almost inaccessible mountains, except where it is bounded by the sea; and, besides, so contiguous to France, that the inhabitants might be easily supported from thence, if they should ever be driven to demand the protection of that crown. But the expedition

a into Roussillon had removed these difficulties, and had carried an army into that country, to which the Catalans contributed a corps of their own troops, who quitted it before the end of the campaign, being persuaded that they were sacrificed by the king's forces, whose duty it was to have supported them ^d.

AFTER the reduction of Salles, the army had orders to take their winter quarters in Catalonia, The Catalans revolt univer- in direct breach of their privileges; and, as if this had not been enough, they were allowed sally, and murder their vice- to live there with such licence as would scarce have been excusable in an enemy's country. Murders were common, rapes more frequent, robberies practised daily with impunity, complaints made to their officers produced no relief, and remonstrances at court were received with a coldness that differed little from contempt ^e. This produced an universal discontent, which b was blown into a flame by the inconsiderate conduct of the count de St. Coloma, who was then viceroy. He, under pretence of wanting money to pay the troops, seized a large sum belonging to the city of Barcelona, and upon one of their magistrates going to expostulate with him, sent him to prison, from whence the people in general, taking arms, quickly delivered him. The viceroy, whose courage was just as great as his prudence, fled immediately to the arsenal, where not thinking himself safe, notwithstanding all the assurances the magistrates could give, he ordered a galley, which he had long kept upon the coast, in case of falling into such an extremity, to anchor as near the arsenal as possible; yet, though the passage was not very long, he fell into the hands of the populace, who, in the first transport of their fury, murdered him, and then, despairing of pardon, made themselves masters of Barcelona. In a few days c the revolt became general, the Spanish soldiers were every-where driven out, and glad to escape with their lives. Some attempts were made by the interposition of the old duchess of Caldona and the pope's nuncio to pacify the people, with promise of a general pardon; but these had no effect, an army was quickly raised of thirty thousand men, under the command of the marquis de los Velez himself, a Catalan, but hated by his countrymen, as a creature of the minister's ^f.

AT the time he put himself at the head of this army, the marquis received a private order from Olivares to proceed with the utmost severity, as well as with the greatest expedition. The marquis de los Velez sent to extinguish the revolt, and inflames it by severity. He did not fail in either; which, however, had no other effect, than to make those desperate who were already exasperated. He advanced directly to Barcelona, taking with little resistance d several places in his way, which he destroyed without mercy ^g. The Catalans were in the utmost consternation, and, if mercy had been then promised, would certainly have submitted; for though they had offered themselves to France, yet, as it required some time to settle the terms, they had received very slender supplies, under the command of Mr. St. Paul from thence. Yet even these encouraged them to defend themselves with spirit, since they had to do with men from whom victory alone could procure them safety. The marquis made three attacks on the fort Montjuic, which commands the city, and was, though with great difficulty, repulsed, chiefly by the courage and conduct of the French officers; for the Catalans, having been purposely kept from the use of arms for many years, discovered but little of their antient bravery, which, however, interest and discipline quickly restored, and, before e the end of the winter, the enemy were obliged to abandon a great part of their conquests ^h. This was very mortifying to Olivares, who, with some difficulty, had prevented the king from marching against them in person, from an apprehension that the king might have received informations no ways suitable to his interests. The sense he had of this, and of the immediate necessity of subduing this people before they entered into a settled connection with foreigners, added to the natural rigour and violence of his own temper, put him upon those measures, which produced still greater calamities; and, while he was intent upon extinguishing one flame, lighted another that never could be brought under. Great part of the army then in Catalonia was composed of Portuguese: the conde duke resolved to draw his reinforcements from the same country, for, hating the Portuguese as much as he did the Catalans, he weakly f imagined that he might make them reciprocally the instruments of his resentment, or at least was desirous of bringing the principal nobility of Portugal to serve in an army at a distance from their own country, that, at the same time that they were incapable of doing hurt themselves, they might serve as hostages for the obedience of those they left at home. He was misled in this by that constant submission which he saw paid to his orders in the court, and he vainly fancied that he was to be implicitly obeyed where-ever his orders reached: himself and his master felt the contrary ⁱ.

WE are, in the succeeding section, to explain the motives and management of the revolution in Portugal; and therefore we shall content ourselves with observing here some other Revolution of Portugal, through the instances of the pains taken by the conde duke to facilitate the ascent of the duke of Braganza to the throne, while he was so infatuated to believe that he should allure that prince to Madrid, where, if he had once arrived, he had never been permitted to return to Portugal. In order to take away all grounds of suspicion, Olivares had declared the duke general of the forces in Portugal, and had weakened most of the Spanish garrisons, that he might seem to repose all upon his loyalty; and yet, if he had visited any one fort upon the Tagus, he had been surprised, and sent prisoner into Spain. At the same time that he dissembled with the duke, he drove the rest of the nobility into despair, requiring of them what it was not in their power to perform, and threatening the severest chastisements if they refused to obey. The instruments upon which he relied were two natives of Portugal, mean in their birth, infamous in their characters, insolent to the last degree in their behaviour; one of these residing at Madrid with the title of secretary of state,; and the other, who had the minister's secret, resided as secretary to the vice-queen at Lisbon. The person honoured with this empty title was the infanta Donna Margaret of Savoy, duchess dowager of Mantua, and grand-daughter to Philip the second; a princess very capable of governing that kingdom, but whom, notwithstanding her birth, Olivares treated with contempt, and suffered to be still worse treated by the engine of his intrigues, her secretary. The nobility in general, seeing themselves condemned to exile and slavery, believed it impossible to escape the punishment of rebels, but by raising a rebellion: the weakness of the Spanish government persuaded them this was easy; the behaviour of the Catalans encouraged them; they wanted only a proper head, and the duke of Braganza, who had a fair title to the crown, was continually in their sight. They made him an offer of it, and, by the advice of his duchess, he accepted it. The design was managed with prudence, vigour, and secrecy, yet the vice-queen had some intelligence, or rather, some suspicion, of it; she gave advice to the conde duke, but her advices were neglected and despised. The confederates gained some lights in their turn, and this obliged them to act sooner than they intended, but with so much unanimity and courage, that Lisbon was surprised, Don Juan the fourth proclaimed, the vice-queen made prisoner, the fleet seized, the fortresses reduced, the Spaniards driven out, and a new government settled, in less than a month's time ^a (B).

A. D. 1641.

In Italy the affairs of Spain went backwards; the count de Harcourt and Monsieur de Turenne performed great things in Savoy, though they had but a small army. The marquis de Leganez did what he could, but that was little, being stinted in supplies, and suspected by his friends. The prince of Monaco whom the Spaniards had long treated as their slave, revolted, and put the place into the hands of the *French*¹. In Spain itself, where they had the war on both sides, the minister determined to push Catalonia, where the marquis de los Velez reduced Tarragona, and did all that could be expected towards taking Barcelona; but the terror, distress, and confusion of the Catalans, having obliged them to submit to cardinal Richlieu's terms, the French sent marshal de la Mothe Houdancourt, with more puissant supplies, and made also some diversions in their favour, so that by the end of the year the marquis was less able to complete the reduction of the province than he had been at the beginning. The projects of Olivares were always out of the common road. When he gave the king notice of the revolution in

(B) The grand source of that long train of grievances, which in the end produced the revolution of Portugal, was the disposition of the minister, who had conceived an aversion to the people, because they set up their privileges against his absolute orders, and, after having been courted by Philip the second, and flattered by Philip the third, did not consider it as an honour to be trampled on by the favourite of Philip the fourth (6). He thought it very practicable to break the spirits of these people, in order to fit them for that change he meditated, which was converting their kingdom into a province of Castile. He was encouraged in these notions by two of the most infamous men of that nation, into whose hands, and for this reason, he put the affairs of their country. The first was Diego Suarez, who resided at Madrid, and acted as secretary for the affairs of Portugal; he was a cunning, subtle, and artful fellow, who had amassed an immense fortune by his great interest with the minister, and the ill use he made of it. He was rapacious, vindictive, and insolent, in a supreme degree. The other was his brother and son-in-law, his name was Michael Vasconcellos, and the place he held that of secretary to the vice-queen at Lisbon, but in reality he had the sole direction of all things, corresponding with, and receiving directions immediately from the minister (7). He was very dextrous and adroit in the affairs committed to his management; he interfered in the disputes between the nobility, and, by browbeating some, and countenancing others, increased and inflamed them. He understood the dangerous science of inventing taxes, and had an army of mercenary creatures at his devotion to levy them: he had spies in all families of any distinction, and was never at a loss for expedients to answer any of the conde duke's purposes (8). In short, he daily inflicted wounds on the bosom of his country, and made a merit to his patron of that dejection and poverty which were the result of his own arts. These men had served him so long and so effectually, that the conde duke thought the Portuguese so exhausted, that he had nothing to apprehend from them; but experience taught him, that men dare to hope all things, when they have nothing to fear (9).

Portugal,

a Portugal, he wished him joy of the duke of Braganza's large forfeiture, as if it had been as easy to reduce Portugal as it had been to raise a rebellion there^m. Yet during this year he attempted little or nothing, only he appointed the duke of Medina Sidonia to command on the frontiers, whose sister the new king had married, which occasioned many speculations; but in truth he depended on a conspiracy which was very near succeeding. This being discovered, he threw some imputations upon the duke, and sent for him to court, where he justified himself so well as to escape punishment, though some have thought, that if the people of Andalusia had been as well disposed as himself, he would have attempted, with the assistance of the French fleet in the Mediterranean, to have established an independent sovereignty in that fair and fruitful province. But the most fatal event was in the Low Countries, where the cardinal infant recovered Aire, a place of great importance, with many circumstances of honour. Yet he did not live to take possession of the town; for, falling ill of a fever in the camp, and his distemper being mistaken by his physicians, upon his removal to Brussels it appeared to be the small-pox, of which he died on the 9th of November, in the thirty-second year of his ageⁿ. His character appears, from a medal struck in Holland, in the clearest light, the inscriptions of which were to this purpose; that, the Spanish sun being set, they promised to themselves a fair day^o. He was succeeded for the present by Don Francisco de Melo; and though, in hopes of some disturbance, Lewis the thirteenth appeared in person on the frontiers, yet nothing of that kind happened, and Don Francisco took possession of Aire on the seventh of December following^p.

c THIS series of ill fortune, which ought to have opened the eyes of the catholic king and his ministers, seemed to infatuate both. The great secret by which Olivares had governed his master was being the companion, or at least the confidant, of his pleasures; and, while he affected to deceive the world with a specious appearance of religion and piety, he was not only immersed in vice himself, but encouraged and promoted it in his prince, to the scandal of his subjects, and the prejudice of his affairs. At this time, of all others the most improper, Olivares produced a bastard of his, hitherto called Julian, of whom he had taken so little care, that, not able to subsist in Spain, he had passed over to the Indies, where, in very mean stations, he had scarce got bread, on whom he now bestowed the name of Don Henrico de Guzman, and, bringing him with great pomp and splendor to court, either flattered or forced the constable of Castile to give him his daughter, in consideration of which he was to devolve upon him his duchy of St. Lucar^q. In the beginning of his administration, by some accident or other, he presented to the king a memorial, in relation to an affair, upon which his majesty had already received one from Don Balthasar de Zuniga; upon comparing them, they contradicted each other flatly. The king ordered a person of great quality to inquire thoroughly into this business, in consequence of which Don Balthasar's memorial appeared to be the truth, and that of Olivares the reverse of it. The king, upon this, was very angry; but the count regained his favour, by procuring for him the fair actress Calderona. By this woman he had a son, of whom no great notice was taken; but now, to obscure the folly of the conde duke, this youth, scarce in the 14th year of his age, was produced, with the title of Don Juan of Austria, and declared generalissimo of the army against Portugal, while the heir apparent to the crown, Don Balthasar, was left under the tuition, or rather in the custody, of the countess of Olivares, at which the queen was chagrined, the people enraged, and the world in general astonished^r.

f IN Italy the fear of Spain was wore away, and the profound respect that had been paid to her began to follow it. Things would even have proceeded farther, if the growing power of France had not engaged the prudent politician, for which that country was always famous, to prop that structure which they might easily have pulled down. King Philip was resolved to go in person against the Catalans; the conde duke dissuaded, but was not able to prevent it; however, the king went no farther than Saragossa, and that with such numerous attendance, and with so great an expence, that, instead of hastening, it retarded the campaign^s. The conde duke attended, and provided all possible amusements and diversions in the course of the journey, which, however, proved none of the most pleasant. Cardinal Richieu had brought the king his master from Paris with a numerous army under the command of the marshal la Meilleraie; but whether with an intent to pass into Italy, or the frontiers of Spain, was not known. At length the storm burst upon Roussillon, where the army attacked Coliva, in order to open a passage to the siege of Perpignan. Olivares understanding that it was ill provided, ordered it to be relieved by a body of three thousand horse. Persons who were well versed in military affairs, assured him the thing was impracticable; he heard them, and repeated his orders. The forwardness always shewn to fulfil the desires of a powerful favourite, engaged many officers, and some persons of distinction, to offer themselves as volunteers, though they knew the expedition was exceedingly hazardous, as they were to march amongst high mountains, and to traverse a part of Catalonia then in open rebellion. They did, however, all that was to be done; they attempted it, and, being entangled in an impassable country, from which the peasants had conveyed every thing that was eatable, with enemies on every side, without having the power either of fighting or flying, they were obliged to deliver up their arms, their colours, and horses, and to render themselves prisoners of war, to prevent being starved¹. Coliva taken, Perpignan was invested, in which the governor, the marquis Flores d'Avila, made a long, a gallant, and prudent defence; but it was to little purpose, for tho' the minister spared not either for treasure or trouble, he was not able to assemble an army till the place was lost². These strokes of ill fortune were doubled by his preventing any advantage from being made of great and unexpected success. The French, who had not then so great armies as they have had since, in order to strengthen that which went with the king, had left only two small corps of troops on the frontiers, towards the Low Countries, the one commanded by the count de Harcourt, and the other by the count de Guiche. Don Francisco de Mello, a very prudent man, and a good officer, had assembled an army of twenty-five thousand men, with which he recovered several places; and then, dividing it, pretended to make two inroads into France, but suddenly uniting his troops again, fell upon the count de Guiche so unexpectedly, that, having routed him totally, he opened a clear passage to Paris; but, receiving positive orders from Olivares not to hazard his army in any undertaking of danger or difficulty, the opportunity was lost³. The reason of this order was, that Olivares had concluded a new treaty with Caston duke of Orleans, and was in the secret of a deep contrivance against the cardinal's life. Those who were embarked in it were the king's favourites, who carried their point so far, that the cardinal was disgraced, and was forced in a manner to fly, though in a dying condition⁴. In this critical conjuncture came the news of Guiche's defeat, and the danger of Paris; which so alarmed the king, that he followed the cardinal, who in the mean time had discovered his brother's treaty with Spain. Upon this, de Thou and Cinquemars were arrested, the duke of Orleans forbidden the king's presence, and the cardinal taken into higher favour than ever⁵. These advices following that of the loss of Perpignan, disconcerted Olivares so much, that, embracing the king's knees, and falling at his feet, he besought his leave to retire, to give him some command where he might have an opportunity of losing his life, with other incoherent speeches, which scarce, with the strongest assurances, and fairest promises, Philip could pacify, who, when he learned the reason of these transports, joined in deploring their common misfortune, and the lamentable disaster of being undone by their own arts; for if either the money spent in the secret treaty had been employed against the Catalans, or Don Francisco de Mello had not been restrained, this campaign had ended much otherwise than it did⁶.

Disgraced by the queen, the emperor, the grandees, and people, declaring at once.

At the king's return to Madrid, it was discerned that his affection was not so strong as formerly to Olivares, either wearied with ill fortune, alarmed with what he had seen and heard in his progress, or touched with the thinness of his court, from which almost all the grandees retired, and the silence of the people when he appeared in public. The queen, perceiving this alteration, declared her sentiments first, ascribing all the mischiefs that had happened to the refined and romantic politics of Olivares, to whom she likewise imputed some private discontents of her own. The ice being broke, the marquis de Grana presented the king with a letter from the emperor his master, who charged the conde duke with abasing the glory of the house of Austria by his ill conduct and intrigues. When the king began to stagger, the queen presented the infanta Donna Margaret of Savoy, whom she had sent for privately from the place where Olivares had banished her; and, as if this had not been enough, the king's nurse, who had felt the minister's displeasure, was likewise brought to court, who, falling at Philip's feet as he passed from one apartment to another, with tears streaming from her eyes, in her plain and artless language represented the miseries of his subjects in so pathetic a manner, that the king was very much moved. He took advantage, therefore, of a hunting-match, and, before his departure, sent a billet to the minister, by which he directed him to retire to *Loches*⁷. The conde duke obeyed, and was forced to disguise himself, to avoid the insolence of the populace, or perhaps something worse. He seemed to bear his disgrace steadily, and some have thought that he might have surmounted it; for the king, being new in business, and having to do with ministers as new as himself, was quickly disgusted, and seemed to wish for his old minister again. But the conde duke, ever able and ever unfortu-

a nate, drew up an apology for himself, full of wit and spirit, and masterly reasoning, as in truth his politics look best upon paper, in which some maxims were acknowledged which should have been concealed, some things avowed that could not have been proved, and various persons treated in such a manner, that so loud and general a clamour was excited, as not only obliged the king to lay aside his former design, but induced him likewise to banish him to Toro^b. The Catalans having received marshal de la Mothe, in the quality of viceroy of France, gained some advantages; the Portuguese were successful by sea; and Don Francisco de Mello was beat at Rocroi by the duke of Enguien, then but a boy, styled afterwards the great Conde, on the 5th day of Lewis XIV.'s reign; so that, notwithstanding the return of the grandees to court, and the offers received of men and money from various provinces, his catholic majesty remained still uneasy and perplexed, sensible of the great burden that lay upon his shoulders, and at a loss on whom to deposit a load which he was every day more and more convinced was altogether insupportable^c.

THE disasters of the next year did not by any means contribute to reconcile the king to business. In Italy, where the house of Austria had been lately predominant, they were excluded from having so much as a share in the negotiations for reconciling the duke of Parma to the pope, the treaty being concluded by the guaranty and under the mediation of France, and the military operations in Savoy went as untowardly as these negotiations^d. In Germany the imperialists were every-where beaten, and lost several very considerable places. In the Low Countries the French became masters of Gravelin, and the Dutch of Sas van Ghent^e. In Catalonia the Spanish army prospered, and, after succouring Tarragona and Lerida, was reduced. But, on the side of Portugal, the marquis of Torrecusa was routed at Badajoz by the duke of Albuquerque, with great loss; and the Spanish fleet was likewise beat in fight of Carthagena by the marshal de Brezé^f. Yet what afflicted the Spaniards more than all these losses, was the death of the queen, on the sixth of October, in the flower of her age, and when she was become infinitely beloved by the people. She had gained intirely the confidence of the king her husband, who, after her decease, committed the management of public affairs to Don Lewis Haro de Guzman, nephew to the conde duke de Olivares, and yet no way attached to him, and who, after his elevation, pursued quite different measures^g. He is generally allowed to have had less abilities, but withal was less assuming, of a pacific temper, whose affability, if it did not render him more respected, at least made him more beloved.

THE war still continuing on all sides, served to increase the miseries of the nation, and the perplexity of the king and his ministers. On the side of the Milanese something might have been done against Savoy, where the French were embarrassed with a very troublesome treaty; but the marquis de Serra, who commanded for the Spaniards, wanted men, money, and allies; for the Italian princes, seeing the two crowns wasting their wealth and strength, without any prejudice to them, scarce assisted either party, or took any great pains in adjusting disputes^h. However, prince Thomas of Savoy, who had now declared for France, laboured hard in procuring a force that might be able to make a figure the next year; and it may be would have done this with more vivacity, if the French had not sent an officer of note to command under him. In Germany, the house of Austria met with many disadvantages; in the Low Countries, they had the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange at once to deal with: the former took Mardyke, and some other places; the latter besieged Hulst, which was well defended; and, while he remained before it, the Spaniards recovered most of the places which had been taken by the Frenchⁱ. On the side of Portugal, the marquis de Leganez commanded the Spanish army, but did nothing of importance the whole campaign. In Catalonia, the count de Harcourt came to Barcelona, and was received as viceroy from the French king; the marquis du Pressis Praslin took Roses, and, being made marshal of France, was sent to assist prince Thomas of Savoy^k. The Spanish army was commanded by Don Andrea Cantelmo, who was very inactive during the summer; for it seems the Spanish ministry depended upon a conspiracy formed in Barcelona, where an insurrection was to have been favoured by the appearance of their fleet, and to have been supported by the sudden march of the army. It was discovered just at the point of execution, which cost the lives of some of the lay conspirators, and the perpetual imprisonment of the ecclesiastics, that were concerned in it^l. The count de Harcourt attacked Don Andrea on the banks of the Tegro, and,

The conde duke de Olivares, worn out by his infirmities, or rather devoured by his despair, died in the place of his banishment, at a juncture when, in the opinion of many, if restored to his power, things might have gone better; which notion proceeded, it may be, from a certainty that things could not go worse^m.

WHEN things were in so strange a situation, we may excuse the Spanish ministers for recurring to the old practice of attempting to facilitate by intrigues what they were not able to accomplish by force. The then pope Innocent X. was inclined to their interests: they had some partisans in Holland, and in France they touched every string. They laboured to excite divisions in the French councils; they proposed a separate peace to the United Provinces; nay, they went so far as to offer their mediation to the queen of France, professing that his catholic majesty would be content to make her the supreme judge between her brother and her son; but it was in vain; so that the war continued on every sideⁿ. As cardinal Mazarine was desirous of making a figure in Italy, prince Thomas of Savoy, and the marshal du Plessis Praslin, besieged Orbitello, and, to assist in taking it, the French fleet sailed under the command of the duke de Brezé. The place was in a bad condition; it could only be relieved from Naples; and a body of troops advanced from thence, but it was so small a body that they could do nothing. In the mean time the Spanish fleet, commanded by admiral Pimentel, appeared; the French engaged and beat them, but, towards the end of the action, the duke de Brezé had his head carried away by a cannon-ball. His vice-admiral, for some political reasons, returned as soon as possible to France^o. This happened on the 14th of June; and admiral Pimentel, taking advantage of his absence, landed a body of troops, which, being joined to those of Naples, forced prince Thomas to raise the siege; upon which he fell into disgrace with the court of France: and another fleet of theirs, arriving on the coast of Elba, took several places^p. In the Low Countries, the French and Dutch took several fortresses, though the Spanish army was commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine, Picolomini, and other great officers, who, for want of troops, were able to do little, except discovering their abilities, by obliging the enemy to pay dear for what they obtained. On the side of Portugal there happened nothing of consequence; and yet the campaign did not pass without bloodshed on both parts^q. In Catalonia things took another turn; the marquis de Leganez commanded for his catholic majesty, with an army not numerous enough to act offensively. The viceroy monsieur de Harcourt besieged Lerida, which had no great garrison, and was not in a very good condition. The governor had the address to make the besiegers believe that his state was worse than it really was; and, under persuasion that famine would oblige him to surrender, they did not press the siege so vigorously as they might have done. The marquis de Leganez, who knew exactly how things stood, caused a great convoy to be provided, and, when it was near ready, advanced towards Lerida, as if he meant to relieve the place. After lying some time within sight of the French army, he decamped, as if he had abandoned his design, and having retired to the same distance from Lerida that the place was at on the other side, through which the convoy was to proceed, he marched directly back again, and appearing very unexpectedly on one side of the French camp, in order of battle, while the count de Harcourt prepared with some hurry to receive him, the convoy, with a strong reinforcement, entered safely on the other side; upon which he was obliged to raise the siege, which chagrined him so much that he quitted the command. This small piece of good fortune was far from consoleing the court of Madrid for the loss of the prince Don Baltasar, who died on the ninth of October, to the great grief of the Spanish nation, who flattered themselves with a change of fortune under his reign^r.

AFFAIRS in Italy had a melancholy aspect at the beginning of the year, when the duke of Modena, with the title of generalissimo, and having two good French officers under him, invested Cremona; but, misunderstandings arising amongst these chiefs, the enterprize failed, and the duke returned into his own dominions^s. The unexpected and unexampled revolution at Naples, stiled commonly the rebellion of Massaniello, threw all things once more into confusion; more especially after the duke of Guise had entered that city, and taught sedition to wear the appearance of a regular government^t. Don Juan of Austria, declared general by sea, came and blocked up the place with a fleet; notwithstanding which the inhabitants remained in arms, and, if France had succoured the duke of Guise, Naples might have been gained for her, or at least had been lost to Spain. In the Low Countries, the Dutch statesmen were prevailed upon, in the beginning of the year, to sign a provisional treaty with Spain, till that of peace could be intirely adjusted. The archduke Leopold William was declared a governor of the Spanish Low Countries, with the same extensive powers that the archduke Albert and the cardinal infant had enjoyed. He brought with him a reinforcement of troops from the emperor, conducted the war with prudence and valour, and with some degree also of success, which was principally owing to his being earlier in the field than the French; a circumstance not very common with the Spanish armies ^u. The campaign on the side of Portugal afforded no event worth mentioning, only a base design that some of the Spanish ministers entered into, for assassinating the king Don Juan, was discovered and punished ^v. In Catalonia the marquis of Aitona commanded for his catholic majesty, and the young prince of Conde, already famous for many victories, succeeded the count de Harcourt as viceroy of Catalonia. He resolved to distinguish his entrance on the administration, by reducing Lerida, in which his predecessor had failed. He found the lines of the count de Harcourt so little injured, that they were repaired, and the place invested in two days; after which, in a fit of gaiety, he caused the trenches to be opened with a concert of violins. The old governor Don Antonio Brito, a Portuguese by birth, and well supplied with every thing, had a garrison of 3000 men. His conduct was the very reverse of what it had been before, harrassing the enemy with continual sallies, and disputing with obstinacy every inch of ground. The French ascribed this to their being sensible that they made their attack in the right place, and that he would be obliged to surrender as soon as they were masters of the outworks. In the midst of these expectations, the engineers found their trenches stopped by a rock: it was impossible to go on, it was too late to begin again, the army was diminished, the heats were coming on, the Spanish general advanced to its relief, and the prince of Conde was obliged to raise the siege ^x. The rest of the campaign was spent in marches and countermarches; so that there happened nothing of importance, his catholic majesty having expressly commanded the marquis de Aitona not to risk any thing against the prince, of whose good fortune he is said to have been afraid. The French fleet, however, had some success at sea, the Spaniards having the best part of their naval force on the coasts of the kingdom of Naples ^y.

AFTER having wasted for so many years both troops and treasure, the two crowns found themselves almost equally exhausted in Italy. The marquis de Carracena, who commanded for the catholic king in the Milanese, had, however, the superiority this spring, and seemed disposed to make a right use of it, by attacking the French troops under the marquis de Navailles, who were but very unhappily posted. As he executed this resolution slowly, the mar- A conspiracy discovered, intended to bring about a marriage between the infanta and the prince of Brazil.
shal du Plessis Praslin had time to join him, and the duke of Modena then arriving in their camp, they resolved to attack the marquis, though he was strongly intrenched under the cannon of Cremona, in which they were successful; but forming the siege of that city in the midst of summer, it held out to October, and their army being by that time ruined, they were forced to raise it ^z. In Naples, the duke of Guise was taken prisoner, and an end put to that rebellion by Don Juan of Austria ^a. In the Low Countries, the archduke had the satisfaction of seeing the peace signed between Spain and the United Provinces, on the 30th day of January, in spite of the opposition of the young prince of Orange, and against the will of the French ^b, who, having withdrawn the prince of Conde from Catalonia, sent him to open the campaign on this side, in which, at the beginning, he had no great success, the archduke taking Courtray by a short siege, and Lens by assault; immediately after which the prince attacked and defeated the Spanish army, with the loss of 8000 men, notwithstanding the most obstinate resistance, and the archduke's giving all possible testimonies of courage and conduct. There happened also in the course of this campaign some little misfortunes on this side, which the archduke studied to repair. In Spain the people were afflicted both with a plague and famine. There was but little done on the side of Portugal, and that not to the advantage of king Philip. Marshal Schomberg, who replaced the prince of Conde in Catalonia, attacked Tortosa, and took it by storm. It was very indifferently provided, and worse fortified; but it was very gallantly defended, the bishop and the best part of his clergy being killed in the breach. The Spanish army being reinforced soon after, hindered any greater progress being made. The king, being pressed by his subjects to a second marriage, resolved to espouse the archduchess Mary Anne, daughter to the emperor by the infanta Donna Maria, and consequently his own niece ^c. Before we close the history of this year, it will be requisite to say something of the true reason which induced the king to resolve upon a second marriage. As the intrigues, supported by money from the ministers, maintained a Spanish party at Lisbon, so there wanted not a Portuguese faction amongst the nobility of Spain, who, in their own sentiments at least, acted intirely from public spirit. Of these the chief was the duke of Medina Sidonia, brother to the queen of Portugal, who had spoke so advantageously of his nephew Don Theodosius de Braganza, prince of Brazil, that some, who were very desirous of seeing Portugal once more united to the territories of Castile, had begun to figure to themselves that the thing was not at all impossible, if a marriage could be brought about between this amiable prince and the infant Maria Teresa, now the presumptive heir of the Spanish monarchy. As this was a project that never could be rendered so much as communicable, much less acceptable, to Philip IV. they were driven into consultations and practices, criminal in appearance at least, if not in their nature, and as such are seldom long concealed, the king and his ministers obtained such informations, that the principal persons embarked in this design were seized. The duke de Medina Sidonia is said to have preserved his life by discovering all who were engaged with him. The duke de Híjar, of the house of Silva, and, by his mother's side, of the royal family of Arragon, was put to the question ordinary and extraordinary, which he bore with patience and with silence, but perished nevertheless by a long and severe imprisonment. The marquis de Ayamonte, Don Carlos de Padilla, and some other persons of distinction, paid with their heads for this irregular instance of their zeal for the tranquillity and welfare of their country, and taught the king how much it imported him to have issue male, to prevent his dominions from falling into some other house; the fear of which continued to embitter the remaining part of his life, even when the contingency seemed to be no longer probable ^d.

THE peace of Münster, which, after so many years of war, had restored quiet to the empire, served only to augment the chagrin of the court of Madrid, where the terms on which France would have concluded peace were rejected, and all the share that Spain took, after so long a negotiation in that transaction, was insisting upon her protest. The principal motive to this conduct was that confusion to which France has been ever liable under a minority, and where, at this time, the malecontents were able to cover their designs with the specious pretence that the queen regent was a Spaniard, and the cardinal minister an Italian. But these strangers had the interest of France so much at heart, that the Spaniards chose rather to treat with the parliament of Paris, by which they exceedingly embarrassed the court, where, notwithstanding all their victories, they found it extremely difficult to form and maintain an army; and, when this was done, they were again embarrassed to find a general. The archduke Leopold William gave out that it was in his power to make considerable conquests in France; and, to render this probable, he ravaged it; which, in truth, was all that he had in his power. However, he recovered Ipres and St. Venant by the 10th of May; but at last the French army appeared under the count de Harcourt, who invested Cambray, and having intercepted a letter from the archduke to the governor, promising relief by a day fixed, he caused it to be published, as the shortest way to prevent it; notwithstanding which, the archduke presented himself before the place, performed what he had promised, and forced the French to raise the siege; after which they took Conde, but were forced to abandon it again almost as soon as it was taken ^e. In Italy, the Spaniards compelled the duke of Modena to change sides; for France could do nothing in Catalonia. Don Juan de Guaras, who commanded the troops of his catholic majesty, took several places in the neighbourhood of Barcelona, and would probably also have become master of that capital, if marshal de Marfin had not brought into it a French garrison, which prevented any commotion, and thereby saved the place, till France should be in a condition to do more. On the 3d of September, prince Edward of Portugal, brother to the king, ended his days miserably in the castle of Milan, where he was kept prisoner by the Spaniards, for no other crime than that of his birth, unless we should add his having qualities equal, and a spirit even superior, to it. In the month of October arrived the new queen of Spain, to whom the king had been married by proxy. The contagious distemper, with which the kingdom had been afflicted, ceased in the winter ^f.

THE dissensions that raged in France afforded king Philip and his ministers all the advantages they could desire in all the countries where the war was carried on. In Italy, Don Juan of Austria took Piombino by assault, and afterwards besieged Porto Longone, into which, in spite of all the opposition given him by the Spanish fleet, the chevalier de St. Paul threw supplies; which, however, did not hinder the place from being reduced ^h. On the side of Portugal there passed as usual but little of importance; and, as some say, time has discovered that Don Juan had a secret correspondence with some of the Spanish ministers, which occasioned that inactivity, favourable to him in some respects, upon the whole perhaps necessary, but which at the time was far from being acceptable to his subjects. The reception of prince Maurice and prince Rupert in Portugal induced king Philip not only to acknowledge, but to make court to, the new government in England, in order to engage them to send an English fleet against the Portuguese; which they did; and, in process of time, Philip was severely chastised by that very power which he now flattered. In Catalonia, affairs took a strange turn: the French general Marfin was but weak, and therefore could not hinder the retaking of some places of no importance; but, being a creature of the prince of Conde's, he no sooner heard of his imprisonment than he began to promote what was not in his power to prevent ⁱ. - a. Catalans, finding themselves pushed by their old masters, and betrayed by their new ones, entered into a variety of intrigues, as their interests, their inclinations, or their necessities, directed. By these means the Spaniards recovered Flix upon the Segro, Tortosa, and some other places, and very probably had recovered the whole province, if, in this critical conjuncture, the kingdom of Valentia had not revolted, which obliged the Spanish ministers to turn their eyes on that side, where, not without difficulty, things were appeased^k. The duke de Mercœur, arriving at Barcelona with the title of viceroy, secured that city, after having caused Marfin to be arrested, and sent prisoner to Perpignan; notwithstanding which, the Spaniards, being masters of the whole plain of Urgel, most of the Catalan chiefs, who had been faithful to the French, thought it prudent to retire into Roussillon; by which, as it was extremely natural, their party was exceedingly discouraged^l.

We deferred speaking of the affairs on the side of Flanders, because they require somewhat more room. The archduke Leopold William saw, with some surprise, an intire change in the affairs of France, his old friends closing with the court, and the duke of Orleans concurring in the measure of arresting the princes of Conde and Conti, and the duke of Longueville. This did not at all trouble him, since the new malecontents threw themselves immediately into the arms of Spain; and, in consequence of a new treaty, concluded between madame de Longueville and the archduke, the famous viscount de Turenne (for he was already famous) joined the archduke as soon as he took the field, and, after reducing Aubenton and Irson, took Capellet on the 15th of June; notwithstanding which, the archduke was obliged by the marshal du Plessis Praslin to raise the siege of Guise, on the first of July. His army, however, being reinforced, took Capelle on the 3d of August; after which the viscount de Turenne sent a strong detachment to deliver the princes out of the castle of Vincennes, which was prevented by transferring them to Marcouffi. The archduke, however, made himself master of Monson, after a vigorous defence; and, under colour of having full powers from Spain, set on foot a new treaty, as dangerous to the court as his victories. At length the marshal du Plessis Praslin having retaken Reikel, the archduke and the viscount Turenne gave him battle on the 15th of December, and were beat with great loss: in this engagement Turenne very narrowly escaped being killed or taken, which put an end to the campaign, but not to the intrigues on this side^m.

The viscount de Turenne enters into their service, and is beat by marshal du Plessis Praslin.

A. D. 1651.

- d As the confusions in France were at the greatest height, their finances exhausted, the persons of the king and his mother scarce in safety, and their minister on the point of seeking shelter in Germany, we cannot have a more convincing proof of the weakness of Spain than arises from the small advantages she was able to make from circumstances so much in her favour. We cannot charge this with justice either on the ministers or the generals she employed; for they were certainly able men, and indefatigable in their endeavours; but the length of the war, the great distance of the different scenes of action, and, above all, the prodigious sums that were given from time to time to the French malecontents, were such as could not be supplied without impoverishing the people, who were at the same time consumed by pestilence and famine. On the whole, therefore, king Philip and his ministers knew not how to act, even in places where they were sure of meeting with little or no resistance. In Italy, to save expences, and to prevent jealousies, they withdrew their forces out of Piedmont, and contented themselves with securing the Milanese. On the side of Portugal they were able to do nothing; on the contrary, their forces were so weak, that they might have suffered extremely, if they had not had two things in their favour; first, that their frontiers were so ruined that the enemy had nothing either to tempt or to subsist them; and next, that the Portuguese were in a worse state than themselves. In Catalonia, they exerted themselves under the command of the marquis de Mortara, and with success in the spring: in the autumn, the count de Marfin, who was again at the head of the French troops, marched away with the whole army to join the prince of Conde in Guienne, leaving the Catalans to defend themselves as well as they couldⁿ. Upon this, Don Juan of Austria, recalled from Italy, on purpose to command on that side, formed the siege of Barcelona. In the Low Countries, through which cardinal Mazarine passed in his way to Cologne, the archduke, with the assistance of his great minister the count de Fuensaldagna, proposed some great exploits; which, however, in spite of all their efforts, produced only the conquest of Furnes, St. Winoc, and some other little places, which opened a passage to the reduction of Dunkirk, the siege of which the advance of the season would not permit them to undertake. To all their other cares the Spanish ministry had now added a new scene of war in the very heart of France, in consequence of a treaty made between his catholic majesty and the prince of Conde, to whose assistance a squadron of seventeen large vessels, filled with troops, stores, and money, was sent from St. Sebastian to Bordeaux. King Philip, however, had the consolation of seeing his young queen brought to bed, on the 12th of July, of the infanta Donna Maria Margareta, who became afterwards the consort of the emperor Leopold, and the grandmother of the reigning empress queen^a.

Vast advantages that accrued to that nation from those intrigues and discontents. It is generally allowed, that Don Lewis de Haro was much inferior, as a politician, to his uncle the conde duke; but it is certain that he managed his intrigues with greater success, and drew much higher advantages from the troubles he fomented in France. In Italy, some impression was made by the marquis de Carracena upon Piedmont; and Cazal, which Olivares could never get into his hands, was surrendered, the town through treachery, the citadel from famine, to the Spaniards, who restored it immediately to the duke of Mantua, upon his promise to preserve it by a garrison of his own troops only^p. On the side of Bordeaux, the prince of Conde received all the succours that were in their power to give, and when he traversed the kingdom, to throw himself into Paris, they furnished the expence, and received him with open arms, when resentment, and the want of any other resource, compelled him to seek shelter in their armies. They had, to say the truth, great reason; for Gravelines had surrendered to the archduke, after sixty-nine days siege; other places of less consequence were taken with less trouble; but, even in the midst of their confusion, the French did all that was in their power to save Dunkirk, in which there was a good garrison, commanded by the count d'Estades^q. The duke de Vendosme was sent with a good fleet to relieve it; but the English met with them in their passage, and, except three ships that escaped to Flushing, took them all, under colour of reprisals. This was the only service king Philip received from the parliament, in return for the extraordinary step he had taken in their favour, or, which is more probable, because it was believed to be rather the interest of England to have Dunkirk in the hands of Spain than of France. However that might be, the place was surrendered on the 16th of September, after a siege of thirty-nine days^r. The prince of Conde, having joined the Spanish army, took, though it was late in the season, Rethel and St. Meneboüde; but the design he had of giving their forces winter-quarters in France was prevented by Turenne. The campaign, however, was very fortunate, and the recovery of so many and so important places did no small honour to the archduke^s.

Barcelona surrendered to Don Juan of Austria, and the greatest part of Catalonia recovered.

THE Spaniards did little this year against the Portuguese; and the king of Portugal, according to his old maxim, persisted in putting his kingdom into a good state of defence, in every respect, rather than run any unnecessary hazards for the present^t. In Catalonia, Don Juan of Austria besieged Barcelona with a small army, and kept it blocked up by a squadron of galleys at sea. The French marshal la Mothe penetrated through his quarters with a reinforcement of between six and seven hundred men, which raised the spirits of the besieged for the present; but increased the scarcity of provisions. The French fleet attempted its relief without success; and at length, after a siege of fifteen months, Barcelona surrendered; on the 11th of October, the French garrison having good terms given them, and the inhabitants, who really compelled the surrender, had a general pardon, and their privileges secured. The whole country; except Roses, followed the fate of the capital^u. His catholic majesty held an assembly of the military orders, and afterwards of the states of the kingdom, at Madrid, in which some necessary resolutions were taken, and some good laws were made^v. His ministers also took care to circulate in France their manifestoes, in his catholic majesty's name, setting forth his earnest desire of peace, his abhorrence of contributing in any manner to the disturbance of his neighbours, and the purity of his intention of supporting the princes of France against the open violences and secret artifices of an Italian politician, who, to maintain his own greatness, and to promote his private views, trampled upon the laws of France, and kept her involved in war with her neighbours^w.

THE marquis de Carracena had some advantages in the beginning of the year, which, however, did not hinder him from consenting to a short cessation of arms; a circumstance that was highly advantageous to the French, who sent the marquis du Plessis Belliere, with a small corps of troops to secure Piedmont, and to harass the Spaniards. The marquis de Carracena, with superior forces, brought him to a battle, on the banks of the Roquette, where both sides claimed the victory; but the marquis being wounded, and able to make no progress during the rest of the year, we may venture to affirm his claim was not extremely well founded^x. In Guienne, the prince of Conde's faction began to crumble to nothing; and tho' the Spaniards had a garrison in Bourg, the French sent a squadron to Bordeaux, by which the place was blocked up at sea. The marshal Marfin, who commanded for the prince in those parts, was able to do nothing of consequence; and at length the duke of Vendosme appearing with a superior naval force, the Spaniards were constrained to retire. Bourg, in which they had a garrison, was taken, and the people of Bordeaux made their peace upon the best terms they could^y. In the Low Countries, this campaign was by no means so favourable as that of the preceding a year. The prince of Conde did indeed make himself master of Rocroy, and some other places ; but monsieur de Turenne prevented him from doing any thing of consequence ; and the count de Fuensaldagna having hindered him from fighting, because he thought the risque too great, produced a difference between them that could never be composed ; more especially after the archduke Leopold arrived in the army, where, by the express directions of the court of Madrid, he was constrained to treat the prince as his equal, and be content at last to act upon the defensive, the young king Lewis XIV. coming in person to encourage his troops, and bringing with him such supplies as rendered them superior in every respect ^a ; which the vicinity of his dominions, in comparison of those of Spain, made the thing extremely easy.

There passed little of consequence between the Spaniards and Portuguese, and, in the few skirmishes that did happen, the advantage was, generally speaking, on the side of the latter. In Catalonia, the Spaniards, having for some time blocked up Roses, proposed to besiege it ; but their army being very weak, the French, who were also far from being numerous, compelled them to retire. This success engaged the marshal de Hocquincourt to penetrate through Roussillon into Catalonia, where he laid siege to Gironne on the 27th of July. He remained before it two months, when the place, being reduced to the last extremity, was relieved by Don Juan of Austria, who forced one of the quarters of the French camp, and compelled the marshal to retire into Roussillon with great precipitation ; but, notwithstanding this advantage, Don Juan was forced to do the very same thing before Roses, partly through the rigour of the season, and partly thro' the eagerness of the French marshal to recover his reputation, and to keep such of the Catalans as were still inclined to France from falling into absolute despair ^b. In both the vigilance and vigour he shewed on this occasion answered perfectly his intent.

The court of Madrid, at the request of the prince of Conde, had released from his imprisonment the duke of Guise, who gave them so much trouble at Naples, and he made them very magnificent promises in return ^c. He went into France, and, during these troublesome times, behaved himself so much to the satisfaction of the court, that he was promised the command of a fleet for the execution of a certain secret expedition of his own contriving. This provoked the Spanish ministers, but the duke was out of their reach ; and this, it is thought, made them treat another prince more severely that was in it. Charles duke of Lorraine had a strong affection for the house of Austria, which induced the French to deprive him of his dominions. He retained however a considerable corps of troops, with whom he served the crown of Spain, but in so capricious a manner, and with such an apparent jealousy of the prince of Conde, that his catholic majesty's orders were transmitted to the Low Countries to put him under arrest. He was enterprising, and yet suspicious and cautious ; however, ways and means were found to deceive him, and to separate his troops ; after which he was arrested, and sent prisoner to Brussels, transferred from thence to Dunkirk, afterwards conveyed to Spain, and confined in the castle of Toledo, till, upon the treaty of the Pyrenees, he was set at liberty ^d. The archduke, who would take no share in this business, was obliged to lend his name to a manifesto published in vindication of it. Prince Francis of Lorraine took the command of his brother's troops, and continued in his catholic majesty's service. The archduke accompanied, or rather directed, by the prince of Conde, very early this year, and unexpectedly, besieged Arras, while the French besieged Stenai. However, monsieur Turenne forced the Spanish camp before Arras, and obliged the archduke and the prince to raise the siege on the 25th of August ; notwithstanding which, the Spaniards reduced several places this year, and still kept up a very troublesome party in France ^e. All the respect, however, that could be paid to the prince of Conde was far from giving him content : he complained that the Spanish troops were not complete ; that the sums assigned for their pay were too little, and those not punctually issued ; that they had not the necessary trains of artillery ; that ammunition was frequently wanted, and most of their fortresses poorly garrisoned, and out of repair. They answered with fair promises ; but, as these were not kept, the prince began to grow weary of his situation, more especially when he found that Cromwell was negotiating with France, from whence he foresaw that the Spaniards would feel many inconveniences ; and be gradually less able to support him and his designs, which induced him to think of making his peace at home ; of which the Spaniards having some intimation, it augmented their jealousy, and contributed not a little to embarrass and perplex their affairs ^f.

The Portuguese this year took and plundered the town of Oliva, and broke the agreement that had subsisted for some time with the Spanish generals, of not disturbing the country-people on either side ; which induced, or rather compelled, the latter to make incursions likewise : notwithstanding which there happened little of moment. Don Juan of Austria was not able to do any great matter on the side of Roussillon, where the prince of Conti commanded. But the attempt made by the duke of Guise with a fleet to reduce Naples, proved altogether ineffectual, Affairs in Spain in a very declining condition, which disposes the court to peace.

and exposed both him and cardinal Mazarine to ridicule ^g. His catholic majesty caused his daughter the infanta to be acknowledged the heirs of all his dominions, and finished the fine chapel at the Escorial at a vast expence, notwithstanding the affairs of his government suffered every-where for want of money, most of his revenues being anticipated, and his subjects every where in a manner exhausted; so that peace became every day more necessary, and at the same time seemed to be farther off than ever ^h. Endeavours were used to set on foot a negotiation by the pope's mediation, which was very coldly received in France.

In Italy, as there was little done the last year, the marquis de Carracena had taken the necessary precautions to be in a condition to act with greater vigour at the entrance of this. He had intelligence of the duke of Modena's having entered into a treaty with France, and of his concluding a marriage for his eldest son with the niece of cardinal Mazarine; upon which ^b he demanded one of the best places in his dominions, by way of security for his conduct, and advanced with all the forces he could draw together towards Reggio, where the duke then was; but the duke quickly found him other employment, by putting himself at the head of his forces, and marching directly towards Pavia, before which place arrived at the same time prince Thomas of Savoy, with the French troops, and the marquis de Villa, with those of Piedmont. The place was invested on the first of August; but the governor count Trotti, having a good garrison, made so gallant a defence, that he gave the marquis de Carracena time to expect reinforcements from Naples and from Germany, and with their help he obliged the allies to raise the siege. The duke of Modena, however, retired to Casal; and so low was the credit of the Spaniards fallen in Italy, that, notwithstanding this advantage, the duke of Mantua declared for the French, and actually went to Paris to settle the terms upon which he was to enjoy the protection of that court ⁱ. In the Low Countries, the archduke and the prince of Conde flattered themselves with great hopes; but when they came to take the field, they found themselves much disappointed; for monsieur Turenne besieged and took Landrecy, and afterwards Quenoi. The French king was himself in the field; and the superiority of his arms so great, that, notwithstanding all the opposition the archduke and the prince could give, without running the hazard of a battle, Conde and St. Guelan were added to his conquests ^k. In the winter the archduke received still greater mortifications. The court of Spain had concluded a new treaty with their prisoner the duke of Lorraine at Toledo, which was transmitted to the archduke, and both he and the prince of Conde flattered themselves, that, a new oath of fidelity being exacted from these troops, they might be safely employed in an enterprise which they had concerted. Duke Francis, however, having sent his second son, who was a child, to Breda, escaped with the eldest into the territories of France, and all the Lorraine troops, that had not deserted before, followed him thither, where they took an oath of fidelity to the French king, till their sovereign should be set at liberty ^l. At this very time, that is, in the beginning of November, it was known that the protector Cromwell, in spite of all that could be offered by ministers both from Madrid and Brussels, had concluded a treaty with France; with which unacceptable news the archduke acquainted the people of the Low Countries by a manifesto, and at the same time issued commissions to privateers ^m. These mortifications, added to those which he daily received from the count de Fuensaldagna, who had in reality the confidence of the Spanish court, engaged the archduke to press his catholic majesty so warmly for his leave to quit the Low Countries, where he was able to do so little for his majesty's service, and still less for his own reputation, that at length he obtained it, and an assurance that a successor should be sent him in the spring ⁿ; a measure by no means acceptable to the nobility or people in the Spanish provinces, where the archduke was generally and deservedly beloved.

THE war with Portugal furnished this year no incident of importance, except we may account so the proceeding of the Portuguese governor of Salvaterra, whom the Spaniards would have corrupted by the agency of Don Alonso de Sande, a Castilian officer, with whom he lived in great friendship, the Portuguese having carried on the negotiation till he had obtained a letter under the hand of Don Lewis de Haro, consenting to admit the person with whom he treated, and ^f thirty men, at a postern; which he performed, and caused every man's brains to be beat out as soon as he was within. As for the unfortunate Don Alonso, he tied him to the mouth of a cannon filled with gunpowder, and shattered him all to pieces; an action so barbarous, that it tarnished the reputation he would otherwise have acquired from his fidelity ^o. Don Juan of Austria was early in the field on the side of Roussillon, where he took some small places, and would have made greater progress, if the prince of Conti had not been the cardinal's nephew, who took care to furnish him with a numerous army, and sent likewise the duke of Vendosme upon the coast with a strong fleet. With his assistance he took Quiers and Castillon, after a a siege of twenty days. He then prepared to penetrate into Catalonia; but Don Juan, though much inferior in strength, had so well secured the passes, that he found it impracticable; however, the town of Solsona revolted, and received a French garrison. The siege of Palamos was next resolved on; but Don Juan threw in such a reinforcement, as would have made the reduction a work of time; and this put the prince of Conti so much out of humour, that he quitted the command to the count de Merinville^p. Don Juan, desirous of punishing Solsona for its revolt, besieged it soon after the prince's departure; but the count de Merinville surprised one of his quarters, and relieved the place. Don Juan, however, took Berga, and, after a long campaign, forced the French to retire into Languedoc, where they took up their winter quarters. After their departure he reduced Solsona, and gave its inhabitants cause to remember their having been so ready to receive a French garrison^q. There happened also this year a naval engagement, of which neither side had much reason to boast. Some French historians claim the victory; but, from what happened through the whole campaign, it is easy to see that their title was none of the best. His catholic majesty resolved to make some changes in his governors and general officers the next year; his son Don Juan of Austria he appointed governor of the Low Countries, with a plenitude of power never granted to any of his predecessors^r. He made choice of the marquis de Carracena to serve under him, in hopes he might prove more successful there than hitherto he had been in Italy. The count de Fuensaldagna, with whom the ministry were well satisfied, had the government of the Milanese, for Don Juan did not affect a servant who had held his former master in leading strings. The Spanish privateers gave already a great deal of disturbance; the treaty with the duke of Lorrain, signed on the 9th of November proved of no use, as has been already shewn. However, a medal was struck by order of the court of Madrid, with the bust of the king and his titles on one side, and a drawn sword and branch of olive on the other, with this inscription, Prepared for either^s. It was thought, however, that this medal rather spoke a wish than a fact.

THE count de Fuensaldagna found the affairs of the Milanese in no very promising situation. The army was weak, the revenue anticipated, the inhabitants of the capital extremely displeased with the accidental burning of the ducal palace, and all the papers of state contained therein. He set himself to repair every thing, and he made a great progress in what he undertook; for though without doubt he was very assuming, yet he was a great man in the cabinet and in the field, and very few ministers were so assiduous^t. The duke of Modena had made a tour to Paris, in order to be present at his son's marriage; and, as this procured him some advantages, it turned likewise to the account of Spain; for the duke of Mantua, jealous of the honours paid him, gradually reconciled himself to his old friends^u. Prince Thomas of Savoy being dead on the verge of fourscore, the duke of Merceur, at the request of the duke of Modena, was appointed to command in Italy, and, with a flourishing army, besieged Valenza, a strong place in the Milanese. It was defended by Don Augustino de Signado, and defended with equal capacity and courage. The count de Fuensaldagna did all in his power to relieve it, and was once very near carrying his point; but at length the place was reduced to such extremity, that the governor demanded to capitulate. The two dukes answered, that, according to the rules of war, he had no terms to expect; but that, out of pure regard to his courage and conduct, they were ready to grant him what terms he pleased; and thus, to the great regret of the Spaniards, Valenza was lost, after seventy-three days open trenches. This was looked upon as one of the best conducted enterprizes during the whole war; and though no blame could with any foundation be laid upon the count de Fuensaldagna, it proved notwithstanding a great mortification to him, more especially as it happened at his entrance on the government, and as he very well knew they had formed at Madrid great expectations of seeing their affairs in Italy restored by a person of his known courage and capacity^w.

THE situation of affairs in the Low Countries requiring the presence of Don Juan, he resolved to pass by sea into Italy, and from thence by land into the Netherlands. We cannot desire a clearer proof of the great change in the circumstances of Spain, than this short voyage will afford us. Instead of the numerous squadrons of the Doria's or Mendoza's, which attended every motion of Charles the fifth and Philip the second, Don Juan put to sea with only four gallies. These were soon attacked by privateers of such force, that three of them were quickly taken, and the fourth, with the prince on board, had been taken likewise, if Don Juan had not promised the slaves their liberty, and one hundred ducats apiece, if they landed him safe. Thus encouraged, they exerted themselves in such a manner, that with great difficulty they merited their reward^x. The prince no sooner debarked than he continued his route to Milan, where, notwithstanding the highest honours were paid him, he staid but a few days, and spent the best part of his time in conferring with the count de Fuensaldagna, whose informations he received very thankfully, and heard his advice with much attention. As soon as he arrived in the Low Countries, the archduke Leopold William went to wait upon him, and, having met him at some miles distance, in a most triumphant manner carried him to Brussels, where he was received with universal applause; soon after which the archduke set out for Cologne, Don Juan accompanying him as far as he came to meet him^r. These ceremonies were not without a meaning, for it was known that the prince of Conde pretended to the precedency; but the archduke, who was both the son and the brother of an emperor, having given Don Juan the right hand, the prince made no difficulty of following his example. However, these forms took up so much time, that the French were in the field before them; and the viscount Turenne, having left the cardinal with the court at la Fere, tho' his army was not very numerous, had invested Valenciennes, a large and well-fortified place, in the midst of the Spanish fortresses. It was defended by Don Francisco de Meneses, who had the precaution to lay the adjacent meadows under water; so that the French were constrained to lay a bridge, or rather to construct a dike, over them, to unite their quarters, the viscount de Turenne commanding on the one side, and marshal de la Ferte on the other. About the beginning of July Don Juan, the prince of Conde, and the marquis de Carracena, advanced to its relief, and encamped at a small distance from the quarter of the Lorrainers, which it was expected they would have attacked; but, having caused bridges to be thrown over the Scheld, they passed it in the night between the 15th and 16th, and attacked the quarter of the marshal la Ferte so briskly, that in a quarter of an hour the line was forced, and the marshal taken prisoner^z. At the very instant of this attack, the governor opened the sluices, which carried a barge laden with stones with such rapidity against the French dike, that it forced a passage; so that Monsieur Turenne, finding it impossible to succour his colleague, retired with his baggage and part of his artillery under the cannon of Quenoi. The princes would have pursued him, and in all probability would have rendered their victory complete, if unluckily the gate of Valenciennes on that side had not been walled up, and, before it could be opened, the viscount was out of their reach^a. As it was, a marshal of France taken, with four thousand foot, with as many killed, and all the artillery and baggage falling likewise into their hands, gave a new lustre to the Spanish arms. This was not a little augmented by the taking of Conde, after a siege of twenty-five days, in which there was a garrison of four thousand men, who were indeed suffered to march out, but upon the hard condition of not serving against Spain for four years. These successes were somewhat qualified by their being obliged to raise the siege of St. Guilain, in hopes of preventing Monsieur Turenne from recovering la Capelle, in which they likewise failed^b. However, the events of this campaign were apparently in their favour, and this revived the spirits of the Flemings, and in some measure abated the chagrin of the prince of Conde.

If the former campaigns had been at all more vigorous, we might have imputed the little progress made in this on the side of Portugal to the declining health of the king Don Juan, who died in November; but in truth they were all the effects of his wise policy, who, having a broken state to repair, and wars in different parts of the world to maintain, thought it best to save expences on that side where the weakness of his enemy was as great as his own. In Catalonia the marquis de Montana, who commanded after the departure of Don Juan, had but a very small army, with which he took several little places; and the duke de Candale, grandson to the great duke of Epernon, who commanded the French, neither attempted any thing himself, nor gave the Spanish general much disturbance. Pope Urban the seventh having solicited the French bishops to interpose with their king, in order to facilitate a peace, Lewis afforded them but a rough, not to say a rude answer. Upon reflection, however, cardinal Mazarine thought it expedient to let the world see that France did not intend, or at least would not avow the intention, of making a war without end; therefore, at the beginning of the campaign, Mr. de Lionne was dispatched to Madrid with full powers, comprised in about six lines, to conclude a peace; and, to prevent any doubt about the king's signature, a gentleman, who had been in the service of the count de Fuensaldagna, in whose presence the French king delivered those powers, and told him what they were, accompanied him^c. This minister plenipotentiary had several conferences with Don Lewis de Haro, but they ended in nothing. An account of this negotiation was published, as is generally supposed, by Lionne, in order to justify his court; and in this it is affirmed, that the point upon which they differed was the restitution of his places and governments to the prince of Conde, to which it is said his catholic majesty inclined to add the sovereignty of some places on the frontiers, in consideration of the services which, as the Spanish ministers phrased it, he had been compelled to render their master: whereas Lewis, though he was content the prince should return, would by no means allow that he should return

- a. in triumph. It has been however thought, and indeed it is more probable, that the true reason why this negotiation ended so abruptly was, the proposition, or at least the intimation, of a marriage between the young king and the infanta, to which Philip was exceedingly averse, as foreseeing the consequences, and being desirous to marry her to a prince of his own family^d. The Spaniards were made thoroughly sensible this year of the consequences of a war with England; for besides the news of the attempt upon St. Domingo, and the conquest of Jamaica in the West Indies, they had the misfortune of seeing the admirals Blake and Montague sink three and take two rich galleons upon their own coast, in which prizes they found three millions of pieces of eight, besides which the Spaniards lost a greater sum in those that were sunk^e. A misfortune so much the more intolerable, as they knew not what provocation had brought this war
- b upon them, and consequently knew as little how to extricate themselves from it, or to revenge the mischiefs they sustained.

THE duke of Mantua, though he had contributed exceedingly the year before to the taking of Valenza, was prevailed upon by his wife to go to Milan, where he was quickly reconciled to the interests of Spain; and, having discovered this by acting openly, the duke of Modena and the prince of Conti began to commit hostilities in his dominions. As they had visibly a superiority, they proceeded to invest Alexandria della Paglia, a strong place, and well defended. The count de Fuenfaldagna assembled all the forces he was able, and marched with them to the relief of the place; in order to which he attacked the enemy in their lines, but without effect. However, having taken a strong intrenched camp very near them, and the governor continuing to make frequent sallies, they were obliged at last to raise the siege on the 18th of August, after having lain before the place thirty-three days^f. The count, however, was not strong enough to prevent the allies from taking quarters in the dominions of the duke of Mantua. On the side of Flanders, through the industry and activity of the prince of Conde, the army was very early in the field, so that St. Guilain was invested, and reduced by the twenty-second of March. Marshal Turenne, to repair this affront, having deceived the Spanish generals, began to invest Cambray, in which there were not above three hundred men; and had certainly taken it in a few days, if the prince of Conde had not marched thither with incredible diligence, at the head of four thousand five hundred horse and dragoons, and, under the cover of a thick fog, penetrating the French line, got into the place; upon which Monsieur Turenne drew off his troops, to cover the siege of Montmedi by marshal la Ferte, which was taken on the 6th of August. In the mean time Don Juan of Austria and the prince of Conde attempted to surprise Calais, and actually gained possession of the lower town; but the upper was so well defended that they were forced to retire. Turenne afterwards took St. Venant, and came time enough to oblige the Spaniards, who had laid siege to Ardes, to raise it; but they were so lucky as to surprise his rear-guard, and, with it, the military chest. This did not hinder him from besieging and taking Mardyke, which surrendered on the 3d of October. The garrison, being made prisoners of war, were sent over to England, and the place delivered to general Morgan, who commanded the auxiliaries sent by the protector, which had served in the French army all this campaign^g. The emperor Ferdinand dying in the spring, the archduke Leopold, formerly governor of the Low Countries, might have succeeded him, if he had not declined it in favour of his nephew of the same name, who, notwithstanding, through the opposition excited by the French, was not elected till the following year. Don Juan laboured assiduously to improve a misunderstanding between the states general and the crown of France into an open rupture; but the former, apprehending the consequences, and knowing the inability of the Spaniards to perform their promises, adjusted it upon the best terms they could^h.

As the Portuguese suspected their enemies might be encouraged by the death of their king, and the minority of the prince his son, they determined to begin the campaign early, and with vigour; but, miscarrying in their attempt to surprise a Spanish fort, they drew upon themselves the mischief they sought to avoid; for the duke de St. Germain, an Italian nobleman of great merit, who commanded the Spanish army, being sent for to Madrid, received instructions to exert himself to the utmost, and was at the same time promised great supplies and considerable reinforcements, which were accordingly sent him. Towards the close of April he took the field, and soon after invested Olivenza, the strongest place in Portugal except Elvas. The count de St. Lorenzo, with the army of Portugal, made several attempts to relieve it, but without success; so that after a long defence it surrendered on the 30th of May, for which the governor Don Manuel de Saldanha was banished. The inhabitants, to shew their antipathy to the Spaniards, though permitted by the capitulation to stay, quitted the place to a man. The duke next invested the town and castle of Moron, which he likewise took ; so that this was the most active and successful campaign since the beginning of the war ¹. The marquis de St. Abreo, who commanded in Catalonia in the absence of the duke of Candale, forced the Spanish troops, who were employed in the blockade of Urgel, to retire ; and, as their forces were very weak, and such great efforts made on the side of Portugal, there was nothing more done. But the most fatal event of the whole year was the burning the Spanish galleons by the English fleet under the command of admiral Blake, in the island of Teneriff, by which many millions were lost, as well as a great number of good ships, which the Spaniards could very ill spare ². These misfortunes, however, seemed to be all buried in oblivion at Madrid, on the queen's being delivered on the 28th of November of a prince, who was baptized by the name of Philip Prosper, to the general satisfaction of the king and his subjects ³.

The affairs of Spain, instead of mending, grow worse in Italy.

THE count de Fuenfaldagna had spent the whole winter in contriving to block up Valenza, with a full intention to besiege it as soon as the season would permit ; but, before that time came, he met with a new mortification by the duke of Mantua's declaring himself neuter, in consequence of a negotiation that had been carried on under the mediation of the republic of Venice. The duke de Navailles served under the duke of Modena this year, the differences between the two princes having lessened very much the success of the last campaign. Before the count was in any condition to execute his project against Valenza, the two dukes marched directly towards him, while the Spanish forces under the command of the marquis de Villa took the fortress of Trin, in their march to join the army of the allies, which, arriving in sight of Milan, might have created some disturbance, if the count de Fuenfaldagna had not thrown himself into it with the best part of his forces, which kept the people quiet, and frustrated the enemy's designs. The duke of Modena, notwithstanding, besieged and took Mortara, the capital of the fertile district of Lomellino ; and in all probability would have carried his success farther, if a distemper, which seized him at this siege, had not removed him out of this world ⁴.

In the Low Countries they go still much worse, the English acting as auxiliaries to the French.

IN the Low Countries the French formed a very bold design for surprising Ostend ; but it was managed with so little secrecy, that the Spaniards turned it to their advantage, insomuch that they took marshal d'Aumont, and all the troops that were to have executed it ⁵. The viscount Turenne, notwithstanding this misfortune, was forced to undertake the siege of Dunkirk, the French court being constrained to it, in order to oblige Cromwell. It was a difficult, or rather a desperate enterprise, which could never have succeeded, if the Spaniards had taken the smallest precautions for its preservation ; but they had conceived an opinion that cardinal Mazarine had fixed his heart on becoming master of Cambray, and therefore bent all their attention to the security of that place, notwithstanding his Britannic majesty, then in exile, gave them repeated notices that Dunkirk would be besieged. The marquis de Leyde, who was governor of that place, was at Brussels, soliciting for succours, when the French appeared before it, and not without difficulty found means to get into it without the succours for which he had applied. Don Juan of Austria, having made this capital mistake in delaying, made another more fatal by hastening to its relief ; for, marching with all the troops he could assemble, but without artillery, to the Downs, he proposed to wait there for a favourable opportunity of forcing the enemy's lines. Monsieur Turenne, penetrating his design, took the shortest method to prevent it, by attacking him immediately : notwithstanding that Don Juan, the prince of Conde, the dukes of York and Gloucester, did all that was possible to encourage their troops, the army, sensible of the disadvantage under which they fought, were quickly and intirely defeated. This happened on the fourteenth, and Dunkirk was taken on the twenty-third, of June. Monsieur Turenne, pursuing his conquests, took Bergues Saint Vinox on the 2d of July, Furnes on the third, Dixmude on the 7th, Oudenarde on the 9th of September, Menin on the 17th, defeated the prince de Ligne on the 19th, and took Ipres on the 24th. In the mean time the marshal de Ferte took Gravelines ; so that in the course of a war which lasted 28 years, the Spaniards had never experienced so many disgraces in any one campaign ⁶.

Don Lewis de Haro takes the command on the side of Portugal, and loses the battle of Elvas.

ON the side of Portugal both parties seemed determined to make the utmost efforts in their power. The queen dowager, a woman of great vigilance and spirit, had assembled an army of eighteen thousand men, under the command of Don Juan Mendez de Vasconcellos, an old officer of great reputation, and sent him with express orders to reduce Badajoz. He amused himself, however, with attacking the fort of St. Christopher's, which, after all, he was not able to take ; and at last, rising from before it, passed the river, and besieged Badajoz. The

- a duke de St. Germain, who commanded the Spanish troops, sent advice of this to Madrid, and withal informed the court, that the place was in so poor a condition, that it could not hold out long, and that it was utterly out of his power to relieve it. This raised such murmurs amongst the people, that Don Lewis de Haro, collecting all the horse and foot that could be drawn out of both Castiles, marched with fifteen thousand men to Merida, where the duke de St. Germain, having forced a passage through the enemy's line, joined him with one thousand horse, and then marched directly towards the place; but, upon their approach, Vasconcellos raised the siege and retired. Don Lewis de Haro, flushed with this success, and finding himself at the head of near 20,000 men, resolved to conclude the campaign with reducing Elvas. The place was strong, and defended by Don Sancho Manuel, a stubborn man, who would have held out to extremity. The Spaniards, however, invested it, and pushed the siege with great vigour; but the queen dowager having reinforced her troops, and given the command to the count de Castagneda, he advanced immediately to its relief. In point of regular troops, his army was inferior to that of the Spaniards, but more numerous, comprehending the militia. The duke de St. Germain drew out his forces, and gave him battle; in which part of his cavalry being defeated, and he, advancing in person to cover his foot, received a shot in the head, and fell from his horse; which so discouraged his forces, that they presently broke, and were pursued with great fury by the Portuguese. The battle of Elvas was fought on the 23d of July: Don Lewis de Haro was spectator at a distance of this defeat, which cost the Spaniards about 2000 men, and returned immediately to Madrid. Don Rodrigo Moxico, who was next in command to the duke de St. Germain, fortified a post in the rear, and by that means rallied the troops, and made a good retreat; and the general, who was thought to be mortally wounded, through the skill and care of his surgeons, recovered.

THE dispositions of the court of Spain for carrying on the war against Portugal, was the true reason why the alterations on the side of Catalonia were slow and languishing. The marquis de St. Aunais, who commanded for the French in Roussillon, was sensible of this; and, being desirous of doing something that might make an éclat before the arrival of the duke de Mercœur, who was to replace the duke de Candale, he undertook the siege of Campredon, a place of some importance, between Gironne and Paucerdà. The marquis de Mortara, who was unwilling to shew the weakness of Spain, by bringing his troops into the field, did not let slip this opportunity of displaying his military skill, which really deserved a command of more importance. He drew his forces together so secretly and so suddenly, that the French saw them before they had the least intelligence, and scarce saw before they felt them; in short, he forced their lines in three places, and not only obliged them to raise the siege with precipitation, but so effectually ruined their army, that the marquis de Mortara kept the field all the rest of the campaign, while the duke de Mercœur was obliged to be on the defensive. As to the domestic affairs of Spain, the king held a general assembly of the states of Castile and Leon, in which some good regulations were made, certain supplies granted, and all commerce with Portugal prohibited. Another event happened this year, which gave equal joy to the king and his subjects, and contributed not a little towards restoring the general peace of Christendom; this was the birth of the infant Don Ferdinand Thomas, on the 21st of December, so that the king had now the pleasure of seeing two princes capable of the succession, tho' neither of them enjoyed it. It was this that chiefly contributed to remove that formidable objection which hitherto had defeated all negotiations for a general peace, though nothing could be more necessary to the several powers engaged in war, and was to none so necessary as to the crown of Spain.

In Italy, though the count de Fuenfaldagna had not been very successful as a general, yet this was far from lessening his credit at the court of Spain, where he was considered as the ablest minister they had, in which he had no more than justice done him. He saw clearly the situation he was in; and though, as governor of the Milanese, he maintained to the utmost the forms and the magnificence introduced by his predecessors, and sustained the dignity of the crown with a steadiness censured only by those who were strangers to his motives; yet he presented things plainly at Madrid, and gave the ministers to understand, that affairs in Italy were irretrievable by any thing but a peace; that the duchy of Milan was on the very point of being lost; that its natural strength was utterly exhausted; that to draw supplies from the Two Sicilies was to hazard them; that the emperor was tied by his capitulation from affording them any succours; that promises from Spain were useless, or rather mischievous; and that France was negotiating a league offensive and defensive with the republic of Venice, the conclusion of which would be a prologue to the conclusion of their empire in Italy. To the duchess dowager and regent of Savoy, he used a language somewhat different; he suggested, that if the French conquered the duchy of Milan, the territories of Savoy would be no more than a dependent province; those who were now their allies would become their masters; and those prerogatives, of which all sovereigns are jealous, would be immediately diminished, and gradually absorbed. His arguments had their weight every-where; king Philip was so much astonished at the danger, that he resolved to renew the negotiation which he had rejected; and the duchess of Savoy, though so nearly allied in blood to Lewis XIV. saw the count's reasoning in so strong a light, that she resolved to give no farther assistance to the conquest of Milan. She would perhaps have made greater alterations in her measures, but for the views she had of marrying the princess Margaret her daughter to that monarch, with which the cardinal had amused her long, and which had contributed not a little to keep her in the French interest.

Spain sends a minister privately to the king and cardinal, to renew the negotiation.

THE remonstrances of the count Fuensaldagna engaged the duchess of Savoy to deal so explicitly with the French ministers, that the cardinal was constrained to bring the court to Lyons, that the king, and the queen his mother, might have an interview with the duchess of Savoy and the princess Margaret; the news of which made such an impression at Madrid, that Don Antonio de Pimentel was immediately sent to Lyons incognito, where, by applying himself to the cardinal, with strong assurances that his catholic majesty had no longer any repugnance to the marriage proposed between the most Christian king and the infanta, his proposition was accepted, and all thoughts of marriage with Savoy laid aside. A circumstance which was also favourable to Spain, as it changed the ruling maxims of that court, and convinced the duchess regent and her son, that, by an obstinate and blind attachment to France, they might help to aggrandize that crown, but without making any addition either to their own greatness or revenue; and that, by reducing the strength of the Spaniards, they lessened one of those supports, upon which, at some conjuncture or other, they should be forced to lean. The count de Fuensaldagna remained master of the negotiation on the behalf of Spain; for, though Pimentel received full powers from Madrid, yet he made a tour, in order to confer with the count de Fuensaldagna, from whom he received his instructions. The great difficulty was as to the prince of Conde, whose interests were at last given up by the count, who perhaps remembered the differences that had been between them in the Low Countries; but, by way of equivalent, Portugal was given up by France. At length the preliminaries were settled at Paris, and, in consequence of them, and of the queen's interposition, France consented to a suspension of arms, and to the final adjusting of the treaty between the two ministers on the frontiers. These conferences were held in an island scarce heard of before, but which from this transaction became famous; it lay in the middle of the river Bidassoa, and was called the Isle of Pheasants. There was a kind of hall of audience erected, with a chair and a table on each side, but the opposite sides of the table met. Don Lewis de Haro passed over a bridge from the Spanish side, at the same time that the cardinal Mazarine advanced over a bridge on the other; they entered at opposite doors, and seated themselves in the dominions of their respective masters.

Cardinal Mazarine and Don Lewis de Haro, conclude the peace of the Pyrenees.

THESE conferences began on the 13th of August, and ended on the 7th of November, and were in number twenty-four. Don Lewis, contrary to the preliminaries, brought the affair of the prince of Conde again upon the carpet, and pressed it extremely; but the cardinal remained firm, and even went so far as to say, that he perceived this negotiation would end like that three years before. Don Lewis protested it should not, and that he would adhere to the letter of the preliminaries. He added, his catholic majesty could not break his faith, and would therefore give the prince of Conde a district in sovereignty, or the government of the Low Countries. This forced the cardinal to disclose himself; for the prince of Conde, foreseeing what would happen, and desirous of returning home, had already submitted, and given up all his pretensions. The cardinal offered, therefore, that the equivalent intended for the prince should be given to the crown of France, and that the king should bestow his office of great master of his household on his son the duke of Enguien, and give the prince the government of Burgundy and Bresse, which was accepted. While the conferences lasted, marshal Gramont was sent to Madrid, to demand the infanta; which he did in a very gallant manner, entering the place, not with the pomp and state of an ambassador, but in the new stile of royal courier, preceded by a post-master, and a certain number of postilions, who were followed by a troop of sixty gentlemen, after whom came the ambassador all on the gallop, to express their master's impatience to have the infanta. It is not to be conceived what an effect this trivial circumstance had on the Spanish nation, and even on the king, who consented to the marriage with the best grace in the world. The treaty was at length signed, notwithstanding the disturbance given to Don Lewis by the duke of Lorrain, who was now set at liberty, and whose interests were very little considered, or the uneasiness given to the cardinal by the ambassadors of Portugal, and the perplexity they were jointly under from the presence

a of king Charles the second, and of the lord ambassador Lockhart, who, on the cardinal's asking him for whom he acted, answered pleasantly, that it was a point not yet settled in England, but that what he offered was on the part of those who should be uppermost. The renunciations also embarrassed them not a little; but at length the cardinal relaxed in that point, and suffered the Spaniards to do almost what they pleased, foreseeing that time and power would wear or break all these paper engagements. Thus ended this famous negotiation, which produced the treaty of the *Pyrenees, equally blamed in France and in Spain, and, for that reason, it may be justly considered as the best and most equal that could be made at that juncture, and all circumstances considered.

ONE of the principal motives that determined both Philip the fourth and his minister to the marriage and peace with France, was, the desire of turning the whole force of the Spanish monarchy upon Portugal: it was with this view that Don Juan of Austria was recalled in the spring of the preceding year. This event, though somewhat unexpected, was not at all displeasing to him, for he was become heartily weary of the Low Countries, where he saw nothing but misery, and heard nought but complaints. He concealed the order he had received, departed privately, and left the government to the marquis de Carracena. He returned through France, found the court wholly occupied with the great affair of the peace, yet fully determined on the conquest of Portugal, for which there was nothing wanting but the means. The king thought it no difficult matter to constrain the house of Braganza, now abandoned by France, to be content with their hereditary estates, and which he was desirous they should enjoy. Don Lewis de Haro desired to be revenged for the loss of the battle of Elvas: Don Juan desired they would have patience till the peace was so thoroughly settled, as that a certain number of regiments might be drawn out of Italy and the Low Countries, since without old troops he could not at all answer for the success of the war^a. The losses sustained by the depredations committed at sea by the English, and the expences necessary for the conclusion of the Infanta's marriage, made this delay very convenient; so that they were on both sides very inactive, and this campaign as little fertile of events as the last^w. It had been agreed, that his catholic majesty and the most Christian king should have an interview in the Isle of Pheasants; previous to which their ministers met there, to adjust the ceremonial, and to terminate some disputes that had arisen upon certain articles of the peace; all this took up some time. At length, on the 3d of June, the marriage was celebrated at Fontarabia, Don Lewis de Haro representing the most Christian king. On the 4th the queen mother had an interview with his catholic majesty, whom she had not seen in forty-five years; he brought with him the infanta and Don Lewis de Haro; she was accompanied by her younger son and cardinal Mazarine. The queen and the infanta shewed great tenderness; the king preserved a fixed gravity, that differed little from coldness. His sister complained of it; and he contented himself with saying, that exterior marks of passion were not becoming kings. On the other hand, he was extremely civil to cardinal Mazarine, and, amongst other compliments, told him, that Europe stood indebted to him for peace. The king of France looked in towards the end of the interview, as if it was by stealth; upon which Philip could not help saying to his sister, with less gravity than he had hitherto shewn, that he was like to have a handsome son-in-law; and Lewis immediately retired. On Sunday the 6th of June the peace was sworn to with great solemnity by both kings. The nobility of France were then presented to his catholic majesty, who said to his sister, upon her naming the marshal Turenne; "He has made me pass many restless nights." The Spanish grandees, who were about fifteen in number, were in like manner presented to the most Christian king. The French were very richly dressed, the Spaniards were perfectly plain, except that they wore jewels to a prodigious value. Both the royal families had an interview at parting; at which Lewis, after throwing himself at his father's feet, to receive his blessing, embraced him, when he rose, with so much passion, that Philip, who had preserved his temper wonderfully at parting with his daughter, lost it, and burst into tears. The same sensibility appeared with respect to monsieur; and the two courts left each other in terms, of the most perfect friendship and affection^x.

THE prince of Conde, at his leaving the Low Countries to return to France, was treated with all imaginable respect. The marquis de Carracena accompanied him a league from Brussels, and all possible marks of esteem were shewn in the places through which he passed. The people, however, were not much displeased with his departure; for his troops, like those of the duke of Lorraine, had lived in a manner at free quarter, and had oppressed that country which they pretended to protect; which, however, was excusable in some measure, by their being very indifferently paid, as all the troops were in the service of Spain. A very different conduct was observed with regard to his Britannic majesty, whom the marquis de Carracena would have arrested, if he had not withdrawn very critically into the dominions of the states general. This was remembered after his return into his own dominions, as well as the heartiness with which the court of Madrid had embraced the friendship of the parliament when they first took upon them the supreme authority. On this side, therefore, the Spaniards stood but indifferently; and they found likewise a visible coldness at the court of Vienna, where the emperor Leopold was not a little chagrined at the loss of the infanta, for whose sake he had made very large offers to king Philip and his ministers, which, without doubt, would have been accepted, if they had not conceived of his ability in the same light as they did of his intention^y.

It was the principal object of the Spanish ministry to preserve the peace, which was so necessary to their affairs, which had been obtained with so much trouble, and which had cost them so dear. This induced them to look upon the death of the cardinal Mazarine, which happened in the spring, as a great misfortune, the catholic king having a great confidence in his pacific disposition. He left a picture of Titian's, of prodigious value, to Don Lewis de Haro, and bestowed a golden table-clock on the count de Fuensaldagna, which served to confirm this opinion, at a time when it could be only the subject of regret^z. The army of Don Juan was in reality very considerable: he had 13,000 foot and 6000 horse, Spanish, German, and Italian troops, commanded by the best officers that were in the Spanish service. He began with the siege of Aronches, a place important by its situation, and capable of being made much more so, if it had been properly fortified. The Portuguese army advanced as far as Elvas, though they were not strong enough to relieve it. The governor spared them the trouble, by yielding it sooner to the Spaniards than he needed to have done. Don Juan, having caused the place to be thoroughly repaired, and some further works to be added, put his troops into quarters of refreshment. The Portuguese, either to acquire or to maintain the character of bravery, attacked the Spanish cavalry, though they were not so numerous or so good; but they were repulsed with considerable loss, which cost the life of Don Juan de Pacheco, who commanded the Spanish horse, and was very dear to the prince. When the heats were over, Don Juan took the field again, and besieged Alconchel, but not with any great vigour, that the Portuguese army might have time, if they were so inclined, to come to its relief; but as the governor was not in Don Juan's secret, he spoiled his scheme, by surrendering the place before it was expected. Don Juan caused it to be well fortified, put a Spanish garrison into it, and then retiring to Badajoz, suffered his army to take winter-quarters^a. He perceived plainly the enemy would not fight, and was unwilling his troops should moulder away in sieges.

This no way

necessities of
ministers.

Don Lewis de Haro was extremely displeased with this campaign; he had flattered himself with the conquest of Portugal, and there had not been so much as a battle. On the other hand, Don Juan acquainted the king that he stood in need of recruits and supplies; that kingdoms were not so easily conquered; that the enemy acted with great caution; and that, if any accident happened to this army, he did not see how his majesty could form such another. He had certainly reason on his side, and yet the ministers were not altogether in the wrong. France, notwithstanding the peace, had suffered count Schomberg, who was an excellent officer, to go to Portugal with six hundred volunteers. It was by his lights the Portuguese generals directed their conduct: he advised them to excursions and skirmishes, but to avoid battles, that they might gradually form their troops, while those of Don Juan were diminished. The court of England had embraced the interests of Portugal, negotiated a peace with Holland, assisted them with money, tho' it is said that money came from France, and Charles had entered into a treaty for marrying the princess Catherine, sister to the young king of Portugal. The short remedy for these mischiefs was to conquer that country, and dethrone the king. They were certainly right in their measures, but they mistook the means. They published to all Europe the design of this conquest, which did not at all contribute towards effecting it.

He went so far as to do this in writing; and, in a memorial, proposed to Charles the choice of several princesses, in favour of whom he promised, on the part of Spain, mighty advantages; concluding with menaces if his advice was not taken; for which he was forbid the court^b. He then, according to the common practice of Spanish ministers, fell to ina intriguing and plotting with the malecontents. This conduct of his not being discouraged, in the time he rashly engaged in a quarrel with the French minister, the count d' Estrades, for precedence, and gained some advantage over him by force, having distributed his money liberally amongst the mob ^c. This was one of the most unlucky things that could have befallen Spain; for the archbishop of Ambrun demanded, in the name of his master, immediate satisfaction; if the court of Spain was inclined to avoid a war. The count de Fuensaldagna was then at Paris, and did all he could to qualify matters. He was going into the Low Countries with the title of governor, but died on the road. A little before his death, he wrote to Don Lewis de Haro, that peace was necessary to Spain, and consequently those measures that were necessary to maintain peace. Philip himself was of the same mind; upon which the count de Fuentes b was sent ambassador extraordinary into France; to give up the precedence in the most solemn manner; to perpetuate the memory of which the French caused his audience to be engraved upon a medal. But, before this happened; Don Lewis de Haro was in his grave, and the court of Madrid plunged in the deepest melancholy for the death of the only surviving prince of Spain; which gloom was, however, in some measure dissipated, by the birth of Carlos, on the 5th of December ^d.

THE war with Portugal was carried on this year with greater vigour than ever. None of the ministers about his catholic majesty had the same credit with Don Lewis, and Don Juan's interest with his father was so good, that he obtained from him all that he asked. He took the field in the month of May, and intended to have opened the campaign with the siege of Estremoz; but the count de Castagneda, now styled the marquis of Marialva, encamped under its cannon with his army, which consisted of 12,000 men; and therefore, at the request of the officers who commanded under him, he declined the siege of that place, and prosecuted his march, which threw Portugal into the utmost consternation. Many have believed, that, if he had pursued his march to Lisbon, he must have carried it, the inhabitants being filled with a panic, and they had no relief to expect; but Don Juan was afraid to trust his army in so large a place, with another at its back. He took Villabuim, which was surrendered by the French governor by consent; and, in his way to Jurumenba, he came before Borba, a poor old place, once fortified, but then in ruins. Don Rodrigo de Cunha had in it a small garrison; with which he prevailed upon the inhabitants to join, and made the best defence he could; d however, it was carried by storm, the garrison made prisoners of war, the town burnt, the people plundered, and, to crown all, Don Rodrigo, and two of his captains, were hanged in the market-place. He next besieged Jurumenba, a strong place, well fortified, with a garrison of 3000 men, commanded by Don Manuel Lobato Pinto, who defended it long enough for the Portuguese army to come to its relief; but they found the camp of Don Juan so well fortified, that they durst not attempt any thing, and consequently the place surrendered on the best terms that could be obtained. Don Juan came next before Villaviciosa; but there again he found the Portuguese encamped under the walls; upon which he turned, and took two large towns, full of military stores and provisions, without any resistance. Crato, which belonged to the knights of Malta, and in a worse condition, was taken sword in hand, and the e governor was shot. The reduction of a few inconsiderable places more finished this campaign, which terrified the Portuguese extremely, though count Schomberg had brought their army into good order, and more especially their cavalry ^c. The French king having quarrelled with the pope, and carried his pretensions very high, his catholic majesty concurred with him; which occasioned many speculations. Dunkirk also was this year sold to the French for an inconsiderable sum of money, which, if it had not been for the ill conduct of Batteville, would very probably have been restored to the Spanish Netherlands ^f.

IN all appearance the two crowns were perfectly reconciled, and had nothing so much at heart as giving each other, and the world, marks of it. The most Christian king had refused, when requested by his Britannic majesty, to contribute any assistance towards the relief of the Portuguese. His catholic majesty, on the first application of the bishop of Ambrun, promised a free passage through his dominions in Italy to the French army that was to act against the pope. Both courts were alike sincere; for the care of supporting Portugal was committed to marshal Turenne by the one, and measures were taken to shut all the passages into Italy by the other. Don Juan was not so early in the field as in the former campaign; but he had a better army, and marched at the head of 21,000 men directly towards Ebora. The young king of Portugal, Don Alonso, at this time a perfect boy, and not at all promising in point of parts, had deposed his mother, to whom his father and himself owed their crowns; f from the regency; so that there was scarce the form of civil government left. He had appointed Don Sancho Manuel, count de Villafior, to command the army; but, by good fortune, count Schomberg was left to assist him. The first thing the count did was to send a new governor to Ebora, without withdrawing the old one. As soon as the place was invested, they quarrelled, and in five days the new governor gave it up. The news excited an insurrection at Lisbon, and struck a panic into the army. Count Schomberg recovered them, by shewing the advantages that might be taken of Don Juan in his retreat. These advantages were taken gradually; so that the soldiers comprehended them better than the generals, who envied him, because he was a stranger. Don Juan beheld their motions and encampments with amazement, and was so generous as to commend a general, whom the Portuguese abused.

At length they attacked him in a mountainous passage, where his infantry marched along the tops of steep hills, where it was judged impracticable to reach them. The English regiments in the army of Portugal crept up those hills upon their hands and knees; the French officers followed them, and at length the Portuguese did the same. The Spanish troops did not behave so well as they were wont to do, notwithstanding that Don Juan dismounted, and exposed himself extremely. His army was routed, with the loss of between three and four thousand killed, and as many taken prisoners. On the side of the Portuguese there fell about a thousand. This battle fixed the crown upon the head of the house of Braganza; and the count de Villafior recovered Ebora after a week's siege. Don Juan having conducted the remains of his army to Badajoz, went in person to Madrid, to justify his conduct; but he returned again to the army, and made the necessary dispositions for protecting the frontiers. The king Don Philip, finding his health declining, and repeated fits of the gravel wearing away his strength, concluded a treaty with the emperor Leopold, for the support and maintenance of the house of Austria; in consequence of which he brought a great body of German troops into the duchy of Milan and kingdom of Naples, and consented likewise to his marrying his youngest daughter, whom he had declared capable of inheriting the Low Countries, and all the rest of his dominions. This contract for the marriage was not consummated till after his demise, and was presented by the marquis de Fuentes to be subscribed by Lewis XIV.; but, as might have been easily foreseen, that satisfaction was refused. The catholic king had the farther displeasure of seeing the imperial troops recalled, almost as soon as they arrived, the emperor being attacked by the Turks. By these measures the ministers shewed they had not changed their sentiments in regard to France, at a time their circumstances were not changed.

The ministers disgusted by the want of success in two campaigns, send for the marquis de Carracena.

AFTER all the pains Don Juan was able to take about the ministers, and notwithstanding his interest with the king his father, the affairs of Spain were in so bad a situation, that it was impossible for him to procure the necessary supplies. The Portuguese, therefore, under the command of the marquis Marialva, were not only first in the field, but alone in it likewise; for, after reinforcing the garrisons, Don Juan had only a great corps of horse left, with about two or three thousand foot. Encouraged by these circumstances, the Portuguese besieged Valentia de Alcantara, a place strong by situation, large, rich, and well fortified. Don Juan sent a body of horse to disturb the besiegers, and directed the governor to defend himself to the last extremity. He obeyed these instructions till he found himself in want of powder, and then thought fit to capitulate; which perhaps he would not have done so soon, but for the bad example which Don Juan had given in hanging and shooting governors, who, in his opinion, defended places too long. The duke of Osuna, who was a very brave man, commanded an independent body of seven thousand men, and was very desirous of distinguishing himself: this induced him to make an inroad into Portugal, and to besiege Castel Rodrigo, which was a place of strength. Don Pedro Magellans, who commanded on that side the troops of Portugal, forced him first to raise the siege, and then to fight, where tho' he behaved himself very gallantly, his troops were soundly beaten, and himself forced to retire, leaving two thousand men upon the spot. The Spanish ministers, attributing all these misfortunes to Don Juan, sent count Marsin to take the command of the army; upon which Don Juan returned to Madrid. They also engaged the king to confer the government of the Low Countries on Don Francisco de Mauro, count of Castel Rodrigo, that the marquis of Carracena might be at liberty to return into Spain, and command against Portugal. The emperor having demanded succours of France against the Turks, obtained them; but upon this express condition, that his catholic majesty should send the like number of troops out of Italy, which was done to prevent their being brought into Spain to serve against the Portuguese; and, in revenge, the Spanish ministers engaged the emperor to make a very indifferent peace with the Turks, after the victory at St. Goddard. They had not the same ascendancy in the United

^a Provinces, the states shewing a visible partiality to the French, through the influence of the grand pensionary John de Witt ^k.

THE count de Marfin, though a stranger, had the confidence of the ministry, who, tho' ^{He arrives,} they did not furnish Don Juan with troops during the campaign, yet enabled this French ^{and flatters the} officer to form gradually a very fine army in the winter, and with all things necessary. It ^{ministry with} was in truth the last army they had to raise, and comprehended all the old regiments of Spaniards, Germans, and Italians, that were not yet worn out, and amounted in the whole to 15,000 ^{the hopes of} foot, and 6000 horse. On the arrival of Don Joseph de Benavides, marquis of Carracena, ^{conquering} late in the preceding year, he was pressed to go immediately to the army; but he desired that ^{Portugal in} the duke of Aveyro, who, though a grandee of Portugal, partly from pride, but in appearance out of regard to the oath he had taken to Philip, had left an estate of 40,000 crowns a year, and lived in Castile, should assemble a fleet at Seville, in order to block up Lisbon by sea, when he should arrive before it with the army; for this was the language the marquis had talked in Flanders, and continued to talk at Madrid, upon a supposition that the Portuguese were such as he left them, and without any distinct knowledge of their country. At length he went to the army; upon which count Marfin retired, because he would not serve under him. The first thing the marquis did, after reviewing his own troops, was to obtain the best informations possible as to the country of Portugal, the situations of mountains and rivers in his passage to Lisbon, and the character of the Portuguese troops, and the officers who commanded them. These opened to him new scenes, and obliged him to entertain new notions. He ^{A. D. 1665.} found the country was not to be so easily traversed as he imagined; and he was amazed to hear that the enemy's cavalry was numerous and full of spirit; that their foot, by the management of foreign officers, were become hardy, patient, and wonderfully exact in obedience; but what troubled him most was, that, in the factions at the court of Lisbon, count Schomberg had so effectually supported the councils of the marquis de Marialva, that the latter had an intire confidence in him.

HOWEVER, Carracena took the field early; but, instead of marching to Lisbon, invested ^{Is totally de-} Villaviciosa, which was defended by Brito, an old Portuguese officer, very skilful in the art ^{facted in the} of war, and very stubborn. There were three strong posts without the town, which he ^{plain of} caused to be occupied by the best part of his garrison: the marquis de Carracena, desirous of ^{Montes} carrying them at once, caused them to be attacked by all the grenadiers in his army, who ^{Claros, where} were every-where repulsed with great loss; but the governor immediately withdrew his troops, ^{the last army} and abandoned them all, that he might be in a better condition to defend the place. When ^{of Spain is} the siege had continued long enough to weaken the assailants, the Portuguese army appeared; ^{ruined.} upon which the marquis raised the siege, and marched to give the enemy battle. It was fought in the plain of Montes Claros with the greatest obstinacy on both sides, and lasted eight hours: in the end the Portuguese gained a complete victory, killed four thousand on the spot, took Don Diego Corrier, general of the Spanish horse, many officers of note, and more than four thousand men, prisoners. When Philip IV. received the news of this defeat, he had only strength to say, It is the will of God; then dropped the letter, and fell himself ^{in a swoon} ^l. The ministers lost their spirits, the populace upbraided them openly with betraying Don Juan of Austria, and sacrificing the glory of Castile to their private interests. The remains of the Spanish army being thrown into garrisons, the Portuguese very wisely declined making sieges, and put their troops into quarters of refreshment; for their victory had been pretty dearly bought, they having three thousand men killed, and, amongst them, a large proportion of the best officers ^m; but when the campaign was finished in a manner at land, it began again as it were at sea; for the duke of Aveyro, having at length completed his squadron at Cadiz, cruised along the coasts of Portugal, and committed some depredations, which were severely revenged by count Schomberg's irruption into Andalusia, which was executed with so much vigour, and at the same time with so great conduct, that the Portuguese returned with an immense booty, before the Spaniards recovered from their first surprise.

THE situation of affairs in Spain was at this time extremely critical; the ministers had not ^{Death of Don} much the confidence of their master, and were in absolute disgrace with the people, who, in ^{Philip IV.} those days spoke their minds as freely with respect to public affairs, as any nation in Europe. ^{and a succinct} Don Juan of Austria was at Confuegra in discontent; and though the marquis de Carracena ^{character of} kept up his spirits, and persuaded them, that if they would recruit and reinforce his army, he ^{that monarch,} would still do all he had promised, it had no manner of effect; on the contrary, the court in ^{and his admini-} general was inclined to a peace, and yet they were slow in making any attempts towards it. ^{nistrations.} Out of this lethargy they were awaked by a new misfortune; for, on the 12th of September, ^{1665.} the king was seized with a dysentery so violently, that, in two hours, he was in great danger of death. His physicians administered what relief they could; so that the next day he was in a condition to make his will; and though weak, appeared somewhat better; but in a few days relapsed, and, having received the sacraments of the church, breathed his last, in his palace at Madrid, on the 17th of the same month, in the sixty-first year of his age, after a reign of forty-four years^a. He was in himself a prince of more than moderate abilities, and, if he had received a better education, and had not come to the crown so young, he would certainly have made a much greater figure. But the great artifice of Olivares in soothing his propensity to pleasure, in magnifying the fatigues of business, and making him believe he underwent a martyrdom to relieve him from the weight of the administration, kept him so long in a state of indolence, that, even when he thought it necessary, he could not bring himself to a proper degree of application. He loved magnificence, had a very polite taste, spoke with great vivacity upon many occasions, and, though his reign was far from being fortunate, had the grandeur of the Spanish monarchy always at heart. By his testament, tho' that was not in the least necessary, he called to the succession his son Don Carlos; and, in case he died without issue, left the crown to the infanta Donna Margaret, contracted to the emperor Leopold; in case she died without issue, the succession was to pass to her husband, and his heirs male; upon the failure of them, to the duke of Savoy; and, upon the extinction of that house, it was to descend to his eldest daughter; provided she was a widow, and to the children of her second marriage, if she had any such. He settled the regency in the queen his widow, and appointed the president of the council of Castile (the first civil officer in this monarchy), the vice-chancellor of Aragon (so stiled, though there is never any chancellor), the inquisitor-general, the archbishop of Toledo, and the marquis of Aytona (of the house of Moncada in Catalonia), her council. He was interred in that magnificent dormitory of the Spanish kings, called the Pantheon, which he had rebuilt and finished in the year 1655, being persuaded that what Philip II. had done was not equal in magnificence to the rest of that royal structure^o; less lamented by his subjects then, than at the distance of some years.

of his mother
gent.

THE young king, Charles the second, was inaugurated, or, as the Spanish phrase is, had the ensigns displayed for him, on the 7th of October, being at that time not quite four years of age^p. He was of a weak and tender constitution, but of parts so pregnant and promising, that when he was proclaimed in the Low Countries, as he was with great solemnity, the people expressed, by every method they could devise, their expectations that he would resemble his ancestor of the same name, the glorious emperor Charles the fifth. It was a misfortune to him that the queen his mother, though the daughter of an emperor, the widow of a king, and the sister of the reigning emperor, had not the talents requisite to the right management of power; it was still a greater misfortune that she was jealous and fond of it to the last degree; but it was the greatest of all that she was possessed of it, through a course of years more than sufficient to ruin the authority of a crown, to ruin and exhaust the subject, and to disable this unfortunate prince himself from repairing these mischiefs, when he was sincerely inclined to it. This description is severe; but the fundamental law of history is to speak truth. She was intirely devoted to the interests of the court of Vienna, and governed in all things by the counsels that she received from thence, except in points that regarded her private inclinations; for in these she listened to no counsel at all. The first was a fault, but, her descent and circumstances considered, very excusable; the latter was a greater fault, and, which was worse, would not admit of any excuse or alleviation. She persisted obstinately in both against the remonstrances of the ablest of her council, as well as all the lights of reason and experience. This character of the queen is necessary, as it will explain all that follows.

Her unaccountable conduct at her entering upon the regency, and her obstinacy therein.

At her first entrance on the government, she was desirous of bringing her confessor, father Nitard, a man of low birth, of a very limited capacity, a stranger, unacquainted with public affairs, and not at all beloved, into the council of regency, which she effected by engaging the cardinal of Aragon to resign to him the post of inquisitor-general, an employment of great weight, and hitherto highly respected in Spain. By her influence over the late king, she had prevailed upon him, in his last moments, to exclude his natural son Don Juan from having any share in the administration, though he was a prince of confessed abilities, both as a statesman and a soldier, had given great proofs of them, was intirely beloved by the people, and was in every respect worthy of her confidence, but more especially from his great disinterestedness, and his tender affection to the person of the king. In this measure she was at first abetted by most of the ministry, and by many of the grandees, from principles of prejudice, envy, and private interest; but by degrees she lost this support, for they saw so plainly that he was the only person capable of restoring the credit, and sustaining the weight, of government, a that they concurred with the people in desiring that he might be recalled and employed ; to which she was so averse, from the apprehension that he would dismiss her ecclesiastical favourite from the council, or at least circumscribe his power, that she formed a design of removing that prince out of the kingdom, under the pretence of sending him to govern the Low Countries, which she might have effected, if her management had not been as bad as her views. The weakness and unsteadiness of her conduct, which would have been highly prejudicial at any time, proved particularly destructive at this juncture, when affairs were in such a state as demanded the greatest circumspection and fortitude to prevent all things from running into confusion ; and very possibly this might have been done, if she had demanded the assistance of Don Juan cordially and in due time ¹.

b At the demise of king Philip IV. Spain still remained engaged in the war with Portugal, and Charles II. scarce began to reign, before a war with France became inevitable. In order to render the progress and issue of these great affairs perfectly intelligible, it will be necessary to treat them separately, though succinctly. In regard to Portugal, the marquis del Carpio, who was prisoner there, had instructions and powers sent him to treat of a peace, under the mediation of Charles II. king of Great Britain ; for the Spaniards had at length found out that nothing could prove more prejudicial to their affairs than a quarrel, nothing contribute so much to their prosperity as a good understanding, with England ; notwithstanding which, they were so dilatory in their negotiation, and so unwilling to acknowledge Don Alonso for king of Portugal, that they suffered the season to escape them, in which the treaty might have been

c concluded most to their advantage, from a persuasion that it was always in their power, and that they might conclude it how and when they pleased. But the French, who had a great interest in the continuance of the war, made suddenly an unexpected treaty with Portugal, and granted to that crown a considerable subsidy ². This was very near answering their purpose, and taking the Portuguese intirely out of the hands of the English ; but the Spaniards, seeing this in time, laid aside all their scruples, recurred to the old mediation, and signed a peace, by which both kings were to restore all places taken during the war, except Ceuta and Barbary, which was to remain to Spain. All confiscations were also to be void, all prisoners to be set at liberty on both sides, without ransom, free commerce between both nations to be restored ; and

d if, in process of time, any doubts or disputes should arise, they were to be amicably discussed, without having recourse to arms. Thus, after twenty-eight years war, the right of the house of Braganza was acknowledged, and the two crowns reconciled, by a fair and final treaty of peace, under the guaranty of the crown of Great Britain, subscribed at Lisbon, on the 13th of February, by the duke de Cardaval, the marquis of Niza, admiral of the Indies, the marquis de Goubea, the marquis of Marialva, the conde de Miranda, and Pedro Vieyra de Silva, secretary of state on the part of Portugal ; Don Gaspar de Haro Guzman, marquis del Carpio, on the part of his catholic majesty and his mother, and by Edward Montagu, earl of Sandwich, on the part of the king of Great Britain. It was solemnly ratified at Madrid on the 23d of the same month ³.

e THE queen mother of France died five months after her brother the king of Spain ; and it was given out by the French king and his ministers, that out of decency, and in regard to the melancholy situation of both the royal families, they had not insisted on the right of the French queen to a great part of the Low Countries, in virtue of what was stiled the Jus Devolutionis, or custom of Brabant, by which the children of the first marriage, whether male or female, are heirs to each other, in preference to the children of a second marriage. In consequence of this title, the French ambassador presented his master's letter to the queen mother, demanding immediate possession of what devolved to the infanta Maria Theresa, queen of France, as the heiress of her brother Don Baltasar ⁴. The queen of Spain and her council were very far from seeing this set right so easily as his most Christian majesty seemed to expect, and would by no means listen to the answer returned, that, if there was

f any such right, it had been clearly renounced at the time of the infanta's marriage. The most Christian king, who was well aware of this, and had been from the time of his Catholic majesty's death providing every thing for the execution of his project, rushed immediately with three great armies into the field, and laid the foundation of his future greatness, in taking a multitude of places in no state of defence, and, as himself admitted, in a time of full peace. The affairs of Spain in the Low Countries, were indeed in a very low condition, and not under the best administration ; for though the marquis of Castel Rodrigo could not but be sensible of the great weakness of the provinces still obedient to the Spanish crown, and the necessity they must be under, whenever attacked, of recurring to the protection of some friendly neighbour, yet he was far from treating either of the maritime powers with kindness or respect. On the contrary, under the name of the bishop of Munster, he had projected taking Williamstadt from the Dutch, which, though the states discovered, they were willing to pass over, upon his disavowing it. Indeed they had suffered themselves to be amused a second time by France, by a treaty of partition, as if the injustice of tearing these provinces from Spain could be alleviated or attoned for by their having a part of them. It was the resentment of the former, and their flattering themselves too much from the latter kind of usage, that suspended their resolutions, and rendered them tame, though not quiet, spectators of the mischiefs to which their neighbours were exposed. France gained in one campaign more than in the course of the former war of many years; and, not content with this, in the succeeding winter, partly through force, and partly through treachery, made herself mistress of the county of Burgundy, or, as it is usually stiled, the Franche Comté, in which expedition the prince of Conde, for whom Spain had done all that she was able, was the instrument Lewis XIV. thought fit to employ^a. This awakened the jealousy of the states, who, with very unusual vigour and presence of mind, concluded with Great Britain and Sweden the famous triple alliance^w, the best and boldest political measure taken in the last age, and which saved the Spanish Low Countries from being swallowed up. For the French king, perceiving that, if he carried on the war, it would be no longer against a weak and defenceless power, thought fit to stop short, and very wisely, though unwillingly, concluded the peace of Aix la Chapelle on the 2d of May^x, by which he retained Charleroi, Binch, Ath, Douai, le Fort de l'Escarp, Lisle, Oudenarde, Armentieres, Courtray, Bergues, Furnes, with their bailiwicks, and other conquests; but thought fit to restore Franche Comte. The Spaniards, in this treaty, took care to avoid acknowledging the queen of France's right to the places they were obliged to yield, and caused it to be inserted in the treaty, that, for the sake of restoring peace to Europe, and at the intercession of the pope, they had abandoned those places to the French king.

Don Juan obliges father Nitard to quit Spain, and to retire to Rome, where he is made a cardinal.

WHILE these black storms thundered on the Spanish monarchy without, it was far from enjoying repose or tranquility at home. It was the precarious state of the Low Countries, and the necessity of providing for their future safety, that the queen caused to be represented in the strongest manner to Don Juan of Austria, to prevail on him to go thither. The more easily to persuade him, he had the clearest assurances given him, that he should reside there with an authority as full as he could desire, carry a large sum of money with him, and receive large and regular supplies, to enable him the better to perform the great things that were expected from him. When Don Juan had accepted these proposals, and was actually at Coranna, with an intention to embark for Flanders, the queen caused Don Joseph de Maladas, a gentleman much in his favour, to be arrested, and put to death by a warrant under her own hand. She is reported to have done this upon a supposition that Don Juan was actually embarked; but, being obliged by accidents to remain some days at Barcelona, he no sooner received the news of Don Joseph's death, than he quitted that city, and retired to one of his own seats^y. This gave the queen, and her minister father Nitard, great anxiety, more especially when they understood that he was surrounded there by persons of great distinction; nor was it long before she received such applications from him, as made it clearly evident, that she had more cause to apprehend danger from him than he from her. However, some of the grandees, desirous of composing these disputes amicably, represented to her majesty, in the softest manner possible, that the great power of the inquisitor-general gave universal distaste to the nation; that the peace which they at present enjoyed was very precarious; that a multitude of abuses had crept into the administration; and that, in justice to the state, out of regard for her son, and from a due respect to her own glory, she ought to take the most speedy and effectual method for redressing these mischiefs, and restoring that authority to her administration, the want of which was become but too apparent. The queen was so ill advised, that she treated these remonstrances as insolent and unbecoming, and threatened to make examples of such as should take liberties of this kind for the future. The prince, notwithstanding this, directed his secretary Patinbo to deliver a memorial in much stronger terms, in which he very plainly intimated, that a reformation was necessary, and that it ought to begin with the removal of the ecclesiastic, who was looked upon as the principal author of those grievances under which the nation suffered. It was easy for her to have discerned that the prince would not have ventured upon this step, if he had not looked upon a himself as secure from the effects of her anger; but believing that her power would be speedily unsettled, if she did not treat such an application as this with severity, she caused Patinbo to be instantly put under arrest. Don Juan, upon this, advanced from the place of his retirement to within a small distance of Madrid, and sent from thence a short message to the queen, that if, by the 26th of February, the inquisitor-general did not leave the capital, he would come thither, and oblige him to quit it, in a manner that would not be agreeable to him. The prince had at that time about him no more than three hundred horse; of which the queen being perfectly well informed, she issued her orders for putting the city into a state of defence; and perhaps would have proceeded farther, if she had not found these orders disobeyed; which alarmed father Nitard to such a degree, that he quitted Madrid on the 25th². The A. D. 1669.

b queen took care to have him conducted as safely as possible out of the dominions of Spain, and sent him to Rome, where she honoured him with the title of ambassador, and procured for him a hat from the pope; of which honour he gave notice to Don Juan by a very civil and submissive letter, in hopes it might have procured him the means of returning to Spain; but as that prince did not think fit to write him any answer, he very prudently laid aside a project which it appeared impracticable for him to execute. The queen, having consented to such regulations as were required from her, declared Don Juan lieutenant-general of the kingdom of Arragon, and, in consequence of his accepting that honour, removed him from court³.

c AFTER the peace of Aix la-Chapelle, the Spanish ministers, by a new strain of policy, attempted to provide for the security of the Low Countries, by declaring to the maritime powers their inability to make such a provision. As strange a measure as this was, it had its effect, and the states paid to the king of Sweden that subsidy which had been stipulated on the part of Spain; and in all probability this method might have been practised longer with success, if the French intrigues had not prevailed upon the court of England to depart from the principles of the triple alliance^b. Upon Don Juan's refusing to go into Flanders, the constable of Castile was sent thither; and the marquis de Castel Rodrigo, though refused a passport, went incognito thro' France into Spain. The constable of Castile held the government but one year; for the marquis de Aytona dying, the queen recalled him, in order to replace that lord in the council, and sent into the Low Countries Don Juan Dominic de Haro y Guzman, conde de Monterey, d second son to the famous Don Lewis de Haro, and younger brother to the marquis del Carpio, who applied himself with great vigilance and vigour to the discharge of his office. He it was 1672.

d who, when the Dutch were in the lowest and most distressed condition possible, had the honour to contrive, and the courage to execute, though not the happiness to atchieve, the reduction of Charleroy, which, at his instance, the prince of Orange besieged in the absence of the governor; and would infallibly have taken it, if, through the negligence of some of his officers, Mr. Montalt, the governor, had not entered it with succours. If this enterprize had succeeded (and the count de Monterey gave it all the assistance in his power) the French must have immediately quitted all their conquests in Holland: but the prince being obliged to raise the siege, the crime of projecting it fell upon the head of the marquis de Monterey, of whom the most Christian king complained loudly at Madrid, where the queen disavowed his conduct, which was all the satisfaction that could be obtained^c.

e THE court of Madrid was very far from disapproving in reality what had been done by the count of Monterey, tho' they were not a little chagrined at the disappointment he had met with, and which some ascribe to count Marsin, who commanded such of their forces as were engaged in the siege. The governor of the Low Countries, therefore, continued his correspondence with the prince of Orange, and converted even his miscarriage into a signal service to the states; for, having taken care thoroughly to explain the consequences of his scheme if it had taken effect, and thereby shown that there was a probability of delivering the Dutch, as well as a necessity of attempting it, he may justly be considered as the author of that spirit which was afterwards shewn by their neighbours, in assisting and saving that republic, or rather of the instrument of which Providence made use in that critical conjuncture for the Protestant religion, and the independency of Europe. If Lewis XIV. had taken the advice of Monsieur Pomponne, the Spaniards had paid dearly for this act of generosity, since he proposed accepting of the terms offered by the states in the height of their misfortune, in order to turn the whole force of the French monarchy on the Spanish provinces. But the French king depended on a negotiation that had been set on foot to amule the court of Vienna, which likewise failed; and thereupon both the emperor and Spain renewed their alliances with the states, and declared in their favour against France^d. The firmness and rectitude of this measure may seem incompatible with the account we have given of the weak administration of the queen mother; but the reader must remember, that in foreign affairs the queen took the advice of the council of regency, and of the imperial minister, who, from their regard to the interests of the house of Austria, could not advise her better or otherwise than they did, which fully accounts for this transaction and its consequences.

Messina in Sicily revolts, which greatly embarrasses the Spanish councils.

THE next year was more fertile in events. The old duke of Lorraine, though he had no great obligations to the court of Madrid, acquainted both the imperial and Spanish ministers with his suspicions that the French would attack the Franche Comté. But they either neglected his intelligence, or what he proposed was out of their power to execute, consistent with their other schemes; so that this fine country was detached from the Spanish monarchy, and added to that of France, by a short but a vigorous campaign^e. In Flanders the Spanish troops, under the command of the count de Monterey and prince Vaudemont (son to the duke of Lorraine) acted in conjunction with the Dutch, who were headed by the prince of Orange, and had their full share in the battle of Seneff, fought on the 11th of August, in which a great part of their infantry was ruined^f. The duke de St. Germain commanded in Catalonia, and had the year before concerted measures for the revolt of Roussillon, which, tho' it was prevented by a discovery, yet he carried on the operations of the war with success, gained a considerable advantage over the army of count Schomberg, and would probably have done more, but for the revolt of Messina. That city, which is one of the capitals of Sicily, had for its governor Don Lewis del Hoyo, who fancied that he could not do a greater service to the crown of Spain, than to subvert that form of rule which had subsisted there for many ages. He failed in his attempt; the prince de Ligne, viceroy of Sicily, constrained him to quit the city; and the people, who intended only to maintain their just rights, readily submitted. They discovered, afterwards, by an intercepted letter, that the prince had promised the court of Madrid to crush them when they least expected it, and restore the old governor in triumph. This threw things again into confusion; and tho' the old governor was removed, and Don Diego de Soria, marquis de Crispiano, sent in his room, they did not think themselves safe, more especially as he caused some of their senators to be arrested; but, having expelled the Spanish garrison, demanded the protection of France. It was this that obliged the court of Madrid to order the duke de St. Germain to return into Catalonia, and to embark part of his forces for Sicily, where, notwithstanding they had a superior fleet, under the command of Don Bertrand de Guevara, the French had the good fortune to relieve Messina, which encouraged the people to persist in their revolt^g.

AT the opening of the year the count de Monterey was recalled from the government of the Low Countries; and the duke of Villabermosa, who had commanded under him with the title of general of horse, was appointed to succeed him, and directed to receive his instructions. There never was a governor more esteemed and beloved than the count, who reformed many abuses in the administration, took great pains to promote the manufactures of the provinces, and contrived and executed the famous sluices near Ostend, for the benefit of navigation. He was impenetrable to the arts, and, which was more, to the offers, of France, who, notwithstanding, paid so much respect to his merit, that, in the midst of a war, they granted him a passport for his passage by land into Spain^h. The campaign on the side of Flanders was not very remarkable. In Roussillon the Spaniards were able to do but little; and though count Schomberg commanded the French, they did not do much. In Messina the people again were in danger of perishing through want, but were relieved at the opening of the year by a small French squadron commanded by the marquis de Valavoir, who, notwithstanding, would not land any troops till they had put the principal posts into his hands, and acknowledged themselves subject to the French king. Men will do any thing to eat; and it was this that engaged them to submit to these terms, which they had very soon reason to repent, the insolence of their new masters making them forget what they had suffered under their old ones. In a month's time they were blocked up by the Spanish fleet, and in as great distress as ever; but, on the 9th of February, another French squadron appeared, under the command of the duke de Vivonne and the sieur du Quesne, which entered the port, and relieved the place, in spite of all that the Spanish admiral could do to prevent itⁱ. The duke assumed the title of viceroy, and plundered the people he should have protected. He was brother to the French king's mistress, Madame de Montespan; and, presuming upon her favour, made a bad use of his good fortune, studied every method to enrich himself, and, by his negligence, gave the Spaniards time to secure the places he should have attacked, which, contrary to their custom, they did not lose.

On the 9th of November Charles the second was declared major, to the great satisfaction of himself and his subjects. His preceptor, the bishop of Malaga, was his brother by the father's side, though Philip the fourth would never own him, out of respect to his mother, who was sister to the marquis de Mortara, and whom he married while she was with child to the marquis of Quintana. She told her husband the truth, who died of vexation in two months. When her son was of age, she confided the secret to him, who immediately became an ecclesiastic, and the king his father afterwards bestowed upon him that rich bishoprick. He did what lay in his power to give the young monarch just notions suitable to his dignity; whereas the queen laboured all that was possible to prevent his having a turn to any thing but amusements and diversions. It was owing in all probability to the instructions he received from the prelate, that when, a few days after he became of age, the queen presented him an act, declaring, that, on account of his tender years and want of experience he left the government to the queen his mother, and the council who had assisted her during his minority, he refused to sign it, adding, "that he hoped God, who had made him a king, would enable him to become the father of his people." It has been reported, and believed, the great change that soon after appeared in his temper was owing to a certain method of preparing his chocolate; at least the caution given him by the marchioness de los Velez, who had been his governess in his infancy, fortified this opinion, she bidding him "beware of one, who, from her fondness of being a queen, might possibly forget that she was a mother." The manifest imbecillity of this prince, in his last years particularly, proved highly detrimental to Spain.

THERE had been in the winter some negotiations relative to a peace, in consequence of which it was agreed, that a congress should be held at Nimeguen; but, notwithstanding this, both sides made great preparations for the campaign. It is indeed true, the prince of Orange complained that the duke of Villahermosa performed his promises but very indifferently; which was certainly fact, but it was owing to his inability. The ministers at Madrid contracted with bankers to remit him a large sum every month; upon the faith of these contracts he made his promises; but as the ministers never advanced any thing to the bankers, they looked upon their contracts as dissolved, and the duke bore all the blame with the allies. After all, the campaign was not very glorious or very unfortunate; the French king commanded in person, and avoided fighting the prince of Orange at Valenciennes, which the allies considered as a kind of victory. On the side of Roussillon, the Spaniards acted on the defensive under the duke de St. Germain; the French had a good army under the marshal de Navailles; but he did nothing in effect; and though the Spaniards were too weak to keep the field, yet their miquelets harassed the French army till they abandoned some small places they had taken, and went into winter quarters. The sending a French viceroy into Sicily so alarmed the court of Madrid, that they demanded from the states a fleet for the protection of that island; which was accordingly sent under the command of admiral de Ruyter, one of the greatest seamen ever bred in that nation, or in any other. He cruised in the streights of Messina in the beginning of the year, to prevent the French from throwing in any succours.

On the 7th of January du Quesne appeared with the French fleet. Admiral de Ruyter had, besides his own, the whole naval force of Spain in those seas, which consisted in a single ship of war and a small squadron of gallies: the latter, on account of the foul weather, were obliged to put into port. Du Quesne attacked with great spirit, for, like de Ruyter, he had made his way to the first honours by mere dint of merit, and meant to keep them by pursuing the same track. The Dutch admiral said in his letter, that he had never been in a battle so obstinately fought. It lasted till night with equal advantage; for though de Ruyter sunk a French man of war, yet one of his own met with the same misfortune as they were towing her away; but the French carried their point, and victualled Messina. When the six months, for which the Dutch fleet had been sent into the Mediterranean, were expired, de Ruyter returned to Legborn; but, finding his masters orders to give the Spaniards all the assistance in his power, he sailed again for their service to the coasts of Sicily, and, to facilitate their operations by land, appeared before Messina. The duke de Vivonne, whose fleet was now augmented to fifty sail, by the advice of du Quesne, resolved to quit the port, and to give him battle. It began about three in the afternoon, on the 22d of April, and was fought with great courage and spirit, notwithstanding admiral de Ruyter, in half an hour after it began, was wounded in both legs. This engagement did not end till between seven and eight, and then both sides claimed the victory as before, tho' the advantage seemed rather on the side of the enemy. The Dutch and Spanish fleet went to Syracuse for refreshments, where, on the 29th of the same month, de Ruyter breathed his last, having been honoured with the order of St. Michael from the French king, and the title of duke by his catholic majesty, which he did not live to enjoy ^a.

The Spanish and Dutch fleets beaten, sunk, and burnt, by the French.

A. D. 1676.

THE Dutch vice admiral Van Haan took the command, and sailed from Syracuse to Palermo, where, while he was busy in repairing his ships, and recruiting their respective crews, the duke de Vivonne arrived, with twenty-eight men of war, nine fireships, and twenty-five galleys, before the port; upon which the combined fleets of Spain and Holland formed in a half-moon at the entrance of the port; in which situation, after reconnoitring them for three or four days, the French attacked them on the 2d of June. The combined fleet fought with great spirit, till the Spanish vice admiral cut out of the line, and ran ashore, to avoid being burnt by a fireship. The French improved this advantage, and, having the wind in their favour, sent their fireships down upon the Spanish line, by which it was broke. The admiral cleared himself of two, but was burnt by the third, together with three men of war and two galleys that came to his assistance; the rest, to avoid the same fate, ran ashore. The enemy fell next upon the Dutch, and set one of their largest men of war on fire; the flames communicated themselves to two others; upon which, after destroying their own fireships, the rest retired into the port, and took the best measures they could for their own security. In this unfortunate action the Spanish admiral Iberra, and the Dutch admiral Cornelius Van Haan, were both killed, with a great number of officers, soldiers, and seamen. To increase this misfortune, one of the ships that blew up fell directly into the streets of Palermo, where, by the great beams and iron-work, many people were killed ^c. This victory raised the spirits of the Messinese, and threw the whole island of Sicily into a general consternation, which might have made way for a general conquest, if it had been improved.

WE must now turn our eyes upon the interior state of affairs in the Spanish monarchy, where the queen, soon after father Nitard was torn from her councils, produced a new favourite on the stage, to whom she was still more beneficent, and who of consequence was quickly loaded with a still greater proportion of public hatred. It has been insinuated, that, if the conde de Monterey had not been wanting to himself, he might have been both minister and favourite; but he having declined some advances that were made him, Don Hernando de Valenzuela made a more rapid progress than any favourite that had been yet seen, since, in the space of a few years, he rose, from being a page to a nobleman, not only to high offices and great appointments, but to the rank of a grandee of Spain of the first class. He was beautiful, brave, enterprising, generous, but without the knowledge or experience requisite to a man whom his own good fortune, and the inclinations of the queen his mistress, brought to manage the affairs of a great kingdom. He took, however, some precautions for the preservation of his power, which were certainly very well imagined. He adhered with the utmost fidelity to the queen who raised him. He laboured to gain the good-will of the people, by keeping Madrid constantly supplied with provisions at very reasonable prices: he took care to divert them with spectacles of different kinds, of which there are no people in Europe more fond; and he was at pains to have the king in a manner besieged by his creatures. He did not certainly take any measures for restoring the reputation or the affairs of the Spanish monarchy; he did not attempt to reduce their finances into a right method; he did not apply himself to study the interests of the monarchy with an assiduity requisite to enable him to make a right use almost of his absolute power. But these were things in reality out of his way and out of his reach: what fell within the circle of his capacity he did; and he would not have hindered those whose duty it was, and who were well enough qualified to have done it, from doing more. His great foible was his vanity, which led him to make a display of what his interest and his duty might have taught him to conceal; this gave a colour to popular clamour, and an air of patriotism to the cabals formed against him by the grandees, though, after all, he suffered as much for other people's faults as his own ^d.

Don Juan of Austria comes to the assistance of the king, and banishes the queen's lover.

DON Juan, who governed Arragon with an authority much superior to that of its antient kings, derived that authority from himself, that is, from his own conduct. He added to the Spanish regularity, in every thing he did, that spirit which at first gave it reverence. Modest and simple in his dress and in his court, he made the great object of his administration the good of the people. He found the constitution of Arragon well suited to this, and, by keeping to the letter of that constitution, he taught the people, by his veneration for the laws, to obey them without murmuring. He was inflexible in the execution of justice; but, where he found any opportunity, he never failed to manifest his compassion. This raised his character, and a countenanced the grandees at Madrid in their endeavours to place him at the head of the government. He had brought the affairs of Arragon into order, and the want of it was visible every-where else. The duke of Alba and the count of Monterey were the principal persons amongst the nobility who interested themselves in this respect; the former was much esteemed, and had a great influence; the latter had a generous heart, joined to as cool a head as any in Spain. After milder methods had been tried to no purpose, an association was formed, and signed by the grandees, who concurred in sentiment with the duke of Alba, at his house; but the great point of all was, to engage the king to add the sanction of his name, that, for doing the loyalest action in the world, they might not be either reputed or treated as rebels. Don Carlos came readily into the project as soon as it was proposed to him; his parts were not so lively as they had been, yet he still remembered he was a king, and desired to be considered in that light by his subjects. He took a resolution, therefore, of leaving his palace at Madrid, and going to the Pardo; and though he was forced to walk part of the way on foot, to which he had not been used, he performed it without complaining. There he met with Don Juan, who gave him a very succinct and true account of the state of his dominions, the distress of his subjects, and the methods by which they might be relieved. In consequence of his advice, and with the concurrence of the council, the queen mother was removed to Toledo, which she considered as a kind of banishment. Don Hernando Valenzuela, who had taken shelter in the convent of Escurial, was at length found there, concealed in a nich made for that purpose, in a cell of one of the monks, transferred to a prison, degraded from all his honours, and sent to the Philippines. He behaved with great spirit under his misfortunes; and, after remaining years, sometimes in the East, sometimes in the West Indies, was at length suffered to return to Spain. This great revolution happened in the spring, when Don Juan received, from the unanimous voice of the nobility and people, the title of protector and preserver of his country^a. They changed their sentiments soon after, and would have called him the betrayer of it, if they durst.

THE negotiations were carried on all this time at Nimeguen, where it appeared to be evidently the design of the French to let all the losses fall upon Spain. It must be indeed owned, that the Dutch had hitherto borne in a great measure the charge of the war, which, though grievous to them, was however but just, since the Spaniards came into it for their preservation. Besides, it had been carried on chiefly for their benefit, so that at this time they had recovered the best part of their country, and most of their fortresses except Maestricht. In point, therefore, of justice and decency, they were content to make this campaign, that their allies might have some opportunity of repairing their losses, or at least of making better terms; of which there appeared such a probability, that they rejected the cessation of arms proposed by Lewis XIV. from a belief that Charles the fifth, who had succeeded his uncle of the same name in Lorrain, and was at the head of the emperor's armies, would be able to enter into his own dominions, and by the assistance of the allies, into France itself. They had the misfortune, however, to be disappointed in their expectations. The French king very unexpectedly took the field on the last of February, opened the trenches against Valenciennes on the 10th of March, and carried it very unexpectedly by storm on the 17th, not without great suspicions of treachery. The town and citadel of Cambray were reduced in less than a fortnight; at the same time that the duke of Orleans lay before St. Omer's, the prince of Orange hazarded a battle at Cassel, for its relief, in which he was beaten by that duke, assisted by marshal Luxemburgh, on the 11th of April^r. After this, at the pressing instances of the Spaniards, he once more formed the siege of Charleroi, which he raised on the 13th of August, upon the approach of marshal Luxemburgh, and declined fighting the French army, upon which the duke of Villabermosa warmly insisted. When the campaign seemed to be at an end, the French besieged and took St. Guilain, in the beginning of December. In Catalonia Don Juan of Austria furnished the count de Monterey with a superior army, by ordering all the troops to join him that were intended to be transported to Sicily, judging very rightly, that the licence with which the French troops lived in that island would inspire its inhabitants with courage enough to drive them out. The marshal duke de Navailles commanded for the French, and, their historians say, did wonders. It is certain that he acted upon the offensive at the beginning of the campaign; that, upon the approach of the count de Monterey, he retired towards Roussillon, through a rough and mountainous country, through which the Spaniards followed him, and fought him on the 4th of July, when both sides claimed the victory; but that it belonged rather to the Spaniards may be presumed from hence, that the French, according to their own accounts, decamped at midnight, and retired into their own territories. It must be owned, that the campaign did not answer the expectations of Don Juan, who looked coldly upon the count de Monterey, tho' some say this was rather owing to his having too great an interest in the affections of the young king.

The next intirely of the same complexion both there and in Catalonia.

THE proceedings at Nimeguen went on very slowly, which was not a little owing to the Spaniards, who, presuming on that honour and generosity which they had shewn in coming into the war, insisted upon as good terms as if they had been victorious throughout the course of it, to which the French would not agree. The Dutch gave the Spaniards good words and good advice, but endeavoured to soften them as far as was in their power. The prince of Orange, indeed, who was for carrying on the war, spoke another kind of language, still less acceptable to the Spaniards, for he inveighed against their want of punctuality, their dilatoriness and imbecillity, which, after all, was owing to the perplexed state of their affairs, and to their indigence, which they were at once too proud to confess, and too lazy to amend. The French king took advantage of these favourable circumstances for accomplishing his designs. In the very beginning of March he invested and reduced, or rather surprized, Ghent, and soon after invested Ypres, at the siege of which he assisted in person. The Spanish garrison was commanded by the marquis of Conflans, who made a gallant defence, and did not render the place till after twenty-five days open trenches. The French next blocked up Mons, which had its effect, as we shall see in its proper place. The marshal duke de Navailles being considerably reinforced in Rouffillon, after menacing Roses in Catalonia, suddenly invested and besieged Puicerda, which was very gallantly defended. The count de Monterey assembled his forces, and took such measures as he thought most expedient for its relief; but, whether he wanted strength, or was in reality inferior in military skill to the French marshal, who was indeed considered as one of the best officers of that age, so it fell out, that his design miscarried, and Puicerda was lost. This ruined the count with Don Juan of Austria, who caused him to be exiled^a, though he had been one of the principal persons who had opened a passage to his return from Arragon; and though for this reason, Don Juan has been accused of ingratitude, yet it will hereafter appear, that his treatment of this nobleman could not proceed from so base a principle.

French fleet and forces abandon Messina, and the court takes no care of them in the place.

WHAT Don Juan had foreseen, with respect to the island of Sicily, came exactly to pass. The duke de Vivonne suffered his soldiers to live in a manner at discretion, and was at the same time very rapacious: this created heart-burnings and complaints, which, instead of procuring redress, produced confiscations. The Sicilians in general came to have an utter abhorrence for the French; and the English being on the point of joining with the Dutch, in sending a strong maritime force to the assistance of the Spaniards, Lewis XIV. took a quick resolution of withdrawing his forces from that island, and sent Monsieur de la Feuillade, with a strong squadron in the spring, to put that design in execution. The duke de Vivonne, who had previous intelligence of this step, managed every thing with such address and circumspection, as made it plainly appear, that the innumerable errors of his government were not at all owing to want of capacity. He gave out that he had a secret expedition of the utmost importance in view, which would require the whole force under his command; and carried his dissimulation so far, that public prayers were addressed to heaven for the success of what was never intended. Thus, after insulting and abusing both God and man, the French troops and the treasures they had plundered were embarked on board Monsieur de la Feuillade's squadron on the 8th of April, and then, and not till then, the Messinese were informed, that they were to be deserted. In the consternation they were under at this unexpected news, the only expedient of which they could think, was, to quit their country, and retire to France, which between four and five hundred of them did; but the bulk of the inhabitants were abandoned, not only by the French fleet and army, but by the ministers of France also, in the negotiations at Nimeguen, to the resentment of the court of Madrid; and not a few of them paid with their lives for having been weak enough to place any confidence in a power that acted only from motives of self-interest and ambition^a. It might, however, have been more to the advantage of Spain, if clemency had taken place of resentment.

After much negotiation, and with no small difficulty, the treaty at Nimeguen is concluded.

THE great object of the French negotiations was, to detach the republic the United Provinces from her allies, in which they at length succeeded, notwithstanding all the opposition that could be given to this measure by the prince of Orange. The states, indeed, had two things to plead, which were, the excessive expences of the war; and that Maestricht, which was the only place France held out of all her conquests, was to be restored. The French, by one of their great refinements in policy, were very near losing this peace, when there was nothing left towards its conclusion but the bare form of signing. They had promised the Dutch to restore certain places to Spain, without taking any notice of the time when this

- a restitution was to be made ; and, being pressed upon this head, the plenipotentiaries acknowledged it was the king's intention not to proceed to these restitutions till the like were made to Sweden, which, in this war, had suffered as much for being the ally of France, as Spain for her attachment to the states. But the Dutch acted with great steadiness in this particular, fixing a day certain, by which if the French did not depart from this pretension, they would look upon their engagements as void. When the day came, the French acquiesced, and the treaty was signed on the 10th of August. The prince of Orange, notwithstanding, attacked the French army before Mons four days after ; which, however, did not prevent both parties from adhering to the treaty. This put the Spaniards under the necessity of accepting the terms prescribed to them ; and the treaty was accordingly subscribed between France and Spain,
- b by the plenipotentiaries from the respective crowns, on the 17th of September following, at Nimeguen. The places restored to Spain by this peace were Charleroy, Binsch, Atb, Oudenard, Courtray, and its dependencies, the town and duchy of Limbourg, Ghent, the fort of Rodenhus, the country of Waes, Lewe, and St. Guilain, their fortifications being first rased. Puicerda in Catalonia was also restored. France retained the Franche Comte intire, the towns of Valenciennes, Bouchain, Conde, Cambrai and its dependencies, Aire, St. Omer, Ypres and its châtellenie, Warwick, Warneton, Poperinghen, Bailleul, Cassel, Bavai, Maubeuge, Charlemont or Dinant. The public tranquillity was far from being restored by the conclusion of this peace ; for the French had so many new pretensions, and the Spanish ministers flattered themselves with such hopes of being assisted by both the maritime powers, that it was not till towards the
- c end of the year that the ratification of Spain arrived^y, and was exchanged ; by which the people were freed from their apprehensions of seeing a new war kindled out of the ashes of the old one.

THE revolution that happened in their domestic government had filled the Spanish nation with hopes that they should see all their grievances redressed, and the reputation of the crown speedily revived. This, without question, was what Don Juan had in view ; but, considering with himself the instability of his own situation, and the odious colours that might be thrown on the manner in which he assumed the administration, in case of any new change, he resolved to prevent this, on establishing, by a judicial inquiry, the certainty of those facts which had been alleged as the causes for the disgrace of the queen mother, which, though at this time it was allowed just and requisite, yet it was afterwards treated as a needless act of severity, and which served only to bring to light things that had better have been concealed. The queen, during her administration, had not only negotiated, but concluded, a treaty of marriage for the king her son, with the archduchess Maria Antonietta, daughter to the emperor Leopold, though a perfect infant, and had even gone so far as to notify this to the states general ; notwithstanding which, that contract was laid aside, and in compliance, as it is said, with the king's own inclinations, who was exceedingly charmed with the picture of the duke of Orleans's daughter. Don Juan sent the marquis de los Balbazex into France, to demand that princess, who had his audience for that purpose of his most Christian majesty on the 10th of May ; and every thing was settled and concluded by the 2d of July. As Maria Louisa of Orleans stood equally related to Lewis XIV. and Charles II. of England, this match was highly applauded ; and Don Juan received great compliments thereupon ; and yet (such strange things fall out in courts !) this marriage was improved by the enemies of Don Juan into the cause of his disgrace, and that broke his heart before the arrival of the young queen, who stood indebted to him for that pompous, though in its consequences, no very pleasing title^z. The circumstances of this new revolution, which disappointed the measures that had been concerted for a gradual reformation of whatever was amiss in the government, shall be represented as clearly and as succinctly as it is possible.

THE young king seemed to be so much satisfied with his marriage, that such as were attached to the queen mother, such as had grounds to apprehend the result of Don Juan's inquiries, such as thought themselves neglected since the commencement of his administration ; such as had felt the effects of his displeasure, and such as had a faculty of intriguing, concurred in the insinuations, that though he certainly proposed, yet he secretly laboured to prevent, this marriage. They gave out, that, even in proposing it, he had chiefly in view the crossing the queen's designs of marrying the king into her own family ; that he had privately negotiated at Lisbon for the young princess, who was like to be the heir of that crown ; and that the minister he had sent into France did not proceed with a vivacity suitable to the king's desires. These suggestions had made some impression upon the king's mind, when Don Juan, unfortunately for himself, but surely from a noble and generous motive, represented to the council, that, since the king was to marry a niece, and not a daughter, of France, this occasion might be taken to engage that crown to make some concessions in favour of Spain, or at least to put a stop to those proceedings in the Low Countries, by which the subjects of that crown felt almost all the miseries of war in the midst of peace. The council, to make their court to the king, rejected this proposition, though very prudent in itself, and which might have been productive of very good effects. The king was pleased with this, and shewed a visible coldness towards Don Juan; upon which signal, many, who had the greatest obligations to him, abandoned his party, and, amongst the rest, the king's confessor, who owed that post intirely to Don Juan's favour. In the midst of these intrigues, he was seized with an ague, and, while he was indisposed, things proceeded so far, that he saw his disgrace inevitable. He had conferred upon the count de Monterey, of his own accord, one of the best employments in the new queen's household; a certain proof, that, with respect to this nobleman, he was not implacable; but this did not hinder his being chagrined, when he found the count recalled from his exile without consent.

THIS, and a multitude of other accidents of the same kind (not to give into the suspicion of something of a worse sort), threw him into a mortal disease, which emaciated him to such a degree, that his physicians, who could never tell what to make of his disease, despaired of his recovery. The king's tenderness revived when it was too late; he visited him, wept at the sight of his condition, complaining, that, now he had most need of his advice, he was about to lose him. Don Juan did not appear much affected with these marks of royal compassion. He took that opportunity to enter into a full detail of the state of public affairs, to let the king see in how perplexed, as well as in how declining a condition they stood; to point out to him the true sources from which all these mischiefs flowed, and the sole remedies that could prove effectual. He pressed him to make a proper choice of a council, and to apply himself, by the help of their advice, to administer the concerns of his kingdom. He exhorted him to remember always his duty to God and his people, and to beware of listening to flatterers and favourites; and, with many wishes for his long life, prosperity, and issue by his queen, he took leave of him for ever. On the 17th of September he expired, and, by his will, bequeathed all his estate, which was but very small, to the king; his jewels, which were more considerable, to be equally divided between the two queens^a. Calumny, loud even in his last moments, became dumb at his decease. The vulgar were convinced of his disinterestedness; and the whole nation confessed, that, in him, the abilities and virtues of the house of Austria made their last efforts. He left behind him a natural daughter, who was a nun. He was scarce interred before the king went to Toledo, to bring back the queen mother to triumph over his ashes, and to persecute with unrelenting hatred all who had manifested their zeal for their country, by adhering to a prince who had nothing else at heart; which she did, till the terror of this vindictive temper again deprived her of power^b.

His death has an extreme bad effect on public affairs, which fall into confusion.

THE king went to meet his new queen, and consummated his marriage, by a strange indecorum, in one of the poorest villages in Old Castile, from whence he conducted her to Burgos, and in the month of February, made a pompous entry into Madrid. The vast expences that attended this marriage added to those evils with which Spain was already oppressed. There was for a long time no administration at all; but such business as could not be delayed, the king dispatched with the secretary of state, a young man, without either parts or experience, who, by assiduity and cunning, had supplanted his master, and, by the practice of the same noble arts, kept the king from fixing for a long time upon any minister; nor was he determined in his choice at last, but by the constable of Castile's generously declaring in favour of his competitor for that high post, the duke de Medina Celi, who was a nobleman of a gentle disposition, and very much beloved. The young queen found herself under great restraint, and, from a very different education, found the Spanish customs very uneasy and troublesome. The queen mother lost her power by degrees, in endeavouring to extend it. The prince de Harcourt, who accompanied the queen from France, and the marquis de Villars, who was ambassador from that crown, were disagreeable to Charles. They looked narrowly into every thing; they entered into conferences and connections with the grandeess; and the latter more especially took a pleasure in delivering his master's haughty messages in a manner that rendered them still more distasteful. The accounts they gave from time to time of the distracted state of things at Madrid, where one untoward accident was continually following another, induced Lewis XIV. to form various pretensions, as if he had delighted in trespassing upon the Catholic king's patience, or rather insulting his circumstances. He obliged him to lay aside the title of duke of Burgundy, to part with many villages upon the frontiers of Roussillon, as well as in the Low Countries, to give orders for his ships striking the flag to those of France, and to give him distinguished satisfactions for disputes between their subjects, a in which sometimes right was on his side, though they were almost always unworthy of notice. Such is the situation of a king, whose splendor appears only in his titles; and such the repeated reasons by which Charles was taught, that the monarch, who cannot make war, can as little enjoy peace; of which he was at length so convinced, that he told his queen, he should be glad of a war to be rid of M. de Villars ^c.

In making choice of the duke of Medina Cæli for prime minister, the king satisfied the court and the nation, as well as himself; but it was for a very small time, after which the clamour revived, and became even louder than ever. This did not proceed from any thing the duke had done, but from his doing nothing. He was indeed qualified to be the king's favourite, but not his minister; his capacity was good, his intention was better; but there were so many evils to be redressed, so many things to be provided for, and such an intire deficiency of funds, that, like one amazed, not knowing what road to take, he stood quite still. At length he ventured upon the worst measure he could take, which was, regulating the copper coin, which he reduced from its nominal to its real value, and thereby confounded every thing, since there were no less than fifteen millions of this coin in Spain. By this error two mischiefs were brought to meet that before were scarce seen together, for money was scarce, and yet provisions were dear. To correct this, the copper money was called in, and the king promised to pay its value in six months; which, as it was known he could not perform, it served only to make things worse. In the mean time foreigners made an advantage of this in many different ways, more especially when great families came at last to coin or sell their plate. The misery of the court was so great, that many of the king's menial servants left the palace for want of subsistence; and the king, with the advice of his council, was not able to find money for the annual journey to Aranjuez, tho' that is but seven leagues from Madrid ^d. The navy sunk to nothing, the funds destined for its support being diverted by those whose duty it was to apply them. The soldiers deserted on the frontiers for want of pay; and at last the governors quitted their fortresses, to come and represent at Madrid in person what they had often represented by letters to little or no purpose.

As to the settled revenue of the crown, it was anticipated for several years, and, which was much worse, the collection remained in the officers of the crown, who did not bring in above one tenth of what they levied upon the people into the king's coffers, or, what stood in their place, the pockets of the assentists, so that the anticipation of all was made upon a very small part. Another singularity was, that many, if not most, of these assentists, were Jews, who, for the sake of their valuable talents in the management of the finances, were overlooked by the inquisition, except now and then, when, having made too great a display of their wealth, they were squeezed a little; and therefore, not being able to enjoy their riches here, they sent them into other countries, and followed them at a proper time into places of greater freedom. The detached provinces of the Spanish empire were not less exposed than the seat of its government. Those sent to rule them had chiefly in view the repairing their own fortunes, and, in order to this, they made no scruple of multiplying those mischiefs, of which, at their arrival, they found too many; neighbouring potentates took their advantages likewise, and stood as little in fear of the log as they had formerly been afraid of the stork: hence it was that every court insulted that of Spain. France made incroachments in Biscay, in Roussillon, in the Low Countries. The elector of Brandenburgh, finding it impossible to recover by negotiation the subsidies that were due to him, withdrew his minister from Madrid, hired a small squadron of privateers, and took a Spanish vessel with a large sum on board, on the coast of the Low Countries. As the court of Madrid was too proud to enter into any liquidation of his demands till the ship was previously restored, he kept all, though he would have been content with what was his due ^e. The Spanish governor of Buenos Ayres having dispossessed the Portuguese of a place they had seized, without any better title than convenience, the prince regent of Portugal took this up in such high terms, that though Spain insisted first upon her right, and her possession of one hundred and forty years, which she justified by a manifesto, yet in a month's time she negotiated this right away, and not only gave up the island in question, but confessed that she had no title to it.

THE detail of the affairs of Spain is the history of Spain at this juncture: a nation in such a condition can furnish no other history. The king reposed himself on his minister and the several councils to which his predecessors had assigned the cognisance of different affairs; so that the appearance of government remained, though the spirit was almost extinguished. The duke of Medina Cæli was advised to establish a select council, with whom he might confer upon extraordinary occasions; but he apprehended, that, in doing this, his power would devolve upon that junta. He was at last forced to take this step, which had no considerable effect. There were, however, in Spain, men of parts and capacity, and particularly the two sons of Don Lewis de Haro, the marquis de Lich, who had made the treaty with Portugal, and the count de Monterey, who has been so often mentioned; but the former was sent ambassador to Rome, and kept there against his will; the latter was hated by the queen mother, always suspected, sometimes in disgrace. They were hated for their superior parts; and those who had the king's ear knew so well that a general reform would follow their coming into power, that, for their own sakes, they kept them at a distance. The duke of Villabermosa had been admitted into the council, upon his return from the Low Countries, where he was succeeded by the prince of Parma, who could not prevent the county of Chineï from being seized by France; which having violated the peace on this side from the same principle of ambition, put a garrison into Casal, to bridle Italy^f. The next year the French king demanded the country of Alost, because it had been once in his possession, and he had never renounced it expressly, tho' at the treaty of Nimeguen it was restored to Spain. As this sacrifice was not easily made, Luxemburgh was blocked up. The sole resource of the court of Madrid was, to demand the assistance of her allies; but the emperor was engaged in a war with the Turks, the republic of Holland wanted the power, and the king of Great Britain was not in a condition to undertake the protection of the Austrian Neithberlands, though his interest was deeply concerned in their safety. The government of them was at length confided to the marquis de Grana, a man of abilities and spirit, very capable of defending them, if the means had been in his power. The death of the queen of France, his catholic majesty's sister, was an additional misfortune, which was known and felt at Madrid, and, like other misfortunes, was esteemed without remedy^g. Such was the situation of a power, which, in the memory of some then living, had given law to all Europe.

By which, tho' unable to make, the Spaniards are provoked to declare, war. At this critical conjuncture the duke de Medina Celi resigned his post of prime minister, that he might be free from that clamour which he found it impossible to remove any other way. But this had no visible effect upon public affairs, which went on still in the same way. The French king, under pretence of obtaining an equivalent for the country of Alost, besieged and took Courtray and Dixmude. The marquis de Grana, in order to push the allies of Spain to unite on the side of justice, and in her favour, declared war, and the prince of Orange did all that was in his power to engage the states to take the side of the injured at all events. But their tenderness for their own concerns, and their apprehensions of the vast power of an ambitious prince, who had no law but his will, restrained them. The projects of the marquis, therefore, in this respect, became vain. But however, it set the arrogance of Lewis XIV. and his contempt of treaties, in their just light, and convinced all the powers in Europe, that all hopes of safety were vain, till this exorbitant power should be humbled. It is however true, that notwithstanding this declaration of war, and the weakness of the Spaniards, France did not push her conquests in the Low Countries as she might have done. This did not arise from any moderation, but was founded on an apprehension of provoking the Dutch, by the approach of danger, to take that step, which, from a principle of equity, they had declined. To make the Spaniards thoroughly sensible of this, marshal Crequi was sent in the very depth of winter to bombard Luxemburgh; which he did with great fury, but without exciting, as was expected, any sedition in the place^h. The princes and states of the empire saw the consequence of this clearly, but want of unanimity checked their resentment.

Which ends in a truce for 20 years, which they are compelled to make on bad terms. THE French beginning to assemble an army on the frontiers, the duke de Bournonville was sent in haste into Catalonia, where, while he was visiting the places, and assembling the troops, the French very unexpectedly penetrated into Navarre, where, except plundering some places of small importance and spreading rumours, calculated to increase the discontent of the people, they did nothing worth mentioning. This gave the duke de Bournonville time to draw together what forces there were in Catalonia; so that when the French general, the marshal Bellefons, came to penetrate into that country by Roussillon, he found him very well posted, in order to dispute his passage. But the marshal, being superior in all respects, attacked and forced the duke at Ponte Mayor on the 12th of May, and thereby opened a passage to Gironne. The duke, however, threw into that place the best part of his infantry; so that when the marshal came to form the siege, he met with a much more obstinate resistance than he expected; however, having taken some outworks, and made a breach in the body of the place, he attempted it by assault, in which the French troops were not only repulsed, but were pursued to their camp with such vigour, that the marshal was obliged to raise the siege, and retire towards the sea coast, where, by the assistance of the French fleet, he made

- a himself master of Palamos, and some other little places ¹. On the side of the Low Countries the war was suspended, the French king having declared to the states general what at that time he was disposed to take from Spain; upon which he was willing to restore what he had already taken, and suspend his further demands for twenty years, adding, that if in fourteen days after the taking Luxemburgh, which was besieged by marshal Crequi, they did not prevail upon his catholic majesty to accept, he would take such measures as the superiority of his power should enable him to do. The fortrefs of Luxemburgh, which had been invested in the beginning of May, held out till the 4th of June; and then the Spaniards, being convinced they had no assistance to hope, submitted to put their affairs into the hands of their friends, in consequence of which, the truce of Ratisbon was subscribed A. D. 1684.
- b on their behalf on the 10th of August, by which they abandoned Luxemburgh, and recovered Courtray and Dixmude, together with a great number of villages that had been taken from them since the treaty of Nimeguen. As this was a measure equally repugnant to the interests and honour of Spain, the ratification came but slowly from Madrid; so that, when it arrived, the French demanded upwards of ten millions of livres for contributions; but, upon the interposition of the king of Great Britain, condescended to accept four millions, which was all that the people had in the world, and, which is still more extraordinary, caused a medal to be struck, to perpetuate the memory of this wonderful act of condescension ^k. But how much soever this might amuse his own subjects, the rest of Europe saw it with amazement.
- c At Madrid the king began to apply himself with more steadiness than usual to the conduct of public affairs, and shewed such a sensibility of the state in which he found the generality of his subjects, as very speedily produced many salutary regulations, which had an extreme good effect; but which would have been much more effectual, if they had been begun earlier, or if they had been conducted with greater judgment. Through his endeavour to correct luxury, many foreign commodities and manufactures were prohibited, and, for example-sake, some seized and burnt, which disoblged the Dutch, a thing by no means seasonable. In order to ease the people, some heavy taxes were abolished; but as the income arising from those taxes were mortgaged, it raised a clamour amongst the assientists, or public creditors, who were not those artful and cunning persons who had raised fortunes to themselves from the necessities of the government, but honest people, who had purchased those securities at a high rate, and were now deprived of their subsistence. The king, therefore, caused a new fund to be settled, without reviving the old taxes for the payment of their interest; but as it arose from suppressing of pensions, the clamour was only varied; and as this regulation was ascribed to the count de Oropesa, the king's favourite, who, by the way, was of the house of Braganza, and the next heir male to the crown of Portugal, it drew upon him a degree of hatred that made him very uneasy. In the mean time the marquis de Grana died at Brussels, and the government of the Low Countries per interim devolved on Don Francisco Antonio de Agurto, marquis de Gastanaga. Some other changes were made, and the imperial minister had now a greater influence than ever at the court of Madrid ^l; which was exceedingly serviceable to the interests of the house of Austria, and accidentally to those of Europe.
- d It has been observed, that there is no branch in politics to which the Spaniards may with so much justice pretend as impenetrable secrecy. While they appeared to be intirely taken up with their domestic concerns, and to have nothing so much at heart as restoring the interior of their administration, their ministers in all the courts of Europe, who were generally speaking men of sense and experience, deplored the exorbitant growth of the French power, magnified their own losses incurred by daring to stand up against it; and suggested, that such as were partners in calamity ought naturally to become allies to each other to prevent being gradually destroyed. In Italy the spirit of pope Innocent XI. was kept up, notwithstanding France had already given him ill usage, and threatened worse. No pains were spared by Don Pedro Ronquillo, at London, to detach king James the second from his close connection with France, which lessened him as much with the popish powers as his religion did with the protestants. In Holland memorials of a like nature were presented, and the states solicited with great assiduity to enter into some measures for the protection of what was still left of the Spanish Low Countries. But in the midst of these insinuations, remonstrances, and applications, a minister on the behalf of his catholic majesty, signed, with all possible secrecy, the league at Augsbourg, on the 29th of June ^m, into which the emperor, the crown of Sweden, the elector of Bavaria, and other princes and circles of the empire, the king of Spain himself representing the circle of Burgundy, entered, for the protection of their respective dominions, and for the maintenance of the peace of Nimeguen, and the late truce for twenty years : for this purpose their respective quotas were assigned, his electoral highness of Bavaria declared general of the allies, and a military chest established at Francfort. But the prince of Orange and the states, upon whom the allies chiefly depended, were not, for certain reasons, amongst the number of the contracting parties. The French king exceedingly provoked by the discourses of the Spanish ministers before-mentioned, but unwilling to violate openly the truce of Ratibon so soon after it was concluded, took a new method of venting his resentment. As he had A. D. 1686. the year before bombarded Genoa, because the republic had built four-gallies that might possibly join the Spanish fleet, so now he sent marshal d'Estrees with a powerful squadron into the Mediterranean, who very unexpectedly appeared before Cadiz, where, after taking two galleons in the sight of ten Dutch men of war, he demanded half a million of crowns for losses sustained by the French merchants in Mexico, that is, the value of their goods taken in illicit trade, for which he obtained the promise of full and immediate satisfaction. This was an additional insult, and more than was necessary to convince the ministers at Madrid how good a neighbour they had in this potent prince. The additional affront, therefore, of setting up posts upon a common at a small distance from Namur, with inscriptions, declaring it to be within the territories of France, with hints, that a citadel might possibly be built there, was a wanton display of a superiority of power, that, whatever the French ministers fancied^a, was not altogether so mortifying to the Spaniards as was intended. On the contrary, these exorbitancies, which at another time would have been intolerable, were in some measure welcome at present.

The queen mother's influence, and the strange uses she made of it. THE great projects that were now upon the carpet obliged the king to pursue the reformation he had begun. The marquis de los Velos, was placed at the head of the finances, in order to carry into execution a new alteration in the coin, which occasioned loud and general complaints, more especially from the French and English ministers, the former insisting, that the money due to the French merchants should be paid upon the old foot; and the latter, that the subjects of Great Britain should be exempted from this order. The king's answer was sensible and steady : " With respect to public contracts and old debts, he admitted the demand to be reasonable; but, in respect to subsequent transactions, his measures had been taken with deliberation, and he could not recede." Abundance of sounding military titles, with good appointments, which those who held them never executed, were suppressed, and a multitude of supernumerary offices in the law had the same fate. The court was visibly changed for the better; and that change would have been still more conspicuous, if the king's heart had not been equally divided between the two queens. His consort had a fever, and the queen motherness in this respect cost him a fit of sickness. On the other hand, the queen mother prevailed to keep the duke of Medina Cæli in exile, and even procured an order for the return of Valenzuela, notwithstanding it was strenuously opposed^o; but the king, being made sensible of the consequences, secretly countermanded it.

His catholic majesty has a very large share in the revolution in Great Britain. THE court of France, having intelligence of the league of Augsburgh, proposed to his catholic majesty, after making the like offer to the emperor, to convert the truce of twenty years into a perpetual peace upon the same or like terms, and had the mortification to receive such answers from Vienna and Madrid, as plainly demonstrated the two courts acted in concert. However, the dispute, or rather the quarrel, commenced with the Spaniards the year before, was amicably adjusted, but, as usual, at their expence, by an exchange of certain lands for the common, in the vicinity of Namur. The war with the Moors gave the Spanish court an opportunity of equipping a considerable squadron of gallies, and repairing some men of war, without giving umbrage; the marquis de Gastanaga was confirmed in his government of the Low Countries, but was so indifferently supplied, that most of the troops there deserted for want of pay, which the French saw with no small satisfaction, though this would have been very much diminished, if they had known the true cause at that time, which they afterwards published, in their declaration of war, to be the accommodating the prince of Orange with very considerable supplies for the expedition which he then meditated; neither would they have been free from chagrin, if they had discovered the share the Spanish ministers certainly had in determining the duke of Savoy no longer to bear the ill usage he received from Monsieur de Louvois, and their intrigues in other courts in Italy, where, being now so little formidable they had so much the better interest^p:

Acts with much diligence and sagacity in strengthening. IN the beginning of the year the court of Spain was exceedingly alarmed by the king's falling dangerously ill, during which time the queen mother assumed the power of excluding the queen consort her husband's chamber. Upon his recovery, the queen mother thought fit to a let the duke of Medina Cæli come to court; but he paid pretty dear for that favour, since she obliged him to surrender all his great offices, which she immediately distributed amongst her creatures. To prevent his becoming popular, she divulged, that he was the concealed author of all the new regulations, and that he had sacrificed all things, that he might gain access to the king, in order to give him the necessary lights for carrying those regulations into execution, from whence he came to be reputed the best patriot in Spain, and, though not employed, was as much trusted by the king as ever^a. In Catalonia the marquis de Leganex, who was viceroy, attempting to put the province in a posture of defence, fell into such hatred with the people, that he demanded to be recalled; upon which the king, or rather the queen mother, took him at his word, and sent thither the count de Melgar. In the autumn the queen consort fell ill of the small-pox, of which she recovered, and, during the whole time of her distemper, the king expressed great tenderness for her. Yet there was a rumour, as if the disposition of the court of Rome had been founded about a divorce, on account of the queen's sterility, and that the king might have an opportunity of marrying the infant of Portugal. In respect to foreign affairs, his majesty laboured earnestly to persuade the emperor into a peace with the Turks, and continued his correspondencies in Italy, where his influence began to revive, in proportion as his power was less feared. The Moors having besieged Oran with a great force, the king Don Carlos, who could not have done it perhaps any other way, relieved it by a stroke of wit. As soon as he received the news, he made it public, adding, that if this misfortune had happened to his most Christian majesty, he must have published a proclamation for restraining the nobility from going thither without leave. The Spanish lords took the hint, two hundred of them went at their own expence, and raised the siege. Count Tourville, with three French men of war, meeting rear-admiral Pacpachin with two Spanish men of war in the Mediterranean, as they did not immediately lower their top-sails, fired upon them, and, after a long engagement, obliged them to salute him. The court of Madrid was forced to digest this, and to send orders to the count de Gastanaga to temporize in the Low Countries, as their schemes were not yet ripe. However, a plate fleet arrived at Cadiz; and, though the king could keep but very little of its contents, yet it gave him fresh credit; and to a court in such circumstances this was of great use.
